The terrible twenties. Gay, mad and unforgettable. "Gee what a decade to grow up in! But musically speaking, the thirties were more exciting." Colored bands—Jimmy adores them—came into their own. Duke Ellington and Cab Calloway, Count Basie and Louis Armstrong. You couldn't miss their influence on the old Dorsey Bros. Orchestra which the boys led jointly from 1933 to 1936. And you can't miss it now in Jimmy's own outfit. He's captured something primitive and wild that few white bands have.

Kind of interesting the way the brothers split up. It was on Memorial Day, 1936, when they were playing at the Meadowbrook. Tommy was leading the orchestra, and the piece was "I'll Never Say Never Again." When it was over, some chap in the band said, "Gosh, Tommy. That was kind of fast, wasn't it?" "Much too fast, Mac," agreed Jimmy. Tommy strode over to his brother in a towering rage. Hot words sizzled back and forth, and eventually Tommy stamped off the platform. He didn't come back. Everyone tried to get them to patch it up, but to this day they aren't friends. ' (Though Jimmy says he thinks Tommy's the greatest trombonist the swingtime world has ever known.

Temperamentally, they're millions of miles apart. Tommy's the big-talker. Spiels off for hours about when he worked in the coal mines. Whereas Jimmy's the one who really did, but doesn't talk about it. Tommy's got the jitterbug jargon down cold. Everything's "solid" or "awreet." Jimmy's the chap who—when spoken to in terms of "gutbucket," "blackstick" and "ride"—says, "I don't know much about that stuff. I just blow." Tommy likes flash. His clothes are loud; he has a 32-room house in New Jersey; he dates Lana Turner. Jimmy dresses like a banker, lives in hotels and dates his wife consistently.

They were never soul mates, and each has hit new heights since the divorce. Jimmy sold 5,000,000 records for Decca last year, had nine song hits on his hands (Green Eyes, Maria Elena, Amapola, I Hear a Rhapsody, Jim, My Sister and I, Blue Champagne, Yours, and High on a Windy Hill) and got $75,000 for four weeks of film work on "The Fleet's In" —the biggest money ever paid to any maestro.

All of which made him pretty happy. But you know what really gave him the most colossal kick of all? Being voted Outstanding Father in the Musical World. There was no standing him for days after the award was made. Jimmy—who just smiled kind of abstractedly when they told him his Maria Elena was the year's best-seller with over 1,000,000 sales—grinned and grinned when he heard about it. It's no secret what a nut he is about his ten-year-old daughter, Julie Lou. And vice versa. She's the only thing in his life he's not modest about. "I honestly think she's a little outstanding," he tells you the minute you give him an opening. "You know, pretty, bright. A marvelous kid. Not a bit musical though." She takes piano lessons but isn't so hot at it. Skates like a dream and never had a lesson in her life.

Last year she went to school in Connecticut, and the phoning to Daddy in New York was something scandalous. One night she called, insisting that he come for the Junior Prom the following Saturday. Jimmy happened to be rather tied up at the Hotel Pennsylvania right then, and tried to explain that Saturday night was quite a big night. Much tears and sobbing on the Connecticut end of the line. A very depressed Daddy on the New York end. "Goodbye, then—" almost hysterically. "Bye, honey."

That Saturday Mrs. Jimmy went up to school to bring her home for the week-end. The trip down was mostly devoted to Julie Lou's panning of Daddy. "But," said her mother, "you're too young to go to the dance even if he had been able to get away." "The big kids," announced Julie Lou, "said that if I got him there I could go to it and dance with everyone." "Ah, what a shame." "Oh, don't feel badly, Mommy. I'm used to it, now. This isn't the first time Daddy's loused things up for me. . ."

But let anyone else mention her pop with anything less than adoration, and oh boy! "He's the sweetest man in the world, the smartest, the most marvelous bandleader and the handsomest." Tyrone Power is also handsome in Julie Lou's eyes, but not mentionable in the same breath with Daddy. Glenn Miller is also a good band leader, but ditto. Once she went to the New York Paramount and heard some other orchestra play "Flight of the Bumblebee"—Jimmy's pet piece, and one he does wonderfully. Julie stood up on her seat. "Stop," she yelled. "You can't play my Daddy's tune."

Julie's in school in Hollywood this year, and the phoning situation is, if anything worse. Now it's can't he fly out to play for the school picnic sing or for their operetta or something.

He's always seeing a bracelet or a watch that he can't resist for Janie. Mom has just about everything in the world he can think of to give her, so when he's stuck for a new present for her he sends her dozens and dozens of flowers.

His own wants are few, and getting presents embarrasses him. Has one great passion though—brocade pajamas—and last Christmas he got twenty-two pairs.

"Now all I need is some time to sleep in 'em," he grins.

Well, gosh, Jimmy—you can't have everything!

"I was a Part-Time Wife"

HOW MRS. E. OVERCAME THE "ONE NEGLECT" THAT MARS SO MANY MARRIAGES

1. When Bob and I were first married, I thought we'd be the happiest pair in the world. I was a good manager, a good cook. I'd always been considered attractive. But . . . well, Bob became cold, indifferent. The romantic side of our marriage simply fizzled out.

2. One morning after Bob stormed off to work in a temper, my Aunt Sue dropped in. She's a trained nurse. I couldn't help blurting out the whole story to her. "My dear," she said, "when love goes on the rocks, it's often because a woman is careless—or ignorant—about feminine hygiene . . .

3. "It's one neglect," Aunt Sue went on, "that most husbands can't forgive. That's why so many modern wives use Lysol for intimate personal protection. Lysol solution isn't only cleansing and deodorizing—it kills millions of germs on instant contact, without harm to sensitive tissues. We nurses know."

4. Never again will I risk my happiness! I use Lysol regularly now for feminine hygiene. It's so gentle—and effective. Economical, too, because it's so diluted in use. P.S.: Bob and I are cooing like doves again.

6 Reasons for using LYSOL

NON-CAUSTIC—gentle and efficient in proper dilution. Contains no free alkali. It is not carbolic acid. EFFECTIVE—a powerful germicide, active in presence of organic matter (such as mucus, serum, etc.). SPREADING—Lysol solutions spread and virtually search out germs in deep crevices. ECONOMICAL—small bottle makes almost 4 gallons of feminine hygiene solution. CLEANLY ODOR—disappears after use. LASTING—Lysol keeps full strength indefinitely.

What A Wife Must Know To Safeguard Happiness

Safe New Way in Feminine Hygiene Gives Continuous Action for Hours

● It is all too true that ignorance of physical facts can wreck any wife's married happiness. Yet thousands of women, instead of informing themselves regarding feminine hygiene, either place their dependence on weak, ineffective "home-made" mixtures, or resort to over-strong solutions of acids which can burn, scar and desensitize delicate tissue.

Today such risks are needless. Informed women have turned to Zonitors—the safe, new way in feminine hygiene. These dainty, snow-white suppositories kill germs instantly at contact. Spread greaseless, protective coating. Deodorize—not by temporarily masking—but by destroying odors. Cleanse antiseptically and give continuous medication for hours.

Yet! Zonitors are safe for delicate tissues. Powerful—yet non-poisonous, non-caustic. Even help promote gentle healing. No apparatus; nothing to mix. At all druggists.

I HATE GRAY HAIR!

Of Course you do! You know tell-tale gray hair kills romance, that it can cause a hundred little heartbreaks, and yet for years you have hesitated to do anything about it! Has fear held you back—fear of dangerous dyes, fear that it is too difficult, that people will know your hair has been dyed?

These fears are so needless! Today you can buy at your drug or department store a hair coloring preparation called Mary T. Goldman's. Pronounced positively harmless by competent medical authorities (no skin test needed), and sold on a money-back guarantee, Mary T. Goldman's Hair Coloring Preparation will color your gray, bleached or faded hair to the desired shade so beautifully and so gradually your closest friends won't guess. It's inexpensive and easy to use—if you can comb your hair, you can't go wrong! Millions have used it with beautiful results for the last fifty years, proving its merit and safety.

So help yourself to happiness — today! Get a bottle of your shade of Mary T. Goldman's—insist on the original. Beware of substitutes—others have tried to imitate our product for years. For free sample, clip and mail coupon.

SUPERMAN'S KID BROTHER

"She just markets and fusses around. Sis helps around the house and heckles me."

He won't even phoney up a good exotic philosophy of life. His is disgustingly simple, and Nietzsche and Schopenhauer had no hand in it. "It just came to me one night," he tells you, lighting the inevitable cigarette, looking years too young to be touching the stuff. "I firmly believe that you get just about what you give in this world," and here's what makes him think so.

The night before his track team (he was quarter-miler and pole-vaulter) was to meet mortal rivals, the red-headed dream-girl on whom he was stuck—and who turned out to be a small-scale Mata Hari—gave a party. Bob was invited, and so were several lads from the rival school. Well, it was all very jolly, and redhead was never more charming. All Bob's resolves to hit the hay at an early hour were forgotten to the huge glee of the visiting firemen who'd arranged the party for the express purpose of keeping Rival Bob up all night—thinking, of course, to bench him for the meet.

Came the boomerang! Bob woke the next morning not even slightly tired. Feeling, moreover, like Superman on one of his good days. He discusses the incredible business dazedly. "Gosh, was I something! Ran the quarter mile in two seconds better time than I'd ever made before, and high jumped three and a half inches higher." He grins. "Those chaps thought they had me in camphor balls the night before, but they really slipped me Jesse Owens' legs for a couple of hours." He's serious again. "See what I mean about getting what you give? There were those fellows dishing out a shady deal and losing a meet they should have won. Gee, the late hours must have agreed with me—if I'd been in my usual form I wouldn't have had a chance."

His ideas on the ideal woman are less homespun, but just as sound. And when he talks about her, you know he's thought about the gal a lot . . . isn't just making her up as he goes along. "Mrs. S. is going to love the outdoor and dogs and boats. She's going to dance well, talk well and laugh a lot. She'll insist on steak seven nights a week. She won't be a gold-digger. She'll never whine, and she'll be beautiful in a scrubbed, shiny way. Yeah, and I'll find her, too." If it were two other guys talking you'd be inclined to give them the are-you-kiddin' routine. But it's Bob Sterling, so you shut up. He's been getting what he went after for years now.

First, that junior salesman job ("open to men between the ages of 18 and 20") when he was just 15. Then a wacky series of other jobs acquired God knows how. He'd had no experience in any of them. Soda jerker, singing waiter, credit manager in a tire store. And now, also without benefit of letters of introduction, he's a Hollywood star. Oh, he'll round up that wonder woman all right. You're hooked, wow frau!

It was while he was credit managing in the tire store that he began to dream about Hollywood and his name (it was William Hart then) in 1,000-watt lights. Coincidental with the dreaming binge came a three-week layoff without pay. Three weeks is a long time, seethed Bob. Boy, in just one week I could be out in Hollywood. In two weeks I'd be practically a millionaire. Three weeks—wow! Say, in three weeks I'll be opening at Radio City Music Hall. "S'long boys," he told his electrified co-workers. "See you in the movies."

And in a week he was in California. Then something went wrong. The week he should have started in pictures he was picking oranges at fifteen cents an hour. Subsequent weeks found him patrolling a citrus grove, driving a taxi and eating infrequently. The way he tells it—"I didn't actually miss any meals, but I sure postponed a couple." He spent every quarter he could come by on the third-run movie houses and read dozens of plays at the public library. After six months of it he went to Columbia Studios, told them their search for the lead in Clifford Odets' "Golden Boy" was over.

But his friend Bill Holden had more stage experience and got the job.

Bob was taken on at Columbia for stock work, but was given about as much to do as a WPA worker and at approximately the same salary. Incensed, he got himself an agent (by the simple process of throwing a dart at the agent section of the phone book) whom he put to work getting him a new job. Twentieth Century-Fox next took him on, gave him a part in a remake of "Bad Girl," allowed him to vegetate for weeks. When option time came around and the studio had renewed it, Bob told his agent he would rather not stay there.

"That same night," Bob stated, "I went to a meeting of executive assistants with one of my pals and dropped a hint that I might be leaving Fox. The next morning my agent called. There'd been calls

I SAW IT HAPPEN

A friend of mine took Linda Darnell out on one of her first dates, here in Dallas, at a time when she didn't go out much with boys. They went to a show, and when they came home my friend kissed her goodnight. He said she sure couldn't kiss then like she does now on the screen. He and I both think Hollywood girls sure must have a system all their own on the art of kissing. They should give Dallas girls some lessons on the art of kissing. We boys sure would appreciate it.

from three studios! Luckily, I picked M-G-M and here I am."

Yes, the 175-pound Sterling has definitely arrived, and at last he has time to catch up on his living. Time for sports and books and friends. "And hallelujah," he yells, "time to sing in the shower!" That's his vice. (In school they dubbed him Bing. Also "Two-Gun" on account of his name being William Hart. Also "Spike" because of his length. He's six feet one-and-a-half.) The Hit Parade practically in toto every day of his life! Lately the family has banished him to a bachelor suite on the top floor where he plays classical and jive records at all hours and rehearses noisily and interminably in front of mirrors.

He spends his afternoons of leisure on the golf course. Goes around in the 70's, and pros for miles and miles envy his beautiful swing. For violent exercise he boxes, but is admittedly no Joe Louis threat. Is so mad about watching the sport he averages three or four fight cards a week—hence the realistic technique in "Ringside Maisie."

top o' the world . . .

Now that he's able to read more than plays and want-ads, he concentrates on news weeklies, the Saturday Evening Post and current novels.

"The swellest part of the whole new regime," he'll tell you, "is having time for a few old-time friends." There's bowling with his ex-roommate, talent scout Henry Wilson, till the wee hours; shop talk with new star Craig Stevens; beautiful brawls at the Bob Taylors'; dinners at "Butch" Romero's new bachelor home, and discreet luncheons with Ann Sothern.

He is a major mystery man in Hollywood in the matter of women. He has few dates, but is highly popular as a dancer and a conversationalist. He is liked enormously for his frankness, his sincerity and his amazing logic. He is invited to almost every Hollywood party of importance and was one of the guests at the Robert Taylor-Barbara Stanwyck New Year's party, Hollywood's top social event. The affaire Sothern started when they co-starred in "Ringside Maisie," and Ann was such a saint about teaching him little tricks of the trade. At Christmas time, Bob gave her a gold cigarette case with an inscription in it that no one but Ann's ever seen. Neither of them will divulge a word of it, and Bob gets positively dramatic when quizzed about it. While we're mentally tussling with the riddle of the cigarette case, he's off on the subject of clothes.

He never succumbed for a second to Hollywood's famous "sharp stuff"—the sunburst tie, mauve slacks and pointed shoes which are practically a uniform out there. He sticks to dark suits, except in spring or summer. Hates striped, plaid or checked suits, but can stand not-too-loud Scotch plaid socks. His sole concession to flash is a camel's hair sports coat and the midnight-blue suede strap on his square gold watch. He heard the other day that he'd been voted one of the three best-dressed men at Metro. "On account of my conservatism," he explains proudly. "How about that with all that stiff competition!" He's not smug about it. Just thrilled. The way he's thrilled about having made a picture with Garbo, and having Spencer Tracy "hi, kid" him. The way he was thrilled when he got his first fan letter. And the way he's thrilled and awed and a little humble about his new life.

Frankly, he's kind of stuck on Hollywood—and it, confidentially, is more than a little out of this world about him!

TO THE SHORES OF TRIPOLI

Hollywood has landed on the Marines and there's quite a situation. Not that it's very novel or particularly original; this situation has done yeoman work for the Army and Navy in the past as well as its full share of civilian duty. It has more service stripes than a leather-faced top sergeant.

John Payne (Chris Winters), arrogant, supercilious but able son of Minor Watson (Captain Chris Winters) reports to Marine Base at San Diego as a recruit under his father's old war pal, Sgt. Dixie Smith (Randolph Scott). Dixie tries to whip Chris into a Marine, but Chris goes his own sweet way with everybody hating his guts.

Except the women, of course.

There are two of them: Mary Carter (Maureen O'Hara) and Helene Hunt (Nancy Kelly). Mary's a nurse and the light of Chris' eye at the Marine Base. Helene is a beauty out of Chris' past, who knows Admirals and such and wants to get Chris a desk job in Washington, marry him and spend all her time with fascinating diplomats and suave spies.

Things blow up nicely when Dixie loses his Sgt. rating taking a rap for Chris. Mary Carter turns her attractive back on Chris; his mess mates give him the silent treatment. And Chris is ready to take up Helene and Washington. But maneuvers are announced just then and off Chris goes.

There's a climax with Dixie stranded on a target boat. Chris risks life and limb, takes a launch through the shell fire, rescues Dixie and is the hero of the hour. But Chris is still bitter; he's still going to Washington. Helene, here we come.

At the last moment he sees his company marking off to transports for Iceland. That's too much for Chris. He ducks Helene, forgets about the desk job and goes off with the Marines. And on the boat, with enough warmth in her eyes to melt Iceland's keenest blasts, is Mary Carter.

There's nothing much wrong with "To The Shores of Tripoli"; it's standard, fairly slick, funny perhaps, with a quota of Marine scenes in it to make it authentic. Maybe that's all you can ask. No doubt the Marines have an eye for a well-turned ankle; but these days it's more likely that their eyes are turned to Wake Island and a couple of other places.

Hollywood, please note.—T.C.F.

P. S.

Maureen O'Hara discovered more men staring at her legs when she wore white cotton stockings, than when she donned sheer silk hose . . . Nancy Kelly, Maureen's rival for John Payne's affections in the film, persuaded the O'Hara to make a bet with her and see which gal could make John spend the most time with her between scenes. Director "Lucky" Humberstone heard about it, settled it pronto by ordering Payne to stay in his dressing room and study dialogue . . . Basil Walker, after playing a Marine for six weeks, signed up with Uncle Sam's Navy . . . Members of the technical crew were trapped in the islands December seventh . . . Photographers with the group filmed some of the ensuing Pacific naval action and turned the results over to the government . . . In one of the last scenes, Payne jumps into a marching regiment of Marines and starts changing his civilian clothes for his uniform. The action was filmed near the studio's business offices, and the windows were crowded with stenographers, watching to see how many takes Payne needed to effect a perfect shirt-and-trouser transfer . . . Randolph Scott has appeared in so many military roles, the part of Sergeant Dixie Smith was a breeze. In the drill scenes of the film, he led real Marines through real maneuvers, earned their respect by doing it perfectly . . . Three technical experts were on hand to check the work of Frank Orth. Orth plays a Marine Corps barber who cuts Payne's hair down to the bone, as per regulations . . . Maxie Rosenbloom accidentally landed a couple of blows on Edmund MacDonald while demonstrating his Sunday punches for the Marines at San Diego . . . He was so thrilled and excited, he immediately challenged Joe Louis—for the 22nd time.

EAGLE SQUADRON

It's no longer news, of course, that in the days before Pearl Harbor a group of Americans flew with the RAF. Some of them came out of conviction, some for the ride, some for adventure, a few for pay; but whatever their reasons they were in the air in their Hurricanes and Spitfires at a time when England desperately needed trained pilots. The Eagle Squadron is already history and part legend; in this picture the camera rides the sky with its pilots.

Even an air picture has to be earthbound at times for reasons of plot. After all, there is always a girl, there is always love, and no one will begrudge the script the time needed to cover these essentials. "Eagle Squadron" fills these spaces with a sturdy story.

to England and joins the Eagle Squadron not so much out of conviction as merely to be along with Johnny. On their first sweep over France Johnny is shot down, and Chuck is bewildered and embittered by the unemotional response of the other pilots. He can't understand that their casual acceptance of death is the only way they can preserve sanity in a service that may see their brothers, best friends or even themselves, shot down in flames each time they take to the air.

It takes the love of a girl, Anne Partridge (Diana Barrymore), to show him that English reserve doesn't mean coldness. Their love story is told amid raids, blitz and war duty among familiar English scenes and some not so familiar. And it's carefully done to show as much of England's war work as possible; their love story takes them to air-raided London, out with England's refuge children, to the danger zones of Dover, to air fields and smoky bistros.

"Eagle Squadron" is by no means merely the story of these two. There are a host of interesting characters spotted throughout. Nigel Bruce, John Loder, Jon Hall, Edgar Barrier and Eddie Albert all have parts of consequence. It's the story of a whole group, well handled and with building suspense.

Not the least interesting feature is the sense it gives of the many jobs women are doing today in England. There's a girl, for instance, who ferries planes to outlying airfields; there are women in important jobs in communications keeping radio contact with pilots, plotting the course of air raids over England; women in the WAAF and women driving trucks in the Transport Service. The women of England are doing the job.

But the big story of "Eagle Squadron" is in the streamlined noses of the planes they fly and the details of life among the pilots. For good measure the picture ends with a Commando raid on an airfield in occupied France; the raid, to top it all, ends with an air fight over the Channel. "Eagle Squadron" doesn't skimp on any of these essentials.

Better than any other medium, the movies have been able to catch the poetry, excitement and reality of flight. Let a camera follow an airplane off the ground, and the screen itself seems to become as wide as the sky. Once in the skies, an air picture, almost by definition, is tense, exciting and satisfying.—Univ.

P. S.

The foreword by Quentin Reynolds cost Universal $7500. Quentin says he would have done it for nothing, if they'd asked him. He broke down in the middle of his script when he caught sight of young Gene Tobin pictured in the English footage that ran with his commentary. Gene was the young boy Reynolds was going to adopt, if the lad hadn't been killed on his 21st birthday . . . Altogether, 12,000 feet of English film was used . . . This is the third picture in which Bob Stack plays a pilot. He was a Nazi flyer in "Mortal Storm" and a Polish aviator in "To Be or Not To Be" . . . Jill Esmond, who plays Diana Barrymore's friend, is the former Mrs. Laurence Olivier . . . During production, Director Arthur Lubin bought a station wagon and joined Lewis Stone's Ambulance Corps . . . John Loder, signed to play an identical Squadron Leader role in a picture with Errol Flynn, obtained his release so he

HOW THEY SPEND THEIR MONEY

Her philosophy of spending is roughly as follows. If she sees something she likes and wants, she buys it. She won't haggle or go round looking for little shops where she might get it cheaper. On the other hand, she doesn't go in for extravagances in daily living—has no secretary, for instance. Her mother would be glad to take that work off her hands, but she gets a kick out of doing it for herself.

Also she hates to be taken advantage of and cited a man she knew who totes up every item on a restaurant bill. He's willing to pay thirty dollars for a cup of coffee if that's what a cup of coffee's worth, but he won't play the sucker and be overcharged and smile. That's Betty.

She's not terribly clothes-minded. If she were Jo Blow, she thinks she'd wear slacks and be done with it. But a movie star who's not well-dressed harms herself. So she feels it's not smart to economize on wardrobe.

She never says, "I need a new dress, I'll go shopping," but buys what she happens to see and like. Only her suits and evening gowns are made to order, and only on those does she spend much money. Three hundred is par for an evening gown, and she buys them mostly for New York where you have to dress. She and George both hate getting togged out, and she owns dresses she's never worn in Hollywood.

She likes herself best in suits, has them made by a men's tailor and pays between a hundred fifty and a hundred seventy-five. But they wear and wear and never go out of style. She's got four- and five-year-old suits in her closet which she still uses. Hats and gloves cost nothing, she won't wear them. She hasn't bought stockings in years, George just gave her four dozen. Like Anne Gwynne she's extravagant about shoes, can't resist them, pays about fifteen dollars and soothes her conscience by remembering that her sister wears the same size and can step right into them. She indulges herself in the luxury of handmade chiffon panties, embroidered with Betty, but saves on bras and girdles. Her figure needs neither.

In addition to the gardener, who comes three times weekly for twenty a month, she normally employs a cook and houseman, married, and pays them a hundred-seventy-five. Right now, she has no one, and thereby hangs a tragedy. One evening, just before her trip East, the family went out. Returning, Betty found her staff on a spree, and Clinker, the beguiling poodle George gave her for Christmas, limp on the road, crushed to death by a car. She could find no words for her woe, but plenty for her wrath. The servants were dismissed. With Betty and Mrs. Grable leaving, her sister refused to have others engaged till they got back.

Weekly shampoos and manicures, plus tips, come to about thirty a month. Betty used to do her own nails, but they kept on breaking. She can apply polish like mad though, and does, sometimes even at the beauty parlor if the girls are busy. No permanents—her hair has a natural curl—no facials, and she plucks her own eyebrows. Occasionally she'll treat herself to a pedicure for the logical reason that she thinks feet are horrible. Ask her why, and she shrugs. "They're just not very pretty, that's all." But toenails painted to match the fingernails takes the curse off—a little.

George gives her perfume. She uses one bottle till it's finished, then fills it with tea and puts it back on her dresser, because the bottles are too pretty to throw away. A pushover for lipsticks and angora socks, she had a lovely time the other day buying five of each at a buck apiece. Why she's so crazy about lipsticks she doesn't know, except that when she uses a fresh one, it makes her feel good.

Change from a dollar always goes into defense stamps for Peter. Of his Christmas gifts, a train and what he calls his "defense bomb book" thrilled him most. Only on horses has she ever thrown money away. George gave her two, both crawlers. Knowing they can't win, she still bets on them so their feelings won't be hurt. For their sake and hers, she's glad the races were cancelled this year.

Books and magazines cost about twenty a month. She can't go to sleep without reading. Some books she buys, others she borrows from a lending library. Passing an anti-aircraft station setup near her home not long ago, she caught a glimpse of the kids reading tattered newspapers. Now all her magazines and some of her books go to the kids. So does the weekly carton, sent her by Chesterfield. She's a cigarette-moocher, not as a measure of economy, but because her own vanish. George smokes Luckies—maybe a pack a week—but keeps a special mooching pack of Chesterfields in his pocket for Betty. He wouldn't have to, she says. For free, she'd smoke anything.

Her toughest job is finding ways to spend money on George, who's a more accomplished giver than taker. In Miami, where she went for the premiere of "Song of the Island," she hunted high and low till she dug up the kind of lovely Swiss handkerchiefs which are getting scarce now. She's having them initialled and thinks George will be pleased. His pet things are handkerchiefs.

For Christmas she gave him a cat's-eye ring. She didn't expect him to discard his favorite star ruby and knew he wouldn't wear two. "I happen to like cat's-eye," she said. "Just wear mine once in a while."

Which does he wear all the time, students? Cat's-eye is right.

Anne Gwynne

Ann thinks if she kept a budget, she could probably cut the corners a little closer. But first, she's too lazy and besides, the Scotch in her acts as a monitor. She used to be more Scotch, she says, but has loosened up since she's got more money to spend. As don't we all?

Her ace-in-the-hole is papa, who pays the rent. He spends about six months in Hollywood, six in New York on business. He hates restaurants, so when he's at home, Mrs. Gwynne does the cooking. Otherwise, because of the irregularity of Anne's hours, she and her mother eat at small places near the apartment. Dinners average between seventy-five cents and a dollar. Only on special occasions like birthdays, do they fly as high as two or two and a half. Anne notes, with a tinge of regret, that she gets more two-fifty meals than her mother, on account of Saturday and Sunday dates. She'd rather not say whom she's dating at the moment, since she's off and on so much that it might be somebody else by the time this sees print. Not that she's fickle, just likes new interests. "No doubt they get tired of me, too," says Anne.

Monthly payments on her car come to forty-one-eighty. After wistfully eyeing a Cadillac, she compromised on a Chevrolet convertible and satisfied her yearning for dash by getting yellow. Seeing a neat primrose job headed for Universal, people say, "There goes Anne." She gets what she calls a juvenile kick out of that.

Gas and oil used to be twenty-five a month. Mrs. Gwynne loves to drive, and every Sunday Anne would take her over the hills and far away to Palm Springs or such. Now, like good citizens, they stay home or travel by train and use the car strictly for business, which cuts bills more than half.

Last month Anne bought a ten-dollar pair of slacks, and that's all in the wardrobe line, but guesses her clothes average about fifty a month. She describes herself as the medium type, between tailored and fluffy, depending on her mood. If she doesn't happen to have what she's moody about, she wears what she's got.

Shoes are her passion, and hats her hate. She pays between ten and twelve for one, as little as possible for the other. By choice she'd go bareheaded all the time, but this annoys Daddy who with true paternal exaggeration says: "Once in my life I'd like to see you in a hat." Anyway, you've got to have an occasional hat for cocktail parties or when you go out at night. Her mother picks them because she's got better taste than her daughter, says Anne. What with birthdays and Christmas, she doesn't remember when she's spent money on stockings.

Phone, including long distance and wires—ten dollars. Utilities and the laundering of household linen are covered by rent. Anne does her own stockings and underwear by her own method, she doesn't like other people fooling with them. Cleaning's an item—twenty a month when she's working. The grease of make-up stains the slacks and blouses you wear to the studio, but you've got to look fresh and can't economize on cleaning.

They don't entertain much. Mrs. Gwynne doesn't like to do things without Anne, and Anne has a busy schedule at Universal. Right now she's up to her ears in "Broadway" with George Raft. Occasionally they take people out to dinner—a two-fifty dinner. When friends drop in for bridge, they serve sandwiches, ice cream and cake. They don't drink, but bought a bottle of whiskey at New Year's—four-twenty-five—for eggnog to serve their guests.

Membership Guild, social security and old-age pension take thirty a month, income tax fifty. Last month Anne contributed twenty-five dollars to various charities. She'd planned to take out another annuity—her present premium is fifty a month—but buys a hundred-dollar defense bond each month instead.

Last month she had no time for movies or sports. Off a picture, she'll take her mother to the movies a couple of times weekly. She rides better than she plays tennis, swims better than either and loves all three. Riding costs her a dollar-fifty, tennis sixty cents, swimming fifty cents. She buys her mother perfume on birthdays and Easter and St. Valentine's, then uses her mother's.

About seven-fifty a month goes in tips. She thinks good service should be paid for and poor service shouldn't.

Once she planned to be a lawyer, and went to business school. What's left of that plan is a knowledge of shorthand and typing, so she rents a typewriter for three dollars to answer fan mail. Gum's responsible for an outlay of two-fifty a month, maybe, because she chews a stick just long enough to get the sweet out of it, but saves a nickel by buying three for a dime. When excited, she chews so furiously people howl at her to stop. She knows chewing's not ladylike, but she doesn't smoke or bite her nails, and a girl must do something.

Her ambition is to win the Academy Award some day. Her best friend is Mary Lou Cook of the Merry Macs. It took her two years to find a girl friend she could pour out her soul to. But Mary Lou, says Anne, was worth waiting for.

it might not have worked so fine, had their proportionate earning capacities been reversed. Ronnie's salary has at all times since their marriage equalled or exceeded Jane's.

Their agent picks up the checks, deducts his ten per cent commission, enters sixty per cent in their savings, forty per cent in their checking account. Half their savings are set aside for income tax. This year they expect to hand Uncle Sam, cheerfully, all of Jane's salary and part of Ronnie's in tax, then put the bulk of their surplus into defense bonds. Ten per cent goes to charity. Ronnie has a kind of feeling about tithes.

They've just built a seven-room house at a cost of fifteen thousand, and had it financed by FHA on a twenty-year loan, though this year's income tax would cover the cost of the house. Monthly payments, including taxes and interest, come to a hundred twenty-five. They've seen too many people build mansions, which are swell, says Ronnie, while you're making the dough, but comes the day when you're not, then what?

In building they allowed themselves two extravagances, and only two—an extra large living room, which they combined with the space most people reserve for a den—and two combination bathrooms and dressing rooms, where they can dress from nothing to an overcoat without bumping noses when they're both hustling out for an early studio call.

Monthly food bills for the household of five—papa, mama, baby, nurse and maid—average ninety dollars. Velma, their domestic jewel who believes in no waste, rules that department. They never know what's for dinner, except if it's roast tonight, you can bet five dollars it'll be stew tomorrow. When it comes to fowl, they're Mr. and Mrs. Jack Spratt. Ronnie can eat no white, his wife can eat no dark, so she takes the breast, and he takes the legs, and they wipe the platter clean.

Velma indulges their whims up to a point, doesn't make Ronnie eat the liver he loathes, but insists on cooking certain despised vegetables for Jane because they're good for her. Feeling abused but noble, she eats them. Velma and the nurse are paid average wages—what, the Reagans would rather not say.

Ronnie's '38 LaSalle and Jane's '41 Cadillac take about thirty dollars in gas and oil. They take no trips, both because of tire rationing, and because it's too tough to find time when they're both off. Anyway, they'd rather stay with Maureen.

Last month, being close to Christmas, they bought no clothes. Jane furnishes her own shoes and hose in pictures. She doesn't budget her wardrobe, just keeps it, like everything else, within checking account limits. Maybe she'll come home and rave about a dress. "Can we afford it, Ronnie?"

"Better wait till next month," says the lord and master. Or: "Go ahead. We've got some money in the bank."

Ronnie maintains a wardrobe of from eight to ten suits at about a hundred per, which calls for, say, two replacements a year and is considered skimpy for a movie star. In a modern-clothes picture, you may have to make fourteen changes. But watch Ronnie closely, and you'll see him step blithely into Scene 16, garbed as he was in Scene 3 but pretending he isn't. When you've worn the same suit in too many pictures, you get a broad hint, which means that somebody's in for a present of clothes. Ronnie can't wear his out off-screen, being a strictly slacks-and-sports-coat guy. To the non-professional Reagan, a suit's something you're occasionally dragged into.

Utilities—twenty-five. This would be less, except that Jane always leaves lights on. It would be more, except that Ronnie trails her and turns them off. Laundry and cleaning—thirty-five. Ronnie will be relieved when they get their Bendix, and the baby's laundry can be done at home. Not that he begrudges his daughter her cleanliness, but only by gritting his teeth can he bring himself to sit down and write out a check to something called the Dainty Dy-dee Baby Laundry, Inc.

Maureen's not an expensive child. The house is so cluttered with dolls and toys, contributed by kind friends, that her parents can hardly kick their way through. She gets the usual baby shots but, since they're administered by the family doctor who doesn't soak the Reagans for being movie players, they cost the usual five dollars per shot. Jane and Ronnie are healthy. Their medical expense is confined to seeing the dentist twice a year and paying him five bucks to clean their teeth.

Each gets an allowance of twenty-five a week, which goes for such items as lunch, movies, golf balls, caddy fees, riding, swimming, cigarettes, magazines, parking, tipping. Ronnie goes overboard on pipes. He hoards paper clips from advertising matter and the rubber bands 'round the morning paper. Jane has no small economies. Small china things in antique shops are her ruin. A couple of weeks ago, she invested ten dollars of her allowance in defense stamps for Maureen. That made her feel so angelic, that the next week she squandered fifteen in an antique shop and had to borrow lunch money from her husband.

P.S.—He made her pay it back.

SPEAK OUT FOR BEAUTY

as frequently about women's voices as they do about their faces or figures. They warn us against the "subway voice," which sounds as though the speaker is trying always to shout down the roar of the trains. A periodic housecleaning to discard outmoded overly used words and phrases has been suggested. Words like "cute," "divine" and "definitely" are all right in their place, but, as the men folks say, their place is not in every sentence.

A vocal mirror, it seems, would give most people quite a shock. If you are not voice conscious, it would be a good idea to check up on your sound effects. You can do this by cupping your ears with your hands and standing a foot away from a flat wooden surface. Listen for harsh or flat sounds and for others that may be too loud, rasping, monotonous, whiny, sing-song or squeaking. Once you are aware of your defects, you have a start on voice beauty. Notice particularly how you pronounce "t" and "d." They should be distinctly controlled sounds. Then, look in the mirror to notice whether or not you open your lips when you talk. If you do, it is an indication of careful enunciation which, even to a deaf person, is more valuable than shouting.

When you go about correcting the faults you may find in your own voice, the first step is to gain breath control. Both speech and singing are produced by the physical act of exhaling. Good posture and diaphragm control and the position of your mouth and tongue help maintain an easy flow of breath, while lack of breath control makes everyday speech sound sloppy and creates hard, nasal tones. You can also help yourself to a beautiful voice by keeping your lower jaw relaxed. Never press your teeth tightly together nor hold your tongue stiffly against the roof of your mouth. Only relaxation can produce a mellow voice. For constantly beautiful speech, try always to be as voice conscious as you are over the telephone. Almost everyone is particularly careful with her voice when using the telephone, probably because one depends entirely upon speech for a good impression upon another person. So we would like to suggest that you speak at all times as though on your voice alone depended a good impression. It does.

Another beauty spot that can enhance or sabotage your smile is your chin line. The firm youthful contours of your chin, throat and underchin will benefit by simple nightly treatment. After cleansing, apply cream to your throat and underchin. Massage upward over neck muscles, beginning low on your chest and working toward your jawline. Repeat for 5 minutes with firm even strokes, then remove the cream with a cleansing tissue moistened with skin freshener. A profile view of your chin and jawline daily will remind you to keep them in shape. Exercise, too, will strengthen and firm neck muscles. The pleasantest "drill," of course, is chewing gum, so you can work on that chinline even at the ball game. "Star gazing" is also an excellent exercise. Clasp hands at the back of your neck to hold your head down, bringing your face gradually upward to look at the sky. You will feel your whole back straightening. Bring your head back as far as possible before letting it drop forward again. Repeat 10 times at first and increase as you progress. Equally good is the following routine. Swing your head slowly around in a complete circle, first down in front, to the right, then back and to the left shoulder. Describe these circles 5 times each way, right to left first, then reverse. Poor posture is as often the cause of double chins and flabby necklines as age or fat, so resolve with a will to sit straight and to hold your head up. Forsake the luxury of a very fat pillow, too, if you want a youthful chinline.

All this sets the stage for a beautiful mouth and a bewitching smile. So don't spoil the picture with those annoying little mouth mannerisms that lose friends and discourage suitors. Don't be guilty of twitching lips, pursing your mouth or talking to yourself. Such habits betray nervousness and cause it in others. Constantly biting your lips or your nails has the same effect, and it certainly doesn't improve their appearance. Chewing gum is always good exercise for your mouth and chin muscles, but it is good manners only when you chew with your lips closed. Watch the direction of your cough and always carry a hanky to catch a stray sneeze. No one, not even the most enamored admirer, appreciates your lip print on his shirt front; and a smear of red on cups, glasses or napkins makes an unpleasant impression, particularly on your hostess. So blot your lips with cleansing tissue an extra time after making up your lips.

Worse than to have a less than perfect smile is to be known as the girl with a perpetual frown, so perk up and have a gay look. Then see that your teeth, lips, voice, chinline and mannerisms are top-flight. With so much in favor of the happy countenance, you are in no danger of being called a gloomy glum if you give yourself the assurance of a happy smile you will want ever on display.

Remember, a friendly, confident smile attracts more beaux and wins friends, so keep your teeth bright and free of unattractive smudges. Iodent Tooth Paste will aid your tooth brush in keeping your teeth radiant, and it gently but firmly removes accumulations and smoke smudges. If your teeth are easy to brighten, Iodent No. 1 is best for you. If you have stubborn smudges or stains, try Iodent No. 2. Whichever you choose, you'll like the refreshed feeling that Iodent Tooth Paste gives your mouth.

HOLD THAT SMILE

bristles are firm and stiff, generally about two months. The minute one of yours becomes worn or soft, replace it at once.

No matter how carefully you brush your teeth, there are always small spaces between them that even the best-designed brush can't reach, so follow up with dental floss. Pull it gently down between your teeth, taking care not to jerk it and cut your gums. Draw it back and forth carefully until all food particles, etc., are dislodged. This is an important "must" for you girls whose teeth are spaced very close together.

If with all this scouring and polishing, your teeth don't become a sparkling white, don't be discouraged. Nobody's really are. Natural shades vary from pale ivory to cream and some have pink, blue or gray undertones. Teeth only seem to be white in contrast to deeper skin coloring and vivid shades of lipstick.

Your smile may be a honey, but it won't win the admiration it deserves unless your breath is always fresh and fragrant, too. Unpleasant breath springs from so many causes—improperly chewed or volatile food, indigestion, irritated gums, colds, etc.,—that no one, no matter how fastidious, is entirely immune to this social hazard unless extra precautions are taken. Brushing your teeth regularly after every meal will remove food particles that may become odorous, but be sure to use also a good mouth wash after every meal and before you retire at night. Swish it around in your mouth a minute or so until the inside feels clean and invigorated. Another good way to ward off offensive breath is to clean your tongue whenever you brush your teeth. Your tooth brush or a special rubber brush will do the job effectively, or you can use a piece of gauze moistened with mouth wash. Chewing gum during the day is also good insurance for a fragrant breath.

You hear a lot these days about stimulating and massaging gums for healthy bright teeth, and here's why it's necessary. In olden times, people ate coarse, harsh foods which gave gums the invigoration and exercise they needed to keep them hard and strong enough to hold teeth firm. However, in these days of highly refined, easy-to-chew foods, gums are apt to become soft and sluggish, and they require supplementary exercise. To give yours the workout they need, massage your gums with your brush whenever you clean your teeth. And before retiring at night, massage your dentifrice into your gums, using a special finger gadget or your finger wrapped in sterilized gauze. Chewing gum and eating crisp, crunchy foods, such as toast, cabbage, carrots and the like, are also grand stimulaters and toners.

Incidentally, I wonder if you realize how important the kind of food you eat is to the health and beauty of your teeth. Your dentist doesn't need psychic powers to tell you when you haven't been drinking your quota of fruit juices and milk. The evidence lies in the condition of your mouth and teeth. To have teeth that do you proud, now and when you are an old lady, you need to eat three well-balanced meals daily which include plenty of fresh fruits and vegetables. And do drink some milk every day. Milk, particularly, is an excellent source of vitamin D, also calcium and phosphorus—all essential for healthy teeth and firm gums.

Are you ever bothered by gums that are sore, puffy and bleeding? If so, you'd better check up on your habits. The condition may be due to careless cleansing, lack of stimulation or dietary deficiency. Whatever the cause, look to your mouth hygiene and personal health, and hie yourself to a dentist for medication and treatment. One of the best things you yourself can do to stimulate your gums and give them a healthy red color instead of an unattractive white cast, is to brush them when you brush your teeth, lightly at first, more vigorously when they are used to it.

When mother was a girl, a crooked or badly spaced set of teeth was a cross to bear with patience and resignment, but not so any more. These days every girl has an equal chance for an engaging smile, for modern orthodontia (tooth straightening) can realign crooked teeth and "cap" broken or jagged ones so they look as attractive as naturally perfect ones. Even if you are out of your teens, the job can be performed successfully, and it's a good idea to have it done not only for beauty's sake, but for your health. Irregular teeth spoil your "bite" and make for incomplete chewing and poor digestion.

Of course, there is some trouble and expense involved, so if you are still in the formative years (under twenty), watch your habits. Protruding and badly spaced teeth have been traced to sleeping on your hand every night, resting your chin continuously on your hand while you work, breathing through your mouth, etc. And, of course, such habits as chewing pencils, snipping threads with teeth never did any teeth—even grown-up ones—any good, but we don't need to caution fastidious girls about that.

A friendly smile, backed by two rows of sound, radiant teeth is an invitation to friendship and happiness. Give your teeth the everyday care they need and you'll hold that winning smile through the years.

THE MARRIAGE THAT COULDN'T HAPPEN

an old stage trick to try to break up another actor."

He went on to tell about the night the blond juvenile appeared in the wings wearing a coal-black mustache. Then there was the case of the chap with rare muscular control who could hold one eye dead ahead while the other revolved in its socket in a small, unhappy circle. This sub rosa stunt was calculated to break up the most seasoned trouper.

Ann asked what had come before those days on the New York stage, so George went back to the Irish period. One has to hear George actually story-telling to appreciate the extent of his vocabulary and the talent he has for turning a phrase. The timbre of his voice, too, lends music to his words.

He told about the grim old castles and the thatched cottages. He told about gnomes who live in Irish dells and about the banshee that wails before a man dies. He told, modestly, about his own escape through strange, forbidding streets; about hiding in doorways, his heart beating loud enough to make his eardrums pop, while a bobby walked by; about being so enamoured of adventure that he didn't realize his danger.

When Ann told him good night at the door, she extended her hand. "Brent," she said, "you're okay."

"Red," said Brent, "the same to you."

Several days later, George met Ann on the lot. "Will you have dinner with me tonight?" he asked.

"Could be," grinned Ann.

"You name the place, Tex."

"Okay. La Bomba."

At that, George executed what Ann calls "his triple-take." His eyes pop wide, his shoulders go up and his neck thrusts out. It's one of the funniest gestures on earth, and George uses it to indicate excessive surprise.

"I beg pardon. Where did you say?"

So Ann explained. La Bomba was a small but colorful night club down near Olvera Street and the old Plaza. The food was excellent, although peppery; the music was strictly maracha.

Mr. Brent, who is good at pantomime, put on an imaginary sombrero and adjusted an invisible serape. "La Bomba," he said, "here we come. Muy bien."

They danced the conga and the rumba, say nothing of now and then a tango. By way of approval Ann told George that he had a pair of educated zapatos (shoes). And she called him Jorge (pronounced Horrhee, the Spanish verson of George).

When they returned to their table, an ambitious young man came over and said with great sincerity, "Could I have the next dance, Miss Sheridan? How about a whirl?" He pronounced it "whoil."

This same thing had happened before, so Ann had a pre-fabricated answer. "No, thank you. I dance only with my escort."

whoil goil . . .

The presumptuous lad didn't get his dance, but he had supplied George and Ann with a permanent catch phrase. From that day on, George has never asked Ann to "dance." He teasingly says, "How about a whoil?" When he thinks it is time to leave a party, he invariably asks her, "Shall we whoil, Tex?"

One week-end, George was entertaining a party of friends on his boat, so he asked Ann to ride down with him. On the way to the harbor, they became two tiny stars in a vast milky way of traffic. The car inched along as George was unable to fight his way to the outside lane which was moving slightly faster. Someone recognized the double prides of Warners Brothers. "Yoo-hoo, George!" someone called. "Hello, Annie!"

That was taken up. As car after car passed there was whistling, shouting, demands for autographs from the holiday crowds.

George's neck reddened; Ann's forehead glowed. They were two horribly embarrassed people, unable to pass off the situation or to escape from it. For twenty miles they endured all kinds of good-natured, but painful ribbing from the lordly public, then George turned into a side road, took a short-cut and scorched the rest of the way to the harbor.

As he helped Ann out of the car, George shook his head ruefully. "Sorry to have subjected you to that, Red," he apologized.

It had begun to be funny to Ann. "Gee," she teased, "ain't fame grand?"

At which point, George confessed later, he fully realized what he had been suspecting for a long time: here was a girl who was a 24-carat good scout. Here was a girl who was beautiful and sincere, unspoiled, level-headed and "aware that Hollywood is a business, but not a life. This town does things to people, but I was certain, then, that it would never change Ann."

High praise, indeed, from a man who rates all artificiality lower than a rat race.

That was a year of high adventure—that year of getting thoroughly acquainted. Ann learned about George's three great loves: dogs, boats and Hawaii. He will talk about dogs for hours with any other dog lover. Beg pardon, he will not talk—he will argue. He has studied every breed listed, and his memory is phenomenal. He makes it a point to plague one director by engaging him in long discussions of the relative merits of the Doberman Pinscher versus the German Shepherd; or the Sealyham as opposed to the Scottie. No matter what breed the director recommends, George knows a succession of reasons why that particular dog is at fault. All of this discussion is done deadpan, of course, so the director still doesn't know that George is ribbing him.

However, when it comes to a gift dog for a lady, George considers only one animal worthy: he gave Ann a French poodle. At another time he added a South American kinkajou to the menagerie, and a large cat simply attached itself to the group and promptly had kittens. When Ann and George had dinner together or went for long drives along the beach, she told him about the honey bear's attempts to make friends with Mrs. Cat and the thorough boxing he got.

They talked boats, too. George's first boat had been sold to Jack Warner, and his second was the apple of his eye. For his birthday, Ann gave him perfect scale models of both boats. It was one of those thoughtful, planned-for gifts for which Ann is famous.

"Those models," George told friends, "are my favorite gifts of all time." Delicate, intricate and lovely as the models were, when George looked at them he saw more than the workmanship. They

Do's and Don'ts about Tampons

Don't be old-fashioned

A few years ago, the very thought of tampons was startling—today millions of women know they make sense. Every month, more and more women discover the wonderful freedom of internal sanitary protection. So don't be timid—but do be wise! Choose a tampon that's right for you.

Do get a tampon that fits!

Meds, the Modess tampons, are scientifically correct. They were designed by a leading woman's doctor—after years of scientific experimenting with all kinds of tampons. Comfortable? You're as free as any other day! No pins. No odors. No bulges. Easier to use, too. Each Meds comes in a one-time-use applicator that ends old difficulties.

Do be sure of real protection!

Protection depends on how fast, how much a tampon absorbs. Meds absorb faster because of the "safety center." No other tampon has it! Meds are made of the finest, pure cotton—they hold more than 300% of their weight in moisture.

Don't pay more!

You don't have to now! Meds cost less than any other tampons in individual applicators. No more than leading sanitary napkins. Try Meds! Compare! You'll be glad you did!

were symbols of Ann's thoughtfulness, of her desire to give him something he could cherish. In Hollywood, the amount of planning that goes into a gift is the measure of its value, because high Hollywood salaries make price an inconsiderable factor.

With parties of friends, Ann and George spent frequent week-ends on the boat, building up memories of moon-flooded decks and the sight of feathery wake spreading out over the dark sea to make the boat look like some gigantic bird in flight.

Frequently George talked about Hawaii—his Shangri-la. He had been in the Islands three times, had bought a ranch on the island of Hawaii (the largest of the group) and was planning to enter the "South Wind" in the summer races to Honolulu.

George told an eager listener about the customs of Hawaii and recited some of the legends. He told her about June 11th, which is Kamehameha Day when all Hawaiians parade in their priceless red and yellow feather capes. He told her about the Pali, a cliff from which the wind tore the last of Kamehameha's enemies after his army had driven them to the promontory. He taught her some Hawaiian words: "Don't give me that hoomali-mali." (Flattery) "What I need is kau-kau." (Food) "Mahalo," thank you; "Ipo," sweetheart; "Keoki," George. To this day, Ann frequently calls her husband "Keoki."

He told her the story of a certain mountain tribe in the Islands, who believe that it is sinful to eat any animal product. They refuse to touch eggs or milk. The missionaries found that the growing children were in desperate need of a calcium food, so they supplied the Polynesians with canned milk.

"I don't get it," said Ann. "Didn't they figure out that canned milk also came from cows?"

"That's the catch, Tex. The wise padres gave them nothing but Carnation canned milk—which, as everyone knows, comes from flowers."

During this halcyon time they had only two minor differences of opinion. At Christmas, George wanted Ann to go shopping with him, and she loved the idea. But George is one of those persons who remembers everyone from the dog catcher to the King of Kapurthala. When it comes to open-handed generosity there is no one to beat Brent.

For instance, on his list were (1) a tailor who had once made a suit for George—at a fancy price. (2) A filling station attendant who had once helped George change a tire in the rain and who had been handsomely rewarded at the time. (3) A carhop who had given big-hearted Brent a hard luck story about an ailing mother who needed an operation—and how about a screen test for herself?

Ann checked over the list then said quietly, "I know that Christmas means a great deal to you, Keoki, but you remembered these people generously last year, and you haven't even seen them since."

"Oh well, Christmas comes but once a year."

"Lucky thing for you, Brent. It takes you about two months to earn what you spend in honor of that one day."

In the second discussion, George assumed the role of financial adviser.

Ann had purchased a five-acre tract in Encino—a lovely district in San Fernando Valley—and was planning a house. George went over the plans and estimated the cost, a good, juicy five-figure sum.

"Pooh," sniffed Builder Ann, "it won't run into any such amount."

George lifted his eyebrows and looked at the redhead out of the corner of his eyes. "Better take my word for it—I've been through this building business. I know whereof I speak."

Ann, ignoring his advice, went blithely on with her plans. Shh—George was right! But she hasn't told him yet; she's keeping it a secret.

Between financial flurries and general good times, they were making plans. Or, rather, George was planning out loud, and Ann was planning sans speech. He was going to sail the "South Wind" in the Dole Cup Races. He studied charts and bought provisions. Ann made arrangements, in accordance with Hawaiian custom, to place on the boat a number of live chickens and a young pig—traditional good luck symbols inducing fast sailing and clear weather. When George reached the island, this livestock would appear, beautifully roasted, at the feast along with the shark killed by his island friends. What George didn't know was that Ann planned to be on the dock in Honolulu when he arrived.

It's possible that, had these plans worked out, they would have been married in Hawaii, because—early that spring—George had given Ann a magnificent, hand-worked white lace mantilla. Anyone could tell at a glance that this mantilla was meant for the head of a bride.

Then, to prove that it was true love, everything began to go wrong. The boat races were cancelled. That was a blow to George who had talked, planned, dreamed, prayed Dole Cup—Dole Cup for two years. Moody, as all Irishmen are, he wanted complete privacy. He didn't want to see people or to talk over the cataclysm. He wanted to have a quiet steak dinner with Ann, take her home early and betake himself to his own house in a hurry.

Ann? Ann still wanted to have fun. A boat race was a boat race—and there was always another year.

About this time, George gave an interview to the effect that he had no plans for immediate marriage. George and Ann are both extremely cooperative with the press; when a charming writer whom George likes asked for an interview on his matrimonial views, he went over all the dangers to conjugality represented by

DO YOU KNOW THAT

Hollywood stars receive frequent offers from people who volunteer to say prayers for them at a very modest fee. There are countless dozens of generous souls who offer themselves as marriage partners to the biggies. And then there are the less pretentious, like the pair who wrote to one of the top-notchers to tell him they had named their pet, highly-prized flea after him!

DO YOU KNOW THAT

In 1937, Producer Joe Schenk's involuntary contribution to the cards and horses amounted to $64,894.15, including $30,905 lost in a single day. In another year, he tossed more than $20,000 overboard, Herbert Bayard Swope capturing $12,190 of it, Harpo Marx $4,711, and Darryl Zanuck $2,400. But Schenk felt awfully good about the $15,000 he cleaned up in election bets.

Hollywood. He was speaking in general, impersonal terms, and it never dawned on him that he had given such a good story that it might hit the front pages. Which it did—with Ann coming in for particular attention.

She went to him in her direct, unhesitating way. "How about this?" she asked, grinning up at him.

He looked sick—which, as a matter of fact—he was. "I'm sorry, Red. I wish I could eat every word. I just didn't realize. . . ."

"I knew that was the way of it," Ann answered. "It's okay. Let's skip it."

Shortly after that George went back to the hospital for further surgery. The recurrence of an old trouble made it necessary for him to spend some time dedicated to clinical thermometers, fever charts, five A.M. face-washings and general detention between the sheets.

Ann spent every spare moment with him. She brought him books about sailing and chart-reading. She brought him copies of Don Blanding's Hawaiian poems and a book of Island legends. She helped various groups at the studio rig up gag presents—everything from hot water bottles that looked like Flora-from-the-Follies to pink bassinets.

"It's swell of you to spend so much time with me," George said, looking at her as though he could eat her up.

"I'm morbid. I love hospitals," answered the gal from Texas, but observers noted that her expression was not so much Florence Nightingale as it was Elizabeth Barrett Browning.

As if disappointment and illness were not enough, dat ole debbil Career began to rear its ugly head. George and a non-professional couple who are close friends of his, asked Ann to go down to La Quinta (pronounced La Keenta) for a week-end. It is a heavenly spot, twenty miles south of Palm Springs on the road to Indio. The sunsets are pure strawberry sherbet, and the desert verbena is a breath from Elysian Gardens. Ann promised to drive down on Friday night.

Well, she had to work all night Friday and all night Saturday—so she spent a miserable Sunday alone.

Another week-end, a group of six planned to sail to Catalina and back. At the last moment, Ann couldn't go because she had to pose for fashions all day Saturday. Two weeks later, George and Ann were invited up to the home of friends near Santa Barbara, but Ann had to check in Saturday for wardrobe fittings.

Then George, fully recovered, went back to work, and whenever Ann had some free time, George was busy. Naturally Ann, vital, lovely and popular, couldn't be expected to mope at home. When an attractive man—such as Cesar Romero—asked her to go dancing, she accepted.

In November when someone asked Ann if she and George were "through" she shrugged impatiently. "That's such a dramatic way of putting it," she objected. "You know me well enough to realize that I'm not one of those 'never-darken-my-door-again' people. George and I—and I'm not being corny—are good friends. There are simply times in Hollywood when picture commitments and circumstances make it impossible for two people to see much of one another."

This is known as a declaration of independence, and it was printed far and wide. It was read in Peach Point by Millie Miller, who could have cried—and wrote to the studio about it. It was read in army camps throughout this broad land, and many was the khaki arm that got busy with a pen. Perhaps it was read in Hollywood by one George Brent, who knew that there is always one antidote for the woes of career interference in romance—it's marriage.

"I do" . . .

Ann says, her eyes soft, "We started to plan our wedding around Christmas time. No one knew. Not even Gwenn Woodford, my secretary, and not even George's secretary—although she may have had her suspicions because she had to make certain arrangements."

So you think the course of true love is at last going into high gear? Wrong again. Ann and George planned to fly to Palm Beach and to be married New Year's Day to commemorate the second anniversary of their meeting at Mrs. Jack Warner's party. However, at the last moment, George was called back to the studio for retakes. He couldn't protest without revealing his plans and exposing himself and Ann to publicity.

So the bride flew to Fort Worth—alone. There her plane was grounded by bad weather, and George joined her somewhat later when his plane was also grounded. They took the train and arrived in Palm Beach in a driving rain. . . . On January 5—four days delayed.

So Ann donned the champagne tulle and arranged the white mantilla George had given her, with a white gardenia in her hair. She wore something old (a locket her father had given her when she was two years old) and something new (her tulle dress.) She wore something borrowed (Gwenn Woodford's sheer sandal hose) and something blue (the ribbons on her bridal bouquet).

She says, "In our wedding picture, George and I look as if someone had just set off a firecracker behind us."

So Prince Charming from Eire and the red-haired princess from Texas were married and lived happily ever after—as all good love stories must end.

GORGEOUS HUNK

body beautiful, and the public called him a slice of razzberry pie. Vic had acted in some sixty stage plays, and he knew differently. But how to get action?

He was going with Lana Turner. He was going with Lana because he liked her, of course, but also because canny Vic was making it a point to date all the Hollywood sirens. He'd had front page romances with Carole Landis, Liz Whitney, etc., etc., because the word was around that he was a boy beautiful, a pantywaist and a lollypop. "It was romance," Vic grins, "but it was also business." He turned night-club wolf to smash the rumors.

So he was with Lana at Ciro's. At the next table sat curvaceous Betty Grable. Betty was just back from a smash hit on Broadway in "DuBarry Was a Lady." She was holding forth on the subject. Something clicked in Vic's brain. He went right to the point. "Lana," he said, "get me Betty's telephone number!" Such crust! Lana could have shot him. But she smiled sweetly and said something about not having seen Betty for too, too long, and by the way what was her number? Then she wrote it on a slip of Kleenex and slipped it under the table to Vic.

"Thanks," said Mr. Mature. "About ready to go?" Lana certainly was. The next night he had a date with Betty Grable. The first words he said were: "How does it feel to have a hit on Broadway?"

"Swell!" said Betty.

"Tell me—how did you do it?"

"Well," began Bett, "It was like this—"

You see? Victor had an idea. He knew Hollywood needed waking up on the subject of Victor Mature. Smart as a fox, he realized only Broadway could do it. And he knew Broadway should be his meat. But how to get there?

Betty Grable went to Chicago on a personal appearance, right after that.

Victor Mature also went to Chicago, business unknown and unstated. Betty travelled on to New York. When she arrived at Grand Central Terminal, who was by her side grinning for the photographers? You've got it. Victor Mature. Romance? The reporters vibrated. Who was this beautiful guy? Some Hollywood dope, the name was faintly familiar. Pictures. Headlines. And pretty soon telephone calls from Broadway producers. See how it works? Right from Ciro's to the Stork Club because—well—he planned it that way.

Of course Vic had talent as well as crust. But you'd be surprised how far crust can go toward peddling the talent. The saga of Mature in Manhattan is a wonderful lesson. He hocked his car, by the way, and gave his dad a post-dated check for $200 to get there.

He put up at a ritzy hotel and applied the 2-4-6-8 pronto. He started on the second floor. He didn't like it so he squawked to the manager. They put him on the third floor. He squawked again. They raised him to four. He ended up occupying the penthouse for the same price as the second story room! Nuts? Well, let's go on to the night clubs.

Victor Mature really doesn't like night clubs. He doesn't drink. But a little over a year ago he was the prince of the plush, after-hour Gotham bistros. Why? He knew Broadway after dark was the Broadway that set the stages by day.

So Mature's raven locks, his sensual smile, his dark heavy-lidded peepers and his hunk of muscle became props at Monte Carlo, the Stork, the Versailles, Cafe Society and so on around town. Did it pay off? It did. Columns buzzed about him. Debutantes swooned. A gent by the name of Louis Schurr got a load of Mature at Monte Carlo one night and had something like an inspiration. "There's Randy Curtis," he cried, smiting his brow. There was Randy Curtis, of "Lady in the Dark." At least there was after a little more 2-4-6-8.

The Brains of Broadway gathered in the theater for Victor's tryout. When Vic saw the big shots he thought fast. He had to sing in the play, and he'd never sung in his life. He knew he'd be terrible. He thought straight, the 2-4-6-8 way. "The only way to impress this bunch," he told himself, "is to play hard-to-get."

He walked up on the stage, hummed a few bars of "I'll Never Smile Again," and it was pretty awful. Then he hopped down off the footlights and started out the door. "Hey," yelled the producer, "where you going?"

"Home," said Vic. "I'm an actor, not a crooner."

They said, "Wait a minute."

"Uh-uh," said Vic. They got in his path. They explained that the crooning wasn't really important. They'd consider him for the contract.

"What do you mean, 'consider'?" said Vic indignantly. "Either you want me or you don't—right now!"

It wasn't done, the producers said. Impossible. Out of the question.

Well, the point is, they'd never seen anything like it before. A practically unknown dope doing nothing in a tryout and somehow making them like it. Then acting like Mister Broadway. They offered him $300. Vic was very nice. "I support nine people," he said. (He supported nobody but himself then, and that not very well.) He ended up drawing $750 a week and the contract signed.

Now, this could go on all afternoon. This Victor Mature 2-4-6-8 stuff. When he finally clicked on Broadway, Vic worked by day—and he worked by night, too. He doubled up on his night clubs. He beamed at benefits, he crashed the 400, he became Mayor LaGuardia's personal appearance stooge and stand-by for public clambakes. Mrs. Cornelius Vanderbilt got to calling him "Glamour Puss." Fans chased him around Manhattan's canyons. One girl made him take her to lunch at the point of a pistol. Papers printed pictures of his Greek statue face

Nothing can be considered actual waste in an actor's household, because he never can tell what sort of truck will gladden the heart of a fan. Here are a few recent sample requests: paper lipstick tissues; a "piece of gum you have chewed"; three hairs; a "telegram to my cousin on his birthday"; a cigarette butt; a "picture of you in step-ins"; eleven pages of "I love you" written 825 times; a button from a coat; a million dollars in movie money; an "autographed pair of your shorts."

and figure. Vic never disappointed anybody at any time. He caused so much furor in and around Broadway that—well—are you getting the point?

Back in Hollywood nobody was missing a bit of this. Vic didn't intend that they should. Pretty soon he got wires to hurry back—quick. Darryl Zanuck had offered $80,000 cash and a big Saturday pay check for his languishing contract at Hal Roach's. That little campaign paid off—and how!

So that shows you how Victor Mature operates. But it doesn't say anything about what he is. And what Victor Mature is, above all else, is a lone wolf. He's a one man corporation. He's an iconoclast. He's a rebel. It is Mature versus the world.

Since I started this, Vic has busted up with his wife, Martha Kemp, New York society girl. Everyone who knew Victor, knew it was coming. He's not meant for marriage. He's not the kind of a man to share himself all the way—ever.

A few weeks ago Vic was late on the set. He's punctual as a time clock, ordinarily, because his career is serious stuff. But this time something happened. Anyway, Twentieth Century called his house to check.

"Why, he's at the studio," said his wife.

"No," they said, "he isn't."

"Then," said Mrs. Mature, "I can't tell you. I haven't seen him for four days."

Being a lone wolf is no new experience to Vic Mature. He got plenty of practice as a kid in his home town of Louisville. Louisville is one of the citadels of the snobbish South where who your folks are counts in big figures. Vic's folks were immigrants. His dad was an Austrian, his mother half Swiss, half French. Furriners didn't rate in his narrow-minded old Kentucky home. On top of this, Vic's dad set about his business in the American way, which further alienated him from the local pooh-bahs. He started at the bottom, grinding knives. The dark, curly-headed, different looking kid found things tough in juvenile social circles.

"I used to go to parties," Vic recalls, "that is, for a while I did. But I didn't fit. There'd be the banker's son, the lawyer's son, the sons of the first families. When they came to me they'd pass me by like a dirty shirt. I got laughed at, I got snubbed, I got insulted. All because my dad was making an honest living grinding knives. Pretty soon he could buy and sell a lot of those guys' dads. But that didn't mean a thing. I was garbage. They never let me forget it."

It was about this time that the famous face-slapping event took place. It's a well told Mature tale, but maybe you've missed it. Some local Louisville bluebloods who were on the democratic side, hauled Vic along to a coming-out party. He got up nerve enough to ask a haughty deb for a dance. Her eyes blazed, and she handed him a stinging cut across the cheek. "How dare you ask me to dance," said this gracious, charming daughter of Dixie, "you common son of a knife grinder!"

The sequel to this also packs a wallop. Coming out of the Stork Club one night last year the same haughty girl grabbed Vic by the arm. She was done up in minks and jewels, as ever. "Mr. Mature," she syruply cooed, "I don't suppose you remember me from Louisville!"

"How could I forget you?" said Victor sweetly. "You did me the biggest favor of my life. You started me out to make a name for myself!" The girl was speechless.

Victor Mature's career has been called a career of revenge. That's not quite the truth. It's true he was kicked around pretty thoroughly as a kid. One day, for instance, his father came home to find Vic absent from the dinner table. "Where's Victor?" he asked his wife. She pointed upstairs and shook her head sadly.

Mature, Senior (his name was Victor, too) found his only son stretched on his bed, sobbing bitter tears. He didn't have to ask what it was. He knew about the snubs and insults. He shook Vic gently, then took a hundred dollar bill out of his wallet. "See this?" he said. "That isn't only money—that's friendship." He tore the bill in two. "Now," he said, "that's two friendships." The moral was plain even to a twelve year old kid. Go out and get the money—that's what his father meant.

Victor Mature left Louisville to earn his fortune. That's why he came to Hollywood. He paid his own way. He arrived in town busted flatter than a Brown Derby pancake. The town was terrifying. With his last few cents he sent a wire to his father. "Arrived Hollywood safe and sound. Have eleven cents cash to my name. Love, Victor."

The wire he got back said that, "Dear Victor. I am glad to learn you have arrived safely in Hollywood with eleven cents. Reminds me of the time forty-two years ago I arrived in New York harbor with five cents. I couldn't speak English. You can. Good luck. Dad."

If there's any hidden spur behind the success craving of Victor Mature, it lies not in any revenge vendetta with a silly glamour girl, but in Victor's resolve to show his hard-headed father he was a man in his own right.

That resolve broke down once or twice, but when it did Mature Senior's will never wobbled. Once Vic wrote his old man asking for ten dollars. The way he put it, it meant the difference between life and death, and the way he put it, he meant it. His pop never even answered the letter.

Ironically enough, the day Zanuck bought Victor's contract for $80,000 and boosted his salary to $1750 a week, Victor Mature, Senior, died. He left an estate of $687,000. He must have had some pretty good ideas.

There's no doubt Vic's starvation period around the Pasadena Community Playhouse, before he ever got a crack at a camera, fattened his private isolationist complex. He lived in a tent and kept his dog in a piano box. When the rains began, he moved into the doghouse. He kept body and soul together jerking sodas, waxing floors at the YMCA, cutting grass and even minding babies. He spent the rest of his time acting and learning to act and—he admits it—dallying along the primrose path of a few hundred art-for-art's-sake romances. But he was a one-girl-at-a-time man and he never sparkled in a crowd. Those years didn't help to make Vic the life of the party.

But they did help teach him how to take care of himself. How to go all out for Mature. How to think 2-4-6-8.

A while back Vic did "Shanghai Gesture" at United Artists. They gave him a canvas box for a dressing room. He howled to high Heaven. "What are you kicking for?" said the powers. "You ought to be used to tents."

"That's different," said Vic. "I've got nothing against canvas. But I was down and out then. And today I'm a star. I want a star's dressing room." He got one with everything but hot and cold running champagne.

Here's another example: When he had made a name for himself in New York, Vic was contacted by a super sophisticated magazine. They wanted to profile him, quite an honor.

But Vic knew something else; he knew they'd pan him for a mere actor and a new incomprehensible one at that. The reporter arrived at Vic's hotel. He was met by Vic in his pajamas guzzling a warm coke (his favorite drink). Vic went right to the point.

"Look," he said, "I know your magazine, and I appreciate the honor. But I know something else. What you're here for is to boob me. I don't care to be boobed. So—have a coke—let's shake hands and part friends."

The reporter—and a darned good one too—almost fell over. He changed his tack and sat around for all hours. When he'd written his piece he called up Victor. "You're going to get me fired," he told him. "I've actually made a human, likeable guy out of you!"

That's the funny thing about Victor Mature. Something about him—his looks, his legend—hang up two strikes against him at the start. People who don't know him unanimously agree that he's a drip. Almost all who've learned to know the guy, admire him.

Not long ago Vic was proposed for a poker club by a non-professional pal of his.

"That chocolate drop!" snorted the gamboleers. "Nothing doing. No actors in this club—especially not the 'beautiful hunk of man'!"

"Let me bring him over," pressed the sponsor. "Just once, then I'll leave it up to you." They consented. Vic arrived, raked in all the chips, rolled the bones ragged and in general proved himself just a Hell of a guy. When he left he was pals with the skeptics.

I can testify there's nothing drippy about Victor Mature. He's a giant of a gent with hands like hams and size 12-D gunboats. He's direct as a poke in the nose, full of beans as a Boston deacon and masculine as a chew of tobacco. The long curly locks are a professional prop. Actually Vic has little regard for his looks away from the camera.

He lopes around in sloppy, baggy clothes, unkempt and lazy looking. His best suits are old studio wardrobe numbers that he gets for half off. He owns no jewelry save a locket his mother gave him. He wears the wrong ties with the right shirts. But he's scrupulously clean. He takes five and six showers a day and keeps new shorts in boxes scattered around his dressing room, sometimes changing underwear as many times as he showers. He's continually dousing his body with toilet water because as he say, "I like the clean smell."

He doesn't wear tops to his underwear or bottoms to his pajamas. He hates stiff collars. Anything that's confining at all is out with Victor, which includes all his habits. He's absolutely irresponsible to the point of wackiness about his meals. For lunch he'll start out with a coke, then a cup of coffee and a beaker of grapefruit juice. Along about four he'll wolf a cheeseburger. He might eat dinner at midnight. Or he might not eat at all.

He smokes cigarettes like a furnace, but he doesn't like whiskey. When he's forced to drink something, he pours Scotch over ice and sips it shuddering and remembering his one and only bout with demon rum.

That was when Vic first became a Hollywood personality after "One Million B.C." He had a date with the boss's daughter, Margaret Roach. They went to a party, fashionably late, arriving at nine o'clock. Vic thought it was for dinner, but no dinner. Everybody was drinking instead. Still uncertain about how to act in high society, Vic drank like the rest of them just to be inconspicuous. On the empty stomach it was dynamite. He got boiled. And we really mean boiled.

It isn't any physical culture complex that makes Victor lay off dissipation. He hates the Tarzan peg he's been tagged with. He was scheduled for a body beautiful scene in "I Wake Up Screaming." Vic objected; objections overruled. So he ate like a horse and put on twelve pounds. The body was no longer beautiful—not what you'd call streamlined.

He takes practically no care of his famous physique. He's an armchair athlete for the main part although he'll dabble at tennis and swimming if there's no way out. He's been pedaling a bike to and from the studio since the tire shortage. But it's not for exercise.

Mature's campaign for Mature takes care of cooking off any spare calories. Photographers stare at him in amazement when he grabs them going by on the set and says, "How about taking twenty heads of me?" One producer issued an order to cut down on the still pictures of Vic's picture. Now, ordinarily stars hate nothing worse than making still pictures. When Victor heard the order he said, "All right, I'll hire a cameraman of my own." And he did!

The "Genius" campaign at TCF goes down the line with "Assistant Genius Number One," "Assistant Genius Number Two" and so on—all set workers with khaki uniforms supplied by Mature. Emmett, the colored perambulator man in the Café de Paris, gets a five spot each week to call Vic "Mr. Genius."

Victor is frank and perfectly above board about his pattern for fame. He isn't egotistical or superior. He's just consciously colorful, and he admits it. "I'll do anything I can to make the world Mature-conscious," he says, "as long as it is honest and it doesn't hurt anybody." He calls all the money he spends in this way "putting it back in the business."

Matter of fact, Mature is not concerned too much about the check-book end of Hollywood success. "The only money that ever did me any good was the money I gave away," he says. Before his father died, the old man decided to will all his money to Vic. Vic made him change his will and leave it all to his mother. In spite of that precaution, he recently had a good many insurance windfalls light on him, policies he never knew his father had. This disturbs him. "This money is bad," he mutters. "Why, it might make me start taking it easy!"

Wherever Victor Mature would be would make little difference in his personal life. He has no sense of private grandeur and ease. He'll never be a social lion if he makes a million and kicks Clark Gable off his throne.

He doesn't know the right people in Hollywood yet and probably never will. He never gets invited to swank Hollywood soirees and wouldn't go if he were. It took Vic two years for the waiters at Ciro's to move him out of corners.

Victor Mature's real pals are about five little known non-professional Hollywood people and anybody he runs on to who looks like he's mixed up and needs help. One of Vic's chums was an eccentric inventor who was plugging some Rube Goldberg contraption. When Vic saw him he was discouraged and about to hop in the river. Vic moved him and the invention to his apartment where the latter spread out all over the place. He kept patting the depressed Edison on the back and saying, "You'll do it! You'll sell it!" And sure enough, the guy finally did for $50,000! Nobody was more thrilled than Mature. It's the success that counts with him.

Maybe he will and maybe he won't. But if he does, it won't be because he vibrates to the baronial halls and mediaeval splendor of the Sheik's shack.

It will simply be another gambit in the game of making the world Mature conscious. And to that Vic is totally dedicated. To him that's only 2-4-6-8.

could take the longer "Eagle Squadron" part . . . During the last war, Loder was a 20-year-old cavalry captain, the youngest British officer in action at the front. He spent six months in a German prison camp before being freed at the time of the Armistice . . . There are 89 separate, distinct acting roles in the picture. Leif Erikson, Eddie Albert, Nigel Bruce, Jon Hall and Albert Dekker—all of them have small roles, but strong ones . . . The Eagle Squadron insignia was especially designed for the boys by one of Walt Disney's artists . . . Director Lubin decreed "No make-up—grim realism is the keynote of this film" . . . Every typist in the studio is at work knitting sweaters for the Eagle Squadron boys in England . . . The first day of filming, Diana Barrymore walked on the set with a blackened eye. Asked for an explanation, she told folks, "My father hit me!"

THE INVADERS

Out with it.

"The Invaders" isn't a very good picture. It's sprawling and overlong. It isn't very dramatic and it looks as if it were patched together. It lacks unity, it's dull in some spots and pretentious in others. Despite its stars, Laurence Olivier, Leslie Howard and Raymond Massey, it's not a star production. It was directed with a wide-toothed rake when it needed fine pruning shears. Well, then, should you see it?

By all means.

There are scenes when it speaks with a burning intensity of the things for which we are fighting today; there are times when it spots flawlessly the chinks in the armor of our enemies. It speaks with an honesty and integrity worth yard after yard of some "perfect" pictures you might name.

True, it doesn't come off as a whole, and you'll have to sit through some dull and bad sequences. But when the good bits and pieces are flashed on the screen you'll know they were worth waiting for. It's a propaganda picture, out and out, and a bit too full of speeches; but that's no point against it. Prime Minister Churchill and President Roosevelt make propaganda speeches, and they've never lacked for an audience yet.

"The Invaders" begins like a melodrama. The U-37, the first Nazi submarine to invade the Western Hemisphere, creeps into Hudson Bay to hole up while the first alarms for it die down. Six men of the crew are sent out as a foraging expedition to raid and loot an isolated Hudson Bay trading post. But no sooner is the party off than an RCAF bomber spots the sub and sinks it, leaving the six Nazis alone in hostile Canada. Since all this was before Pearl Harbor, the Nazis decide to make for still neutral America. The picture traces their progress as they thread through Canada, meeting various groups, being captured or killed, one by one. While it starts tautly, there's soon no suspense left, and the story dribbles slowly to an end. But what of the good things?

Wait for the sequence among the Hutterites, a Christian sect settled in Canada who give refuge to the fleeing Nazis without questioning them. The Hutterites are predominantly German, and the fanatic Nazi Lt. makes an impassioned plea to them as brothers, Germans and Nazis. The simplicity and quietness of their reply throws into high relief the revolting gibberish of the Nazi creed. We have to know always that there can be no argument against decency and freedom. The unassuming triumph of the Hutterites is the triumph of democracy everywhere as a living belief.

There are other good things. There's a true and tragic insight in the story of the Nazi Vogel. "The Invaders" doesn't make the mistake of underrating or over-simplifying the Nazis; the Nazi characters are etched carefully and truly. Theirs is the power of barbarism, but theirs also, are its weaknesses.

Wait for the scene where Leslie Howard, as the dilettante writer, shows off his prizes: a painting by Matisse, a book by Thomas Mann—works banned and burned by the Nazis. There's quiet power and it says a mouthful for our side.

Go to see it, if only to see Laurence Olivier in a backwoods beard, playing a trapper with a French accent; it's something, all right. Raymond Massey, speaking a sort of Canadian-American slang, is interesting if not very convincing. It's all superbly acted. Skipping the stars, don't miss Eric Portman as Lt. Hirth and Niall MacGinnis as Vogel. None of the actors in the picture misses fire, although sometimes you wish they had better material to work with.—Col.

P. S.

"The Invaders" took more than a year to film . . . 80 per cent of the production was shot in Canada, the rest in the Denham studios near London . . . The cast and crew used clipper, train, auto and dog sled getting back and forth between Canada and home . . . 17-year-old Glynis Johns was chosen by Director Michael Powell to replace Elisabeth Bergner . . . Miss Bergner, after traveling all the way to the Dominion to play the lead, decided not to return to England to finish her role . . . Biggest problem was getting the Hutterites, members of a religious sect, to cooperate. None of the colonists had ever seen a motion picture. Cameras were classed with mirrors—signs of vanity—and were not allowed . . . Director Powell pleaded with the Leader, explaining that the film would give the world an authentic picture of Canadian life . . . After consent was obtained, the Leader decided his flock was having too good a time and called a halt . . . Powell secured another audience with the head Hutterite and promised him that the entire troupe—actors and technicians—would work in their fields the next day to prove their good spirit . . . Laurence Olivier, Leslie Howard, Raymond Massey and all the rest rose with the dawn and helped the colonists harvest their wheat . . . Once more permission to film the group was granted, and the men finished the scenes in two days . . . The beautiful Hutterite girl who's caused commotion in the breast of every male who's seen the picture turned down all offers for a picture career. She's 18, 5 feet 4 inches tall, brunette, and has never seen herself in a mirror nor used cosmetics. Name: Elso Reimann . . . In the Indian territory, Powell ran into a problem caused by Hollywood's influence. After agreeing to work for $20 a day, one redskin chief reneged, told Powell he'd just remembered Richard Dix, who wasn't even an Indian, had received more than that for his portrayal. "You pay me as much as Richard Dix," grunted the Chief. "Then me play Indian." They raised his salary $5 a day and started production.

A few years ago in some of the dingy, little "art" and foreign language movie houses that dot the bigger towns, you used to run across an occasional French picture whose hero had a down-to-earth reality, a quality of danger mixed with amiability. So despite the fact that the picture may have seemed like a muddled gibberish in a language you couldn't understand very well, you never quite forgot the face of the hero: simple, plain, not particularly handsome. You checked his name in your memory book: Jean Gabin.

Well, Jean Gabin is in Hollywood now and his first American picture is called "Moontide." It's the story of Bobo, a Frenchy dock worker on the Pacific coast. It's a story haunted by fog and the smell of cheap food and the blare of waterfront saloons.

And a girl.

Out of the thundering Pacific one night Bobo saves the girl Anna from drowning after she has waded far out in the weed-entangled sea, bent on committing suicide. He brings her to his waterfront barge and revives her, asking nothing, demanding nothing. But, somehow, spoken in monosyllables, told by looks, a love grows up between the two: Bobo, the dockworker, always on the move, wanting no ties, and Anna, the girl who had despaired of her life. It's a love that becomes stronger with each passing day, despite Bobo's restlessness and despite his shadowy friend Tiny's insistence that they move on down along the coast.

There's something untold in the friendship between Bobo and Tiny. And there is something hidden and dark in Bobo; there's a streak of violence in him, a violence that could culminate in killing. Anna slowly unravels clues from hints that Tiny drops. And she is faced, finally, with the dread that Bobo may have killed a waterfront character whose murderer the police are seeking.

Against this background, like a summer sky threaded with thunder clouds, the story unfolds. Bobo and Anna grope toward their small happiness threatened by the unseen horror and by Tiny always growing bolder in his demands, hinting exposure of the unmentioned crime. It all explodes violently on the wedding day of Anna and Bobo, with Anna half murdered and Bobo stalking Tiny across the docks and breakwaters of foggy and night-shrouded San Pablo.

Yet for all its violence "Moontide" is a simple picture told in terms of atmosphere and character. Ida Lupino, whose fine performance in "Ladies In Retirement" you may remember, plays Anna. Thomas Mitchell is the evil Tiny. Claude Rains figures importantly as a character named Nutsy. Across them all sweeps the fog of San Pablo, obscuring their destinies, hiding their failures.

Gabin has been called the Spencer Tracy of France, but the comparison is not quite apt. Tracy has a big brother quality about him, Gabin is nobody's big brother. There's a sullen maleness to him that makes him in a way the equivalent of Lana Turner's sweaters. He's not romantic in the Valentino-Taylor-Mature manner; it's something subtler than good looks or a piercing eye, something new to Hollywood and the American public. There's an element of danger and sudden violence always lurking beneath that amiable face. And it has an appeal. At least it did in French. This one's in English, and there's an old proverb that says you lose something in translation.

Go and see for yourself.—T.C.F.

P. S.

$100,000 was tacked on to the budget for extra love scenes after studio execs glimpsed Jean Gabin burning up the celluloid of the first rushes with his smouldering wooing technique . . . Director Archie Mayo says Jean can do more with a glance than most actors can accomplish with pages of dialogue . . . For the first time in seven years of picture-making, Ida Lupino wins her man . . . Claude Rains spent six weeks developing the peculiar shambling walk he uses in the picture. Copied it from a fellow he met along the harbor waterfront . . . 20th Century-Fox got a waiver from the State game board allowing them to catch and use sea gulls on the condition that the birds would be returned to the spot at which they'd been trapped. The prop man sent to catch 'em couldn't get anywhere near the beach because of military coastal defense preparations. Desperate, he drove inland about a mile, scattered a couple of loaves of bread around an empty lot, then sat down to wait, fingers crossed. After three hours he had caught 15 gullible gulls which had swooped down for a quick lunch . . . All production came to a standstill while Director Mayo and a couple of trainers tried to persuade bulldog Officer Smith to plant a cold-nosed kiss on Lupino. The puppy, extremely shy, made them wait an hour and a half while he got in the mood . . . $19 was the sum total expended on costumes for Ida . . . One-time society gal Helene Reynolds has had her name yanked from the Social Register, 'cause she plays such "baddies" on the screen . . . Ralph Byrd gets a real chance to play a straight dramatic role. He's known to the Saturday-afternoon-kiddie contingent as "Dick Tracy" . . . Claude Rains got the role author-actor Willard Robertson had written into the book for himself . . . Marlene Dietrich, an enthusiastic advice-giver, visited Gabin daily on the set. Officials had to ask her, please, not to speak French to him, especially when he was studying dialogue between scenes . . . During the last two weeks of production, Ginger Rogers supplanted Miss Dietrich in Jean's affections and promised to show him around New York when both arrived there for vacations.

TO BE OR NOT TO BE

"To Be or Not To Be" is a comedy that laughs in the horror that was Poland after Hitler's invasion. The trick, of course, is that it isn't really the Poland you read about in your daily paper, despite the physical resemblance. The geography is by Ernst Lubitsch and the lines by Jack Benny; and beguiling geography and amusing lines they are, too.

It's a comedy melodrama that tells of the Turas, Joseph and Maria (Jack Benny and Carole Lombard) reigning favorites of the Warsaw theater and happily married. But not so much married that Maria is above a pretty compliment or two from a handsome flying officer; or Joseph above a skeptical suspicion or two in return.

But involved as they are in romantic complications over the handsome flying officer (Robert Stack), they are at the same time involved with the Gestapo, and their effort to stop a spy from betraying the underground leaders of Poland. The picture proceeds from bedroom to Gestapo headquarters, from the hams of the Teatr Polski to Adolf Hitler, from melodrama on the stage of a deserted theatre to the not-so-subtle comedy of husband Benny finding flying officer Stack asleep in said husband's bed. It's mad and tense, merry and taut. There's a chuckle to match every gasp.

The famed Lubitsch touch is perhaps not quite so evident as it has been in some other pictures. But the picture is directed deftly with an eye for detail and a sense of pace and unity. The script is studded with good lines and good situations. And comedy being the slight thing it is, the flicker of a director's fingers can make or break a scene. Mr. Lubitsch's fingers are very sure.

The picture is blessed with a perfectly assigned cast. Jack Benny gives a delightfully bland performance in the role of Joseph. Carole Lombard matches him every step of the way with her graceful and incisive comedy. Stanley Ridges, Sig Rumman, Felix Bressart and Lionel Atwill deserve a round of applause. Robert Stack is properly handsome and animated as the juvenile lead.

"To Be or Not To Be," with its oddly prophetic title, was Carole Lombard's last picture. Only the morbid will find it macabre. For, as an actress, she leaves on a peak note, with her audience laughing and asking for more.

and gaudy eccentricities sometimes pass for genius, she had a real and solid talent. The screen is an odd master; shadowy and unreal, it is a gigantic mirror for those who pass before its cameras. Every close-up is a huge and monstrous exaggeration, and Hollywood itself, living in its perpetual spotlight, is a challenge and a test. Carole Lombard carried her beauty and ability lightly and graciously and with the great gift of laughter.—U. A.

P. S.

When Director Lubitsch wasn't pleased with the scenes, he'd simply say, "Let's do it over again," but when they did a good job, he yelped excitedly, "Good! Fine! Excellent!" At picture's end, Benny said the most musical words in the English language as far as he was concerned were "Good! Fine! Excellent!" . . . Production was held up for more than an hour while the sound department hunted high and low for an echo. Every time Felix Bressart started to speak, the echo of his voice boomed back onto the sound track and ruined the scene. As a last resort, he was moved just five and a half feet, and quiet was restored. Why, nobody knew . . . Prop man Jack Caffee had a tough time finding duplicate automobile plates of those used on Hitler's car, old-fashioned bathtub, Warsaw restaurant toothpicks and horse harnesses! Most spectacular set was the interior of Warsaw's leading theater, which cost in the vicinity of $25,000 . . . Bobby Stack got a week off to go duck-hunting on the condition that he'd bring back some ducks for the cast. Amazingly, he returned with a fowl for every single member! . . . Benny is sick to death of disguises, what with those curls for his part as Hamlet and whiskers for the Polish actor. Says, "I am certainly glad that I wasn't working in a racing picture, for I'm sure Lubitsch would have loved to disguise me as Seabiscuit!" . . . Sound man Jimmy Thompson rigged up a gadget called the payoff bank. Rules were:

1. No language to be spoken on set other than English.

2. Nothing stronger than a faint "damn" to be uttered when swearing.

3. Penalty for "blowing" lines.

The Children's Hospital got the $117.40 collected. Benny led the contributors for his ad-libbing sprees. Lombard and Stack were about even for blowing lines of dialogue.

down in Holland, taking refuge in Joan Bennett's home. Her goofy husband is in a sanatorium, but Allyn Joslyn, a German Major in the Army of Occupation, isn't. He pursues Joan, so does Franchot, who is in turn bothered by the not unsuspecting Axis bunch. Fake divorce, possible bigamy, secret radios, the Gestapo, enemy submarines and old ladies all play their part in finally uniting Tone and Joan on the home front.—Col.

THE SPOILERS

Blood and thunder rule the day, and Marlene Dietrich, owner of the most glittering gin palace in gold rush Alaska, rules the men. There is claim-jumping galore, murder, robbery, train ride shenanigans, sheriffs, bare fist fights and all the go-withs. Hero John Wayne knocks the dickens out of Randy Scott and finally wins Marlene.—Univ.

LADY IN A JAM

Psycho-analysis comes up for some light-hearted joshery again as Irene Dunne's lawyer (Eugene Pallette) decides she is a screwball in need of being set aright. Patric Knowles disguises himself as a chauffeur and takes over the psychiatric job. Irene turns the tables on everybody, however, proving that some of our greatest fools are people. —Univ.

THE FLEET'S IN

Hollywood shows us again what sport it is to be in the U. S. Navy, where guys like Bill Holden stake their lives for a public kissing of Dorothy Lamour. Jimmy Dorsey's band and Betty Hutton liven the party, complicate the plot and toss World War II off lightly.—Par.

BLONDIE'S BLESSED EVENT

The domestic dithers of the Dagwood clan again run the gamut. Blondie's (Penny Singleton) new arrival, a baby girl dubbed Cookie, is only one of many newcomers on the scene. Daisy, the family pooch, simultaneously presents the household with a litter of quints, which Baby Dumpling (Larry Simms) leads Dagwood (Arthur Lake) to believe is his wife's blessed event. Frantically confused, Dagwood delivers a speech to a group of architects on building homes out of potato peels. From there on it's everybody's game.—Col.

TWIN BEDS

Newlyweds George Brent and Joan Bennett wind in and out of some funny marital difficulties with the U.S.O., a mad Roosian singer (Mischa Auer) and his meddlesome spouse (Glenda Farrell). When Joan peremptorily has twin beds installed in the apartment, husband George's growing suspicions of his wife's fidelity reach a peak. The situation continues ambiguous through the final scene in 1985.—U. A.

DEEP IN THE HEART OF TEXAS

Gene Autry manages always to be around when Edith Fellows, a fourteen-year-old rich kid gets into trouble on Sarah Padden's semi-dude ranch for semi-debutante lassies. Edith conducts a hilarious, almost tragic, one-girl campaign to get herself sent home from the ranch, but by the time she's through, she's changed her mind about the whole thing. Blame it on Gene Autry's winning ways.—Rep.

The divorce came through the other A.M.—but the wedding bells are still a long way off. With the last obstacle to their union removed, the young man has decided he doesn't want to get married, after all!

Quite understandably, he is reluctant to tell the girl about his change of heart. He doesn't want to hurt her, and he doesn't want to hurt himself—as he very well might since his sweetheart has a notoriously fiery temper. Rather than risk her wrath, he's done what he considers the next best thing. He has secured a job which will keep him out of town for at least six months. The lady, held here by her own picture commitments, will be unable to follow.

What will happen at the end—or if the girl discovers the plot—we would rather not think. We always did hate horror stories.

Our British Brethren

We don't suppose anyone will be very surprised to hear that, before the war, Winston Churchill was a red-hot Bing Crosby fan. Owned every record the Groaner ever made. It's pretty well known by now that the Prime Minister is a regular guy who can carry a note with the best of them. However, what is surprising about England's winsome Winnie, is this: He was once under contract to Alexander Korda!

In a long ago, happier day, Korda hired Churchill to write an original scenario. Churchill whipped through the job in two hours, turning out the best darned story Korda ever read. But for some reason, the picture was never filmed.

It's said that Churchill is still enormously interested in American movies—but not so much as his friend, Lord Beaverbrook. M'lord boasts he has seen every Marlene Dietrich flicker at least five times!

Short Shots

Hedy Lamarr has two new house guests. Her beautiful refugee mother and a little Scottie who was Hedy's pet purp Over There . . . Jackie Cooper and the kids in his gang have rented a concrete mixer and will build a bombproof shelter in Bonita Granville's back yard . . . Hollywood is due for a fresh exodus of its stars to Broadway. Marlene Dietrich will lead the pack when she departs to appear in Oscar Wilde's "An Ideal Husband." (Wonder why she picked that one!) She'll be trailed by Vic Mature who will thrill the debbies in a new Moss Hart comedy. Last time Vic went East, he brought back a bride! . . . Sonja Henie's last ice show grossed a trifling $1,750,000 . . . Mrs. Pat Boyer's birthday surprise for her husband, Charles, will be his portrait done by Painter John Decker . . . Richard Greene showed 'em! He put the stopper on those rumors that he was still torch-bearing for Virginia Field when he wed Patricia Medina, a British actress. The ceremony took place in London. Ginny is also scheduled for an altar-march—

News About Zachary Gold

Zachary Gold, MODERN SCREEN's new genius of judgment—the man who tells you what movies are good, bad or worse and why—has long been a demon at the typewriter. His easy-to-read style first came to public notice when it was found engraved in the pages of Brown University's Anthology, a collection of pieces nothing but the best. But the best was none too good for Zachary, and before they could pin his coat tails down, he had started to shovel up the shekels that the Saturday Evening Post threw his way. In fact, the stories he wrote for the century-old weekly were judged so super select that they were chosen during three successive years—1939, 1940, 1941—to go into the veddy exclusive Post Stories, a slew of tales than which there are few better. Colliers' carried the torch for him immediately thereupon, and darned if the Cleveland Public Library didn't start to wonder who this young upstart was. When they found out, they gave his works a knockout exhibition. Illinois took up the gun from there, and come Autumn, boys and girls throughout the high schools in that state will be reading a few of his works in a new text book which was chosen from many of its type, but not its calibre. Budding literary lights will be able to study a finished product at first hand. We saw Zachary about a month ago and managed to convince him that he and MODERN SCREEN's review department fitted hand-in-glove—both honest, both tops. Hope you think so, too!

Hollywood in the War

The whole town's working like mad, from the topmost director to the smallest errand boy! Studio doors open at the crack of dawn, don't close till far into the night. Stars rush from set to extra-curricular defense activities. Many leading citizens have left home to go where they're needed. Director Frank Capra is in Washington, heading a Morale Division of the Army. Director John Ford is in the U. S. Navy. Melvyn Douglas, at present in Hollywood, on temporary leave from the nation's capital, has been appointed Chief of the Arts Council in the Office of Civilian Defense. And Bob Cummings is in Arizona flying almost steadily to amass the air hours necessary to retain his pilot's license and admit him into the Service.

On the Local Front

The younger set is following the example of Ann Rutherford who has ditched silk hose for Wartime cottons . . . Perfectionist directors who require twenty "takes" before they get an acceptable one, are learning to mend their wasteful ways. A new ruling imposes a "three take" limit, to conserve film . . . Due to the auto shortage, John Shelton gave Kathryn Grayson a motor scooter instead of a new car on her 20th birthday . . . Vivien Leigh, invited to return to these shores for another picture, indicates she will remain in England, close to her husband, Laurence Olivier . . . Studio writers are being urged by the War Department to inject the phrase "Keep 'Em Flying" into their pictures as often as possible.

An ad appeared in the Hollywood Reporter advertising the sale of two French Poodle Pups . . . "But Not Vichy!" . . . Brenda Joyce is living in an auto court near Camp Roberts where her husband, Lieut. Owen Ward, is stationed . . . Gene Tierney won't let the fans forget soldiers Richard Greene and Bob Shaw. The Way to a Man's Heart . . .?

Friends are telling the newly-wedded Maureen O'Hara that the first year is always the hardest. Not that Maureen isn't finding that out for herself! Another domestic crisis like the last one, and she'll be running home to Mother!

Maureen's marital troubles started when she picked up a volume entitled "Advice to the Bride" and learned that all men love to start their day with a big breakfast. That sounded reasonable, so the day she and Will Price moved into their new apartment, Maureen began conducting her kitchen according to the book.

The first morning, Will downed his fruit juice, cereal, eggs, toast, coffee and buns, with relish. The second and third days he cleaned his plates but a little more slowly. By the end of a week, he was approaching the table reluctantly. And at the end of a month, the very thought of breakfast was making him ill.

Maureen, cheerfully following the rules, failed to notice that anything was wrong. Each morning, she stacked Will's food higher and hovered over him till the final morsel was gone.

The other day, Will cracked up. Snatching Maureen's hand as she slid another pancake into a dish, he drew her onto his lap.

"Honey," he said, "I'm going to tell you something that may hurt. But remember that no matter what I say, I do love you. These breakfasts," he continued, "you've gotten up every morning before dawn to prepare them. And I've devoured every last crumb. Now there's something you must know. I can't stand the sight of them! I've been strictly a coffee-and-toast man all my life, and if I ever have to face another seven-course breakfast, I'm going on a hunger strike!"

How to Win Friends . . .

Joan Crawford and Glenn Ford say it's only friendship, and they ought to know. But whatever it is, we suspect that Glenn—perhaps without his own knowledge—is being strongly influenced by those dinners and set-visits with the elegant Crawford. Anyway, we hope so. An up-and-coming actor like Glenn, still wet behind his career ears, has much that's good to learn from a star like Joan.

Joan, for one thing, has never snooted a fan. She knows that it's the autograph hounds and the celebrity seekers who put her on the top of the heap, and she's grateful to them. That this same quality of appreciativeness is growing in Glenn, is obvious from the following story.

The day he went to work in "Martin Eden," Glenn received a letter from a housewife in the Middle-West who told him how swell she considered him as an actor and how hard she was plugging for his success.

"I know you're too busy to answer this," she wrote. "But in your next picture, could you do some little thing that will let me know you've heard from me? Could you walk into a scene, tugging at the lobe of your ear? If you do that, I'll know it's meant for me. That will be my answer!"

Glenn didn't say "crackpot" and toss the letter into a wastepaper basket. Instead, he tugged at his ear in one scene—and in another for good measure! Unless his "message" lands on the cutting room floor, it will be the first time a star has used a million dollar production to answer a fan letter!

Disa and Data

Glenn Ford, a ciggie smoker, acquires that man-of-the-world feeling by puffing one big black cigar a day.

As soon as materials are available, Ann Sheridan will have special quarters built for George Brent, across the driveway from her main house. The two structures will be connected by a wooden bridge . . . Hedy Lamarr, who probably owns more jewels than any other movie star, hasn't taken her pretty baubles out of the vault since she came to Movietown. She doesn't like 'em . . . Gene Autry says thanks for the compliment, but he "does not choose to run for Senator of Oklahoma." . . . It took four shopping trips to Vermont, but the Henry Fondas finally got their new home furnished with pieces all over 100 years old . . . Out of respect for Judy Canova's feelings, Republic will not use the title "Moonstruck" for her latest picture. The studio recalls that at the time Judy sued for an annulment of her marriage to Corporal James Ripley, she averred she had been "hit on the head by a big yellow moon" . . . When Artie Shaw split his band, most of his men were snapped up by Chico Marx, who's embarking on a new bandleading career.

BACKACHE, LEG PAINS MAY BE DANGER SIGN
Of Tired Kidneys

If backache and leg pains are making you miserable, don't just complain and do nothing about them. Nature may be warning you that your kidneys need attention.

The kidneys are Nature's chief way of taking excess acids and poisonous waste out of the blood. They help most people pass about 3 pints a day.

If the 15 miles of kidney tubes and filters don't work well, poisonous waste matter stays in the blood. These poisons may start nagging backaches, rheumatic pains, leg pains, loss of pep and energy, getting up nights, swelling, puffiness under the eyes, headaches and dizziness. Frequent or scanty passages with smarting and burning sometimes shows there is something wrong with your kidneys or bladder.

Don't wait! Ask your druggist for Doan's Pills, used successfully by millions for over 40 years. They give happy relief and will help the 15 miles of kidney tubes flush out poisonous waste from the blood. Get Doan's Pills.

portrayed Stephen Foster, and who found Mickey Rooney's Young Tom Edison just as hard to take—Mr. Colman is not going into blackface.

Last year, when Selznick announced the production of Emily Bronte's famous novel, "Jane Eyre," he also announced that he might give Jane's lover, Edward Rochester, a new name. He was afraid, he said, that audiences would howl at a romantic lead whose name reminded them of Jack Benny's favorite darkie!

Immediately, Bronte clubs all over the world bombarded Selznick with protests. If the producer changed so much as a hair, they vowed they would boycott his picture —and call on the ghost of Emily to aid them!

The battle raged for one solid year. The other day Selznick revealed it was ended.

"Ronald Colman will appear as Rochester," he said. "And I promise that when he's finished with the role, movie fans will be laughing at Eddie Anderson—because he hasn't got an English accent!"

Grace Notes About Bob Eberly

Years and years ago, Bob Eberly won a Fred Allen Amateur contest, played a week at Roxy's and then went slinking home again to Hoosic Falls, N. Y. sans contract, sans dough. A broken man. Locally, however, he was still Caruso, and firemen's benefits and things kept him in the chips and in chronically elegant voice. One night in 1936, he was asked to sing at a police ball in Troy, N. Y.—a colossal item for which 10,000 tickets had been sold and for which the

Dorsey Bros. orchestra had been engaged. Bob, who usually accompanied himself on the guitar or banjo, let the Dorseys take over the job, and it was like champagne and caviar, Abbott and Costello, and all the other divine combinations you can think of. When the Dorseys left Troy, Bob was with 'em. He stayed with Jimmy when the brothers rifted. Says he wouldn't leave him for a million . . . Ex-newsboy, ex-high school pitcher, he's currently most fan-mailed singer in the business. There still is no Mrs. E. to gloom up the picture, but he's shopping. Wants an intelligent brunette with a sense of humor. It'll help if she's a Debussy addict, 'cause he is; and a good cook, as his appetite's phenomenal . . . He's five feet eleven, weighs 167 pounds. Always looks Greek god-dy, but doesn't care much about clothes. He smokes Camels, has flat feet and stays awake till dawn over a good mystery. Hates beer, single-breasted suits and being alone. The last "hate" is purely imaginary, we feel, as he's got more friends than anybody.

Grace Notes About Helen O'Connell

Blonde glamour puss Helen O'Connell was a child career-woman. Has been supporting herself since she was 13, no less—all of nine years ago. Taught dancing to other pint-sized Pavlovas for a while in her home town, Lima, Ohio; then discovered she could sing and got a job with one Jimmy Richards' orchestra. Her 17-year-old heart, however, wasn't quite in it, on account of her terrific crush on another Jimmy's band. Yep—old J. Dorsey's. Used to invest all her money in his recordings and sing along with them. Eventually she got to New York with Larry Funk's orchestra and—she still doesn't believe it—was discovered by dream guy Dorsey . . . Five feet six and 121 pounds, she couldn't be shyer in real life. Is constantly amazed at her own antics on the bandstand. Was stunned when she saw herself cutting up in her first movie, Paramount's "The Fleet's In" . . . She's about the only blonde Bob Eberly can tolerate. " 'Cause she's got a brunette personality," he alibis. We, however, know it's because she's straight O'Connell and just plain irresistible. Look at the record: Polls taken by swing mags, "Downbeat" and "Orchestra World" last year gave her top popularity honors among all gal vocalists; last year's senior class at Harvard voted her "Sweetheart of 1941"; and the block around any theater where she's appearing is invariably like Times Square on New Year's Eve. And if that's "brunette personality," boy, wrap it up, we'll take one.

Stoodents!

So many fans ask Constance Bennett for advice on clothes she's written a booklet for them called "Your Grooming I.Q."

Highlights: Never, she warns, dress too consciously with or against fashion . . . Always remember simplicity is the basis of smart dressing . . . When you've assembled a complete costume, practice wearing it around the house so you'll feet at ease.

Two Way Stretch

Toughest costuming problem of the month confronted Designer Royer when he picked up the script of Hal Roach's "Brooklyn Orchid." A pixy-ish writer had developed a scene in which Florine McKinney was to romp through a series of strenuous exercises wearing a skin-tight evening gown (to be created by Royer)—and emerge from the tussle with every dress seam intact.

Royer cursed the writer and slunk off to dream up the impossible. Lo and behold, he returned to the set a couple of days later with the dress. "Here you are," he smirked. "This will give Florine a real body-hugging. And it won't pop a single seam, either—they're all held together with elastic thread!"

This is as good a time as any, incidentally, to clear up a question we're asked at least a dozen times a day. No, the stars do not own the clothes they're pictured wearing. Local stores lend their merchandise to be photographed on the gals, but often, as in Bette Davis' case, the star likes something so well, she buys it. And pays full price for it, too, in case you're wondering about discounts!

Good News About K. T. Stevens

Don't call her "Katie"! It's K. T.—most emphatically—K. T. Stevens, up and becoming-famous daughter of a famous father, a girl who changed her name because she refused to cash in on her father's reputation when looking for a job . . . substituted initials for a full label in the first half of her moniker, pulled "Stevens" out of the bag, and set out full sail on her own career . . . Blushingly she admits that she's head over heels in love with her new life, but she puts a giant question mark over any other possible loves that fall closest to her heart . . . forthrightly announcing, however, that one of them is NOT social colossus Alfred Gwynne Vanderbilt, as is publicly rumored . . . because she doesn't like the competition from his horses! Any interested bidders for K. T.'s hand will have to forego one of life's greatest pleasures, furthermore . . . because she "can't stand men who eat vanilla ice cream" . . . it makes her think the men might be as colorless as the confection . . . chocolate sauce or no chocolate sauce! Fair Lady Stevens confesses to having attended several dramatic schools, but, in her own words, "none of them were of the kind in which the pupil is required to sit on a table and act like an apple." . . . At the same time her mother insisted that she learn to play the piano, said she'd regret if it she didn't learn . . . evidently, though, mom was wrong, judging from K. T.'s current admission that "I don't even like to look at a piano!" Biggest onstage worry she's had has been her hands . . . "What to do with those huge hunks of paralyzed flesh hanging from the ends of my arms! I'm over this now, thank heaven, but it took me nearly four years to whip this phobia." . . . maybe because she tried to emulate the person she most admires, Mrs. Hepburn's older daughter, Katharine . . . K. T. claims she rehearses under any roof or tree, no matter where she is . . . usually, she says, her pre-performance carryings-on occur on busses or in subways when she's studying . . . "I look up to find people all around me staring as if I'd lost my mind. For a minute I'm not sure, either." Her favorite expression, she's discovered, seems to be "You're so right, chum." Her one make-up can't-do-without is a lipstick brush. Asked if she had any endearing vices, she countered quickly with "You'll never be able to pin me down to name what vices are endearing." Her favorite director? We'll quote her in full on this one . . . "I'd like to say William Wellman but can you imagine what would happen to me when I came home to dinner if I said that! P.S. My father is Sam Wood. So let's call this a tie between Mr. Wood and Mr. Wellman." Ooops . . . we let the cat out of the bag . . . but K. T. Stevens, the slopped-up-in-cold-cream-and-paper-curlers Gertie of "Kitty Foyle" comedy fame really is a career girl on her own. She can't help it if her father's famous, too!

GOOD NEWS—HOLLYWOOD DIARY

Fri., Feb. 27th: Still drowsy after las[t] Academy Award dinner. What a w[ild] evening! Didn't have the glitter of Academy nights 'cause all the gu[ests] asked to leave their formals at ho[me] come in either street or dinner dress[es] Wendell Willkie and Dr. Hu Shih, Ambassador to the U. S., who were th[e] pal speakers, more than compensated lack of sequins and shiny shoulders.

Accepted Adrian's invitation to loo[k] the private showing of his Spring [Col]lection. When I heard he was exhib[iting] Ready-To-Wear line, I thought I'd disc[over] the perfect shopping place for MG[M] SCREEN's working-girl readers. Should[n't] known better. Turned out Adrian's Ready-To-Wears start at $69.75!

The show didn't have a swank cocktail mosphere, though. Only thing served was a slab of gum at the door. Funny thing about my invitation. Greta Garbo's name was crossed out and mine written above it. Expected to find my seat behind a screen or post, but it was right out in the open near Gracie Allen's, Jeanette MacDonald's, Janet Gaynor's and Greer Garson's. Maybe that's why G. G. wouldn't come.

Stopped at Robert's Drive-In for a quick Pepsi. The place is famous for its "Remember Pearl Harbor"-stamped butter pats!

Wed., Mar. 4th: Walking by Hollywood High this morning and noticed a mob of kids surrounding an instructor who was showing them how to douse incendiary bombs. Found Jean Gabin in the crowd of onlookers. Jean doesn't look as strained as he did when I met him the week he arrived from France. California has loosened his taut war nerves. Says he prayed the Axis plague would never strike here. But he's happy, as we all are, that West Coasters are pitching in cheerfully and without panic.

Coincidence! Saw Jean again this evening —with Ginger Rogers in a little restaurant in Beverly Hills. And only yesterday, Ginger's personal p. a. announced she was on her farm in Oregon—and was not seeing Gabin!

Mon., Mar. 9th: Here I am, completely hornswoggled by the news that Gary Cooper delivered a long speech at Pershing Square, when Gary deals me another shock! On the "Pride of the Yankees" set we got to talking about Gary's 5-year-old daughter, Maria, and Proud Papa didn't stop talking for an hour. Mostly about how superbly Maria skis and skates at Sun Valley. Guess Gary isn't so silent after all. Just hates to gab about Cooper.

To the Ballet Russe at the Philharmonic, this evening. Met Paulette Goddard and Burgess Meredith, Michele Morgan, Hedda Hopper and Lili Damita in the lobby. Also, Humphrey Bogart, the sissy! Bogey tells me he'll only go to the Ballet if he's driven, but once he's there he loves it.

Bogey had a funny story to tell about the ballet troupe. When they were at Warners making shorts, they almost disrupted the studio. Other Warner stars would stray from their own sets to watch them, and directors were driven frantic trying to locate players when they were needed. Eventually the situation got so serious, the ballet set had to be closed to visitors. However, bewhiskered Monty Woolley wouldn't be kept out. When the studio cop refused him entrance, Woolley thought fast. Hearing the strains of "Tales of Hoffmann," composed in the middle of the 18th century by Jacques Offenbach, Woolley glared furiously at the studio cop and snapped, "That is my music they're playing! I am Offenbach!" The abashed policeman pored out apologies and banged open the set doors. "Go right in, sir," he gulped. Woolley

Wed., Mar. 18th: Joined Kirt Baskette in the Fox commissary for his interview with Vic Mature. Vic swears, word of honor, there's absolutely no connection between his separation from his wife and Rita Hayworth's from her husband, so soon after they co-starred in "My Gal Sal." Rita's charge that Eddie Judson "inflicted great and grievous physical and mental cruelty upon her" rocked the town that thought the Judsons' 5-year-old marriage was on a reasonably solid foundation.

Cesar Romero and Carole Landis stopped by. Both are up to their necks in war work. Last week, Cesar gave a big party at his home and invited the Ray Millands, Fred MacMurrays, Alan Joneses, Gary Coopers, Ann Sothern and Bob Sterling, and Hedy Lamarr and George Montgomery. The party didn't break up till 2 o'clock. But at the stroke of 12, Cesar waved his guests good-night and trundled off to bed. He had to report for State Guard maneuvers at 8 A.M. the following day and needed a good night's rest! Carole says she's under doctor's orders to slow up her national defense efforts. Seven nights a week and every free afternoon are too much for one frail gal, according to her medico.

Had dinner at the Streets of Paris where Wingy Manone toots the trumpet with the band. Wingy hasn't stopped glowing since his Las Vegas elopement with Lois Murphy. He's kind of ashamed, though, of the way he gummed up the ceremony by tossing jive patter at the preacher instead of the conventional "I do's." Wingy had to apologize like a naughty child before the preacher would go through with the ceremony!

Mon., Mar. 23rd: Brown Derby-lunched with Ida Lupino and June Duprez. Lots of rubbernecking when Ida and June began to hum, "Time Stops," the ditty they co-composed. I suppose it's good, but the stares focused on us were so discomforting, I hardly heard the tune! The spotlight finally shifted to Paulette Goddard and Burgess Meredith, seated at a table close by. Strange thing. Every time the Derby photographer tried to snap them, Agent Myron Selznick popped up from the next table and shooed the camera boy away. Can't imagine why. It's no secret that the Goddard-Meredith deal is a robust romance.

Over to the Palladium this evening to dance to Tommy Dorsey's band. Leopold Stokowski stopped in unexpectedly. The entrance of the Maestro didn't disturb the hepcats. They just ignored him. But I think The Great Presence shook Dorsey and his boys. Not that Stokowski came to criticize. He raved about the band and dealt a special complimentary pat to drummer Buddy Rich. Stokowski says Buddy reminds him of the drummers he heard in Central Africa!

BUY FOR VICTORY!

The pictures on this page are shining evidence of the unselfish chapter in American history being written daily by Hollywood. Wider awake than the rest of us, Hollywoodites recognize that this is total war. It is every citizen's war. If the soldier on the battlefield can give his life, we here can give our blood. If the boys in the camps can scale down to $21 a month, certainly we at home can stop by at the bank or post office and buy defense bonds and stamps . . . till it hurts!! Actually, because ours is a government for the people, Uncle Sam is paying you to help him! Buy a defense bond, and in ten years your money increases by one-third. When the Axis started this war, they counted on a first round knockout. Free people can't fight, can't sacrifice, they said. They are wrong. We will fight and buy and buy and fight—not because we have to—but because we want to. And we will show Hollywood that its sacrifice, its fine publicity, have sown the seeds of Cooperation and Victory!

PORTRAIT OF A WALLFLOWER

Annette was a debutante.
She came from a good family.
She went to the very best schools.
Then she "came out"—
And NOTHING happened!
Here she is at a party, all dressed up,
And no heart to break but her own.
Dainty, sweet, and her nose CAREFULLY powdered,
She wears just the right shade of lipstick,
But her eyes are a BLANK—
They just don't register!
One day Annette learned about MAYBELLINE,
Just as you are doing—and,
Look at Annette NOW!

MORAL: Many a man has been swept off his feet by fluttering lashes!

nnette's lashes now ppear long, dark and vely, with a few simple rush-strokes of IAYBELLINE MAS-ARA (solid or cream orm—both are non-marting and tear-proof).

nnette's eyebrows now ave character and ex-ression, thanks to ne smooth-marking IAYBELLINE EYE-ROW PENCIL.

or a subtle touch of dded charm, Annette lends a bit of creamy IAYBELLINE EYE HADOW on her eyelids -her eyes appear spark-ng and more colorful!

THE LAST WILL AND TESTAMENT OF CAROLE LOMBARD

Nature's lovelier now... you can be, too!

"Beautiful like me!"

Baby's complexion is by far the World's loveliest. Baby's beauty counsellor is Doctor. He recommends gentle Ivory Soap for baby's sensitive skin . . . and yours! New Ivory—milder than ever—brings you safe beauty-care. Give your skin New Ivory's "baby-care!"

Give your skin Ivory care that Doctors advise!

For 'tween-season DRY SKIN!

Your mirror, your fingertips reveal how dry and sensitive winter months have left your skin. Refresh it with Ivory's gentle "baby-care." Doctors advise Ivory for sensitive skins. Just a daily gentle washing with Ivory's velvet-soft, lavish lather and lukewarm water, never hot! Avoid icy rinses, too. This method is approved by skin specialists. Doctor's beauty counsel is best. He says: New Improved Ivory Soap. It's safe! Contains no dye, medication, or strong perfume that might be irritating.

Flower-fresh all over . . .

that's how your skin is, after a lovely, lathery Ivory Bath! Warmly caressing New Ivory suds foam up faster than any leading bath soap. And that fresh, clean "Ivory" smell is so delightfully dainty. Lather up with that big white floating cake—and get "baby-care" all over!

Warmer weather . . . OILIER SKIN!

Don't let more active oil glands blemish your beauty now. Let Ivory's mild cleansing help keep your skin looking cool and lovely instead of hot and shiny. With Ivory's thick, quick lather and a washcloth, scrub your face in lukewarm water. Follow with warm and cold rinses. Repeat this cleansing at least 3 times daily. This method is approved by skin specialists. More doctors advise Ivory than any other brand of soap. Use New Ivory faithfully, and you soon will use it exclusively!

Smile, Plain Girl, Smile...

You'll "star" in your own crowd—if your Smile is right!

For a smile that wins friends, invites happiness—help keep yours sparkling with Ipana and Massage.

THUMBS UP, plain girl! You don't need beauty to make your dreams come true.

You can win what you want in life, if your smile is right. You can be popular, successful—a star on the stage of your own special world.

But your smile must have magnetic appeal. It must flash freely and unafraid, lighting your face with beauty. It must be big, warm-hearted, winning!

For that kind of a smile you must have bright, sparkling teeth that you are proud to show. And remember, sparkling teeth depend largely on gums that are healthy, gums that keep their firmness.

Never take chances with "pink tooth brush"

So if there's ever the slightest tinge of "pink" on your tooth brush, see your dentist right away! He may tell you your gums have become tender and sensitive, robbed of exercise by creamy foods. And, like thousands of other modern dentists, he'll probably suggest Ipana and massage.

For Ipana Tooth Paste not only cleans and brightens your teeth but, with massage, it is designed to help the health of your gums as well.

Massage a little extra Ipana onto your gums every time you clean your teeth. That invigorating "tang" means circulation is quickening in the gum tissue, helping your gums to new firmness.

Get a tube of economical Ipana Tooth Paste from your druggist today. Let Ipana and massage help keep your teeth brighter, your gums firmer, your smile more sparkling and attractive.

This was John Milton's idea of the gladsome month.

Leo's idea is bounteous, too,
In bringing "Tortilla Flat" to you!

★ ★ ★ ★

Based on John Steinbeck's best-selling novel. A more mirthful group of folk than dwell, and love, and gambol in the place called Tortilla Flat you never did see.

There are new laurels to pin on Spencer Tracy as Pilon—an authority on those three essentials of the gay life—Wine, Women and Song!

There's Hedy Lamarr, as Dolores. They call her "Sweets". You'll soon see why.

★ ★ ★ ★

There's John Garfield, as Danny, who inherited two houses and a watch. But his eye for an attractive female was his own to begin with.

MY FAVORITE BLONDE

The world of Bob Hope, like Alice's Wonderland, becomes curiouser and curiouser with every picture; and funnier and funnier. "My Favorite Blonde" co-stars a roller skating penguin with Rapid Robert, the fast man with a gag. But funny as the penguin is, he waddles in a bad second to the incredible Mr. Hope. From splay nose to that infectious Pepsodent grin, Bob Hope is a riot, on or off roller skates, from North to South Poles.

Modeleine did chorcool sketches of procticolly every member of the cost. Amused set members with clever coricotures of pompous Woshingtan big bugs!

Item: Bob and his penguin are taking bows at the end of their vaudeville turn. Bob points to the penguin, and the applause wells up like summer thunder; Bob bows for himself and someone claps politely. Says Hope jealously to the penguin: "Relatives in the house?"

Item: Madeleine Carroll bursts into his dressing room and whips off a dowdy sports hat. The famous Carroll blonde hair shimmers like sunshine on water. Says Hope wistfully: "Is that your real hair or did you scalp an angel?"

Item: Cornered by two ugly gentlemen, one sporting a gun, the other a four-inch blade, Bob is trapped against a locomotive. A sudden puff of steam blinds them for a moment. Says Hope impishly as he skips off to safety: "Your knife is showing."

Item: Outside a loft building Bob pauses to grub a match from a loafer leaning idly against the wall. The loafer, unannounced and uncredited, is Bing Crosby. Bob takes the match, lights his cigarette and strolls off. Ten feet away he stops, his eyes light up with the glint of recognition, he half turns. Then he shakes his head, shrugs his shoulders. Says Hope: "Couldn't be."

You get the idea.

And the idea is that this is the funniest Bob Hope picture so far in his immensely successful series. The story picks up Hope as a (Continued on page 10)

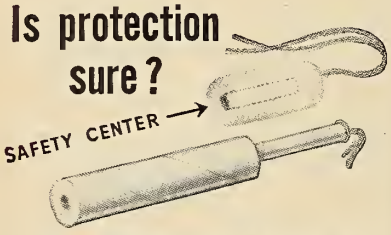
I wish you'd ask me about Tampons!

As a nurse, I know tampons make sense. The freedom and comfort of internal protection are wonderful! But, there are tampons and tampons! Do you wonder which is the best—the right tampon for you? Let me give you some answers . . .

Is protection sure?



The secret of protection is quick, sure absorption! Meds absorb faster because of their exclusive "safety center" feature. Meds—made of finest, pure cotton—hold more than 300% of their weight in moisture.

What about comfort?

For comfort a tampon must fit! Meds were scientifically designed to fit —by a woman's doctor. Meds eliminate bulges —chafing—pins—odor! Each Meds comes in a one-time-use applicator . . . so easy to use!

And Meds actually cost less than any other tampons in individual applicators . . . no more than leading napkins. Try Meds!

MOVIE REVIEWS

small time vaudevillian whose penguin act has been called to Hollywood. Madeleine Carroll, escaping from pursuing Nazi agents takes refuge in his dressing room. She is carrying flight plans to bombers about to take off from California for delivery to England. Slipping the plans into the unsuspecting Hope's pocket, she makes him an accomplice in her job.

From then on, it's Hope against the world. Never quite knowing what it's all about he dodges knives, spies and imminent death in a bewildered frenzy. The story skitters across country, nonchalantly tosses off a murder or so and involves the unwilling Mr. Hope with union truckdrivers and a small convention of women waiting for a lecture on the care and feeling of babies.

But the joy of the picture is neither in the plot nor even the beauteous Miss Carroll. It's pure Hope. Sociologists, a hundred years or so hence, might do worse than take an occasional peek at some of Bob Hope's pictures. Besides laughs, they'll get a slant on the typical American. For Hope is as natural as ham 'n' eggs and as native to the scene.

He's the corner drug store cowboy, down to the corny jokes, with a touch of white-collar pride and ambition. He has a normal eye for a well-turned ankle and a normal yen for the same. He minds his own business, but he's prey to the great American sympathy for the underdog. He scares, but not enough to stop him. In any pinch he does his best. With wisecracks added.

As for the production, Sidney Lanfield directed the picture beautifully; there's not a dull moment from the opening shot to the final fadeout. The pace starts at a gallop and never drops below a brisk canter.

Madeleine Carroll dispels her icy reputation and tussles gaily with the situations. She's a charming foil for Bob Hope's comedy with no small comic gift of her own. The supporting cast is effective but blacked out by the Hope blitz.—Par.

P. S.

"Pete" the Penguin has the most important role of his career in this one . . . the little waddler really gets around on those roller skates of his. He was so good, in fact, that Hope dashed out and bought a pair for himself so he could practice up for their skating duet . . . For the first time since the outbreak of the war, a movie company was allowed to shoot pictures within a defense area. Final scenes were filmed behind the Lockheed Aircraft Factory in Burbank. Every studio employee working with the "Blonde" company had to present proof of American citizenship and wear special, numbered badges at all times . . . Hope rides in a coffin for a couple of the scenes, so they built a nice, roomy one for him—3 inches longer and 3 inches wider than the standard models . . . A running gag, started when Hope was working with Bing Crosby in "Road to Zanzibar," always confuses visitors. Seems a man, wearing a cap like a train engineer's comes around every few hours to test the air-conditioning on the set. Bing and Bob got to kidding with him, and now, when he appears, one of the boys always inquires, "Well, Chief, what time does the Streamliner get in today." And the "Chief," playing it straight, takes out his watch, looks at it solemnly and gives 'em the time! . . . Crosby, incidentally, plays a small bit as a truck driver, just for laughs . . . Madeleine Carroll, on the verge of a nervous breakdown for a while from overwork, worked hard all day and spent her evenings entertaining boys from the local service camps. Took them on tours of Hollywood and Ocean Park, California's Coney Island.

SUNDAY PUNCH

Not even the new-found dignity of a pennant contender can dim the reputation of Brooklyn as home port for all the world's slightly nutty characters. It's something in the Flatbush climate, no doubt. So well-founded is this bit of folk lore that it's likely to go down in history as a fact. In official Chamber of Commerce literature, Brooklyn is listed as the Borough of Churches, and its neat little houses stretch block after block with scarcely a dese-dem-dose guy to be found. But to the world at large Brooklyn is funny; and that's that.

So it's no surprise in "Sunday Punch" to find a collection of pugs making their home where the sun shines on Gowanus Creek. Corralled together by their astute manager to keep them pure while they train, they live in a house watched over by a Swedish house-mother and a tough trainer. Rule number one at this odd establishment is that no women be allowed within its sacred portals.

It causes little less than a subway rush hour riot when a young and beautiful female niece of Ma Galestrum, the housemother, turns up to live in the joint. So ends the period of paradise in this Brooklyn Garden of Eden. Love blossoms gently among the cauliflowers.

More specifically it blossoms in the bosoms of Ken, college graduate and ex-medical student, and Olaf, the huge janitor at the place. It's Olaf who has the Sunday punch. There's no polish to him, no skill, but in any given fight he's likely to uncork a right that will drop his opponent in the third row.

The story winds through complications and misunderstandings and ends in a burst of leather when Ken and Olaf meet to decide who will fight the champion. It's a love match instead of a grudge fight, but you'd never be able to tell it from the way the two boys tear into each other. In the end Olaf wins, but Ken gets the girl, so everyone is satisfied.

But the charm of "Sunday Punch" is in the intimate peek it affords into the lives of the assorted pugs. A strange tribe, these fighters, full of odd little foibles and tender vanities. Natives of the muscle region, their pride in biceps and triceps is enormous. And it's truly a tragedy when one of them has to give up fighting because he's allergic to—of all things—resin. You might as well be allergic to a punch in the nose.

Such expert comedians as Guy Kibbee, Sam Levene, Rags Ragland and Leo Gorcey flavor the dumb-headed, good-hearted roles. William Lundigan and Jean Rogers handle the love interest while Dan Dailey, Jr., is the terrible Swede with the Sunday punch. If you like your fruit cakes and movies slightly nutty, you could do worse than sample this epic of life among the pugs in Brooklyn. Brooklyn alone ought to be enough.—M-G-M.

P. S.

Bill Lundigan's 6' 2" frame got roughed up, but good, during the fight scenes. The script calls for him to tangle with Dan Dailey Jr., and both men put everything they had into their fists . . . Technical adviser Johnny Indrissano said Bill and Dan would make excellent boxers, if they ever wanted to stop being actors. Their footwork technique was particularly neat . . . Jean Rogers learns her lines best if she paints while she memorizes her script. Brought her palette, brush and other equipment to the studio and worked between takes at an easel set up in her dressing room . . . Leo Gorcey loves to 'moider' the King's English during interviews, then wind up bidding the writers farewell in his naturally grammatical manner of speaking . . . Leo's pet hobby is collecting fish. He has 200 different species now, adds a couple of new ones every week. Before leaving for the studio in the morning, he personally cleans out the specially-built glass tanks and feeds every one of the finny folk . . . No decision has been reached, as of this date, on what to do about Ragland's ties. "Rags" loves cravats of blinding color, and on the last day of production, gave one to every male member of the cast. No one has dared to wear his yet, but they know if they don't, "Rags'" feelings will be hurt.

SHIP AHOY

Spies! Spies! Spies! They seem to have reached even Eleanor Powell, and in her latest opus Miss Powell is forced to use those shapely pins for the prosaic job of tapping out an S.O.S. At that, it might be an idea for Military Intelligence to consider. Every spy supplied with a chorus line; Morse Code delivered by 20—count 'em—20 beauties.

"Ship Ahoy," besides being concerned with spies, sets up Red Skelton for another try in the Bob Hope sweepstakes. And a strong entry, too, if you remember "Whistlin' In The Dark." Skelton, the Red, doesn't have to worry about poaching on anyone else's preserves; he has a charm and a character all his own.

The picture spins the tale of Merton K. Kibble (Red Skelton), a writer on a long overdue vacation. There seems to be nothing better to stave off an incipient nervous breakdown than Eleanor Powell, and Red takes the prescribed doses, quite delighted by it all. On board the vacation ship, Red pursues Eleanor from starboard to port, from prow to stern.

But little Eleanor, dupe of foreign spies (Spies! Spies! Spies!), is carrying a magnetic mine to the enemy. And before very long Red, quite innocently, is carrying the mine off the ship at Puerto Rico pursued by more spies, Government agents and the lovely Eleanor. Tossing the mine around, unraveling the mystery and clearing Eleanor takes the rest of the footage.

It's not until Miss Powell taps out the aforementioned S.O.S. that the air is really cleared. Red, of course, with so many things popping around him, doesn't have time for a complete nervous breakdown. He trades it in for a headache.

Ignoring international complications (and do you mind if we ignore them in a musical?) "Ship Ahoy" manages quite a few pleasant songs in the process. There's Tommy Dorsey's band to provide the music, and that sentimental gentleman ignores all the shenanigans except those he can play on his trombone. Bert Lahr and Virginia O'Brien are mixed up in the proceedings. And there are several strictly non-S.O.S. dances by Eleanor Powell.

Her Fitch Shampoo and hairstyle by Charmode Beauty Salon, Palmer House, Chicago

I Bought His Love

"Not for love or money!" I heard him say. No—Joe would never take a girl with dandruff to the party, and I had the worst case of dandruff in town. Yet, the very next day, he actually begged me to go with him! My white-flecked hair was transformed into a silken glory overnight. Joe saw me as a new and radiantly lovely person, all because I purchased a bottle of Fitch Shampoo at my favorite toilet goods counter.

I discovered that Fitch's Shampoo removes dandruff with the very first application. Its rich lather rinses out completely, leaving my hair shining clean. Actually, it penetrates tiny hair openings, helping to keep my scalp in normal, trouble-free condition. At the beauty shop or at home, I now insist on my weekly Fitch shampoo to keep my hair lovely and free of dandruff, the way Joe likes it. When I bought Fitch Shampoo, I bought his love!

GOODBYE DANDRUFF!

Fitch's is the only shampoo whose money-back guarantee to remove dandruff is backed by one of the world's largest insurance firms. Use Fitch Shampoo regularly each week. It reconditions as it cleanses — economical, too!

musicals would stick to their music. It takes the edge off a tap dance to know that a magnetic mine may be ticking away down in the hold somewhere. And with all respect to Miss Powell, we'd like to see national defense in more capable hands. At that, Hollywood ought to be more careful. You know: spies! spies! spies!—M-G-M.

P. S.

Red Skelton gets to wear a tailor-made leopard skin (three yards of fur) for the costume-ball scenes . . . Eleanor Powell dreamed up a couple of dance routines that require more taps from her two feet than ever before. For one of them, she covers a space of more than a hundred feet in less than nine seconds. The camera had to be mounted on a stripped-down racing car, traveling 25 miles an hour around a sixty foot circle. 1000 pounds of ballast had to be dumped onto the car to keep it from tipping . . . Everyone's watch went off the beam the day the prop department brought a magnetic mine onto the set . . . Tommy Dorsey and Eleanor got together and worked out a new dance, combining swing, South American rhythm and a suggestion of tap. They've called it the El-Dor . . . Dorsey says his good luck tune is "Marie." Between takes, he worked out a list of "Anxiety Soothers." In the classics department, he named "Song of India" and the Welsh "All Through the Night"; for hot tunes, his vote went to "Weary Blues," "Beale Street Blues" and "Twilight in Turkey"; for sweet songs, he chose "Stardust," "I'm Getting Sentimental Over You," "Who" and "Little White Lies" . . . Dead-pan singer Virginia O'Brien gets a chance to smile and act in this one . . . Bert Lahr, after telling everyone about his experiences in the Navy 20 years ago, suffered a terrific attack of mal de mer during his scene in a row-boat . . . Powell couldn't get any aluminum taps for her shoes. Plastic ones don't make as sharp a sound, so she had to double-strength every single tap!

THE SPOILERS

Everybody and his old man remembers "The Spoilers" because it was the scene of the most famous fist fight ever screened. In the latest remake it seems to have lost none of its old punch. But to a generation nourished on the slam bang of such expert tough guys as Jimmy Cagney it may not seem quite as blood-curdling as it did originally.

But as drama "The Spoilers" is still strong meat. This story of Alaska at the height of the gold rush is a colorful recreation of a lurid period. Nome, in those days, was the capital for two-fisted brawling adventurers who carried the law on their hips. In this land of fantastic millions and quick fortunes, ham and eggs sold for five dollars the plate, and rooms went for fifteen dollars and up.

"The Spoilers" is the story of Midas mine, fabulously wealthy, owned by lean, daring Roy Glennister. After working hours you could find Roy at The Northern, most popular saloon in Nome, owned and operated by Cherry Malotte, quick-tempered, hardheaded and beautiful. Between Cherry and Roy there is a half-spoken romance, but both are too stiff-

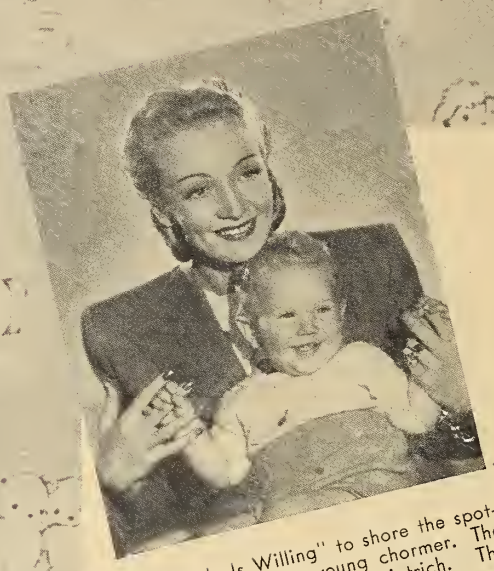
MUM TAKES THE ODOR OUT OF PERSPIRATION



"The Lady Is Willing" to shore the spotlight with this gay young chormer. The Lovely Lady: Marlene Dietrich. The Lucky Youngster: Wonder Baby Carey.

Baby Stars

A "Wonder Baby" indeed and a true "Autocrat of the Breakfast Table" is this youngster!

EVEN in this land of opportunity, you wouldn't want to bet on the likelihood of any mere baby achieving equal prominence in a picture which boasts of such famous stars and accomplished troupers as Marlene Dietrich and Fred MacMurray. Should you go further and try to figure out a child's chances of having as pulchritudinous a person as Marlene fall for him, literally as well as figuratively—well the odds become simply fantastic! But that is exactly what happened, at the tender age of ten months, to young David James whom you'll be seeing in Columbia's "The Lady is Willing." It was during the making of this movie that Marlene tripped while carrying Davey. Fortunately Marlene's first thought was not for herself but for the youngster. Thanks to this fact he stayed in the cast, unharmed—but her leg went into a cast, broken! Not surprising, in view of this proof of Marlene's esteem—combined with his own good points—that the studio crew forthwith nicknamed him "Wonder Baby" Corey.

But what are these other points that make this youngster outstanding? Well, to begin with he's a 4-H baby—meaning, in this case, hale, healthy, happy and handsome! Right about here his parents can come in and take a bow, because this much-to-be-desired state of affairs is not accidentally come by but is the result of much constructive thinking and loving care. Just such thought and care as we should all give to the bright particular star of our own household—the adored infant around whom revolves a "supporting cast" of admiring parents, relatives and friends intent on assuring his future health and happiness through their own work and sacrifices today!

One of a mother's most important contributions to her child's welfare is made through a careful study of his food requirements, right from infancy, since on her rests the responsibility of establishing correct eating habits, of seeing to it that he gets what is needed for proper growth and development. Like young Davey's proud parent, most mothers these days are fixed in their determination to provide baby with the "building" material necessary to assure strong bones and good teeth. So they start baby on cod liver oil, usually before the second month. Orange juice, too, is given at the earliest possible moment because it is the richest known source of vitamin C, which stimulates growth. Not content with their own far-from-extensive information, mothers of today familiarize themselves with all the facts about vitamins and minerals and with comparatively new — but vastly important — words like "enriched" and "irradiated."

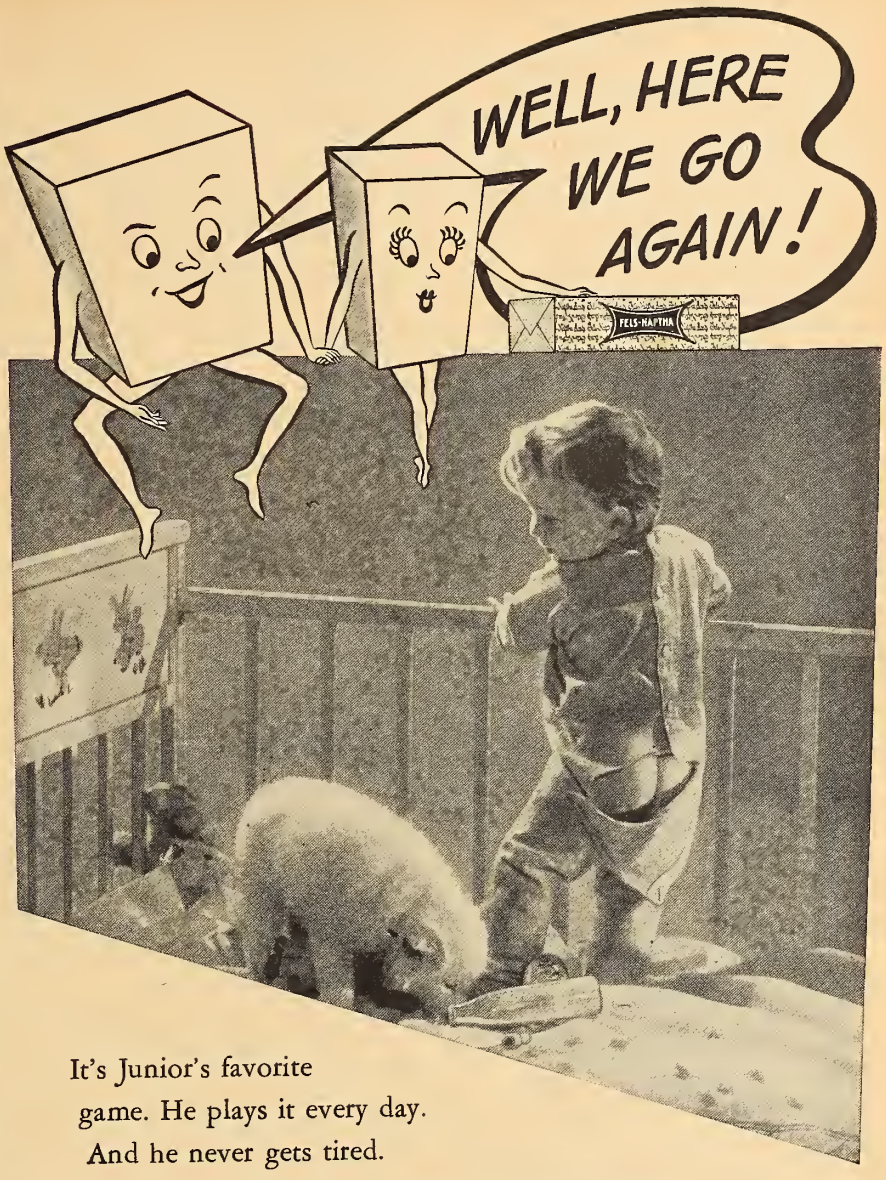
In this last respect it is interesting to note that the combination of "enriched" white cereal and "irradiated" evaporated milk is highly recommended for baby's breakfast or supper. For upwards of forty-five years infants have had, as their very first breakfast food, a bland creamy white cereal, freed from irritating bran particles so as to be more desirable for their still delicate digestions. Now this cereal that has always agreed so well with his young highness has been "enriched" so that it contains vitamin B_1, phosphorus, calcium and iron—as much of that vitamin and actually more of the last three than whole wheat! Yet this new "5-Minute" Cream of Wheat cooks to full digestibility, yes, even for baby, in that amazingly short space of time. No wonder busy young mothers as well as their doctors, enthusiastically endorse it.

Evaporated milk has been given an added benefit also—irradiation—to provide a dependable source of vitamin D. Because of this, plus its economy and digestibility, more children are now raised on evaporated milk formulas than on any other!

Of course you, too, along with the other grown-up members of the family, can derive like benefits from a breakfast that provides the very same food essentials on which Baby Davey and others like him, thrive. Remember, the first hours of the day are sure to be your busiest ones, whether you are a business person or a stay-at-home. So make it a habit to start the day with a substantial meal.



It's Junior's favorite game. He plays it every day. And he never gets tired.

According to the newest rules it's a game for three. Junior, Mother and Fels-Naptha Soap. When these three play, no one gets tired.

Let Junior present his most complicated washing problem. Between them, Mother and Fels-Naptha Soap will solve it in a jiffy—with Fels-Naptha's gentle naptha and richer golden soap doing most of the work.

Not many mothers play Junior's game the old way any more. It's so much easier and quicker when you use the new rules—and Fels-Naptha Soap.

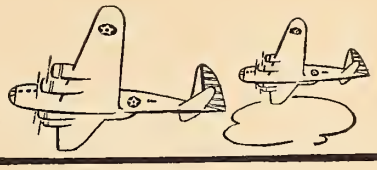
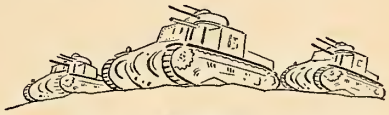
KEEP 'EM FLYING...



KEEP 'EM ROLLING...



KEEP 'EM SHOOTING...

...and keep 'em smiling

OUT OF THE factories and shipyards of America are pouring the planes and tanks, the guns and boats to arm the United Nations in the fight for Democracy.

Day by day, week by week our power must grow until, at its flood, it sweeps the earth clean once more so that free men may live in peace and security.

That is our resolve—and from it no power shall turn us.

To carry it through, our minds must be as keen as our swords, our hearts as strong as our tanks, our spirits as buoyant as our planes. For morale is a mighty force—as vital as the materials of war themselves.

And just as it is the job of some industries to provide the implements that will keep 'em flying, keep 'em rolling, and keep 'em shooting, so is it the job of the American Motion Picture Industry to keep 'em smiling.

Yes, that is our war-time job. We cannot build combat planes or bombers . . . we cannot make tanks or guns or ships. But we can build morale . . . we can give America the hours of carefree relaxation which will make its work hours doubly productive, the mental stimulus that will carry us on and on with heads up through dark days and bright, through good news and bad . . . to victory.

We can—and we will!

THE AMERICAN MOTION PICTURE INDUSTRY

MODERN SCREEN publishes this message in the belief that the vital war-time role of the Motion Picture Industry is of public interest.

Greer Garson's hair sets fire to every line I say," Noel Coward shrieked backstage after acting in his own play with the gal. Greer knows it, too, and treats her hair accordingly, refusing to change its color to suit a change in roles, always shampooing it herself and using for a rinse a full cup of champagne. The little Garson stems from a long line of Scotch-Irish and Orkney Islanders. In 1933, Greer (which is short for her mother's Scottish MacGregor) married a British soldier, but five weeks later called it quits when he asked her to accompany him to his post in India. Nostalgic lassie, her favorite dish is Irish stew and potatoes. For breakfast, the Scottish in her says porridge and haddock; buttermilk on the side, and on off days, a tonic of lime juice.

In spite of this strange grub, Greer and her 112 pounds are still the most delicious part of M-G-M's "Mrs. Miniver." Some dish!

John Carroll . . . dashing 6' 4", 195-lb. sword brandisher . . . brand-new addition to the swashbuckler contingent, with 30 years of unbelievable adventuring to recommend him to the ranks! A runaway at 10, he earned his bread pulling hot bolts, hawking tabloids, innocently toting packages across the Mexican border at 50c per dash (until a ranger plucked a pistol from one of them)! Bored with landlubbing at 15, he scrubbed decks and loaded freights around the globe for 2 years. Returned to shore where department-store floor-walking gave way to a career as legman to a Chicago newspaperman and a semester at Northwestern. He was sent to Milan to study singing but soon bored of an operatic career, satiated his thirst after adventure deep-sea diving off Florida. Trekking to Hollywood, he proved his vocal and physical prowess with a song and a 2-story leap out the window. Fully convinced, M-G-M's starring him in "Rio Rita."

Janet Blair—something gorgeous to behold, this nifty 5' 4", 110-lb, gal who's fast careering up the ladder in Hollywood! She says it's just her Irish luck . . . or that everlasting rhythm in her soul! At an early age, lil precocious Martha Lefferty (that's her real, birth-certificated moniker) went straight against her dad's wishes and stubbornly insisted on ballet and singing lessons. Came graduation time, and Hal Kemp hit town (Altoona, Pa.) on the trail of a gal songstress. Tryout was a walkaway with Janet capping her solo with a mile-long contract. Warbling from coast to coast, she collected a tremendous following in San Francisco, Manhattan and all the burgs betwixt. At Hal's death and the break-up of the band, she signed a movie contract and right off the reel was given juicy, "unheard of for a beginner" roles. But none so meaty as her current part in Columbia's "Cover Girls of 1942."

Richard Denning discovered that there is such a thing as too much of a good man, sliced fifty pounds off himself, and brought his 230 pounds down to 180 in a year. Diet and digging did it—wielding a shovel to whittle his waistline. From then on Richie was right out of a story book. He slaved through business school winning gold stars and popularity contests, and of nights earned his keep working in his father's factory. In no time he was a flourishing vice president, but big business depressed him, so Mr. and Mrs. Denninger's boy Richard started entering all kinds of acting contests and winning all kinds of pats on the back. Eventually they resulted in one big thunderclap, a contract with Paramount and—look what's cookin'—Para's "Beyond The Blue Horizon," with the lad himself and Dottie Lamour the main traffic stoppers in it. Watch out, Denning's ahead!

Paulette Goddard is still not discussing her private life. But everyone else is, with the net result that much of what is said of the ex-blonde, ex-chorine, ex-divorcee is either untrue or wildly exaggerated. But it's all part of the Goddard get-there game. "The less you tell, the more they want to know," is her motto. By now, however, it's seeped out that she and Chaplin took their marital vows in Canton, China, back in 1936, separated for about six months, reconciled after long talks about ambitions, individualities, careers and party life without interference from each other. Paulette realizes that Charlie loves his work—first. Charlie says teasingly of Paulette: "She's so intelligent and so smart. She has more money than I have!" She'll "Reap The Wild Wind" for Paramount, this devilish New York hurricane, this man's woman, this she-wonder!

Spencer Tracy—they love him because he looks so sweet with his hair all mussed up. Spence never was a one to slap himself up fancy. His recent sportin' with Hepburn in "Woman of the Year" necessitated the chopping of his silken red locks, but you'll see them back again in M-G-M's version of Steinbeck's "Tortilla Flat." Spence claims that, two-fisted fellow though he is, night clubs scare the chills into him, and stiff collars feel like knives in his neck. He doggedly avers that he rises at four in the morning although he is not an insomniac, just restless. He still cherishes the first Oscar that the Academy gang gave him, but the second little statue that he won for his "Boys Town" job he has given to the story's inspiration, Father Flanagan. Intimates, who call him "Donkey" for no apparent reason, say he won't wear screen make-up because he's a day-in-day-out natural!

THE LAST WILL and TESTAMENT

Loretta Francell, Carale's persanal hairdresser, can't forget the quips that curling Lambard's hair led ta.

of CAROLE LOMBARD...

A legend of laughter and generous unsung giving is the legacy that Carole left her countless friends.

There's a song of the wailing twenties, immortalized by another dead gallant girl, Helen Morgan, called "Oh Give Me Something To Remember You By." Out in Hollywood, they're still saying that it can't be true that Carole's gone. But if she is—if that shattered plane took away what was gold and glamorous and gay of Carole Lombard—she left a bequest. There's a chest of memories. Not laid up in sickly lavender like the mementos of fainting females of the eighties. But stored in throbbing hearts, in laughter-loving recollections. People gather together, out there on the world's boulevard, and they say, "And then, do you remember—?"

So many of them are treasuring bequests, people in every walk of life. Something to remember her by? Directors have memories, little people in little jobs are leafing through albums of bygone scenes, agents and actors, kids and grownups. Carole's will and testament—she must have thought it was funny to make one, she who was compact of living, afar from dying. But if she'd had her way, she'd have chosen to leave the gay memories, the laughter-ridden ones, the jests and japes of her roistering, fun- (Continued on page 70)

what they expect from a DATE

Bill Lundigan dates Meg Chapman aplenty, but Pres. Roosevelt's the "most interesting" and paised person he's ever met!

Do you, don't you, will you, won't you —take your tips from smoothies Cooper, Lundigan, Montgomery, Romero?

Jackie Cooper and Bun Granville came to watch, but he beat the drums for the crawd.

WANT a date with a glamor boy, f'rinstance? Take your pick of four. You can bowl or skate, drive in the moonlight or dance. You'll have to imagine the sweet nothings they breathe in your ear. So far and no further, said each of our cavaliers, when we brought that up. For the rest, step up and step out with Bill Lundigan or George Montgomery, Cesar Romero or Jack Cooper, and see what happens. If we ring in girls whose names are Hedy and Bonita, don't let it throw you. Make believe you're Hedy or Bonita. What can you lose?

George Montgomery

With a special girl—like Hedy Lamarr—George Montgomery used to shiver around for a while before screwing up courage to call. He'd meditate the comparative advantages of phoning or writing, he'd wonder if she'd be more receptive at noon than night. Pulse 110, respiration 50, he'd pick up the receiver and lay it down because tomorrow's Tuesday and maybe Tuesday would be better. Finally he'd send her a note, cuddled among a dozen gardenias. When the answer came, and it was yes, he sort of melts away, then grabs his mother and waltzes her round the room.

George Montgomery may be drafted, meantime he's cornered Hedy for keeps. Their marriage dote's indefinite but their romance isn't!

Screen writers are forever beating their brains out for novel boy-meets-girl situations. Here's one from life. Hedy was halfway down a manhole outside her house, inquiring of the workmen what time they thought they'd be through. George came driving along, found his way blocked, honked and all but passed out when he saw whose face it was he'd honked up from mother earth.

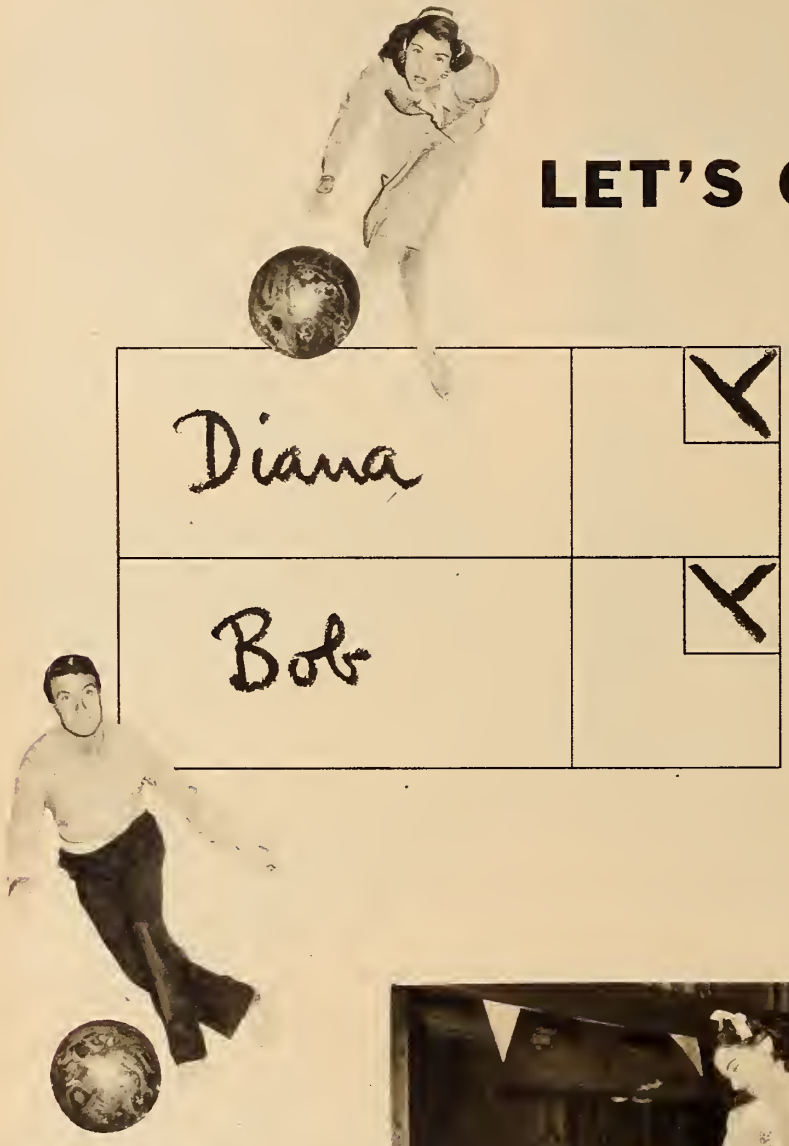
In pre-Hedy days he'd send a girl a corsage of white orchids because white goes with anything. Since Hedy, there are no other girls, and she doesn't like flowers to wear, so he just sends roses or something she can stick in a vase.

She doesn't care about dressing up, he loathes it, so they get along swell. George calls any costume demanding a tie dressing up, but bows to convention. He'll even go so far as a tux for a premiere and has finally mastered the art of inserting studs without reducing the shirt to a crumpled ruin. The only pleasure he gets from a tux is the dim reflection of his mother's pleasure. She deplores his preference for blue jeans on all occasions. "Why don't you wear a nice suit?" she inquires sadly. When he's all dolled up in a dinner jacket, she beams. "That's nice."

Suppose he's taking Hedy to dinner and a movie, as he often does. (No night clubs. They like dancing but hate crowds). He shaves, sings in the shower and climbs into a dark suit. The tie comes out crooked the first four times—vertical instead of horizontal, if it's a bow tie. He inspects his feet to make sure they're encased in shoes. This stems from his first high school dance. Not till he planted foot on the lighted porch of the girl's house did he discover that he'd walked off in bedroom slippers.

He doesn't expect you to be ready when he calls for you. Few women are, says George. He'll look at the paper or talk to the dog. The dog generally has a ball in his mouth and wants you to throw it for him. Being kept waiting may or may not annoy him. It depends on the length of time, how intelligent the dog is and whether the girl's Hedy. (Continued on page 67)

LET'S GO BOWLING!



Stack teasingly dubbed Diana "Miss Ballantine" because of her triplicate earrings! Hollywood takes its kegling seriously! The inter-studio bowling league (producers to office boys) meets regularly once a week and plays for prizes totaling as much as $7,000!

Take your date to the alleys! It's a muscle-builder, fairly cheap—and lots of fun! Here's how Bobby Stack and Diana Barrymore roll 'em in Hollywood!

Stack's date with Diana Barrymore was strictly from friendship and mutual love of the sport. First got acquainted on set of Universal's "Eagle Squadron." She's marrying Bramwell Fletcher soon and is already shopping around for a nest. She'll move in right away and get it shipshape for groom Bram, who's boarding with her famous dad, John B., until the wedding bells ring!

Both kids prefer the fabulous Sunset Bowling Center (above) which justifiably calls itself the bowling showplace of the world. Built over the hallowed ground of the old Warner Stage 1, it has 52 alleys (largest built on one floor), cost a million and a half, employs 185 workmen, uses $15,000 worth of current, what with electric scorecasters, foul lines. Contains all kinds of club rooms, has its own radio program!

Diana's been bowling nigh onto 5 years, averages a score of 125. No spot bowler, she looks at the pins, throws a slow, straight ball with a forward hook. Has sensational flashes in an otherwise ordinary game. Likes to play with men, sturdily bowls as many as 5 straight games in a single session!

Discussed their game over giant hamburgers on the way home. She enjoys an occasional game of duck pins, but Stack prefers the regulation set-up. Knocked on wood that they'd never been injured. A spot bowler, Stack tosses a fast forward hook that ends in a split more often than not! He's pretty steady, claims he's on the low side with an average of 170! Started in 6 years ago, plays once a week for as long a time as he can. Likes to bowl with women, queries, "Why do you think I go bowling?"

He wakes up screaming

Red's ducks know a crock shot when they see one . . . thot's why they won't fly owoy. Besides, they're wooden, ond the gun's o foke.

Red Skelton calls his wife Mummy. This dates from their early-day tiffs, when Red would yell and Edna take refuge in silence. Not that she's anyone's meek Griselda. But when Edna gets mad, she cries, which interferes with speech. Besides, Red talks faster. Before she could meet one argument, he'd be off on another. So she'd go mum on him—hence Mummy—then march out and bang the door. Red would laugh. A little later he'd stop laughing. A little later he'd squawk, "Mummy!" and Mummy'd come running to comfort the big stiff.

She was fifteen, he seventeen, when she became his helpmeet in all senses of the word. She celebrated their marriage by bulldozing the manager of the walkathon Red was emceeing into a twenty-five-dollar raise, since then she's handled the business end. In the days of prosperity, he bought her a diamond ring on instalments. Allergic to diamonds, she never wore it but found it a good investment just the same. cheer them up—fifty cents on food for two days. Then Red earned another buck.

At last he got a job. When a manager told him he was okay as a comic but his material stank, Edna turned writer. "People laugh hardest," she decided, "at silly little things they see happening every day." A man dunking doughnuts in a restaurant gave her the springboard for Red's famous doughnut routine. She used to do all his writing. Now she collaborates with gagmen. Red contributes ideas, acts as a court of last resort and can always be counted on to hypo a dying script back to health.

He's the dynamo, she's the balance-wheel, and they make a perfect team. She proceeds on the principle that it's up to her to do whatever he won't. This started through necessity and continues through habit. It's Edna who sees the bosses at M-G-M, comes home and tells Red he's got two new parts.

"Yeah, honey? Any good?"

She's so small and demure-looking that the image this conjures up is of a sparrow wresting concessions from eagles. The sparrow does okay. Makes mistakes but learns that way, and Red (Continued on page 85)

Red and his missus married when he was a man at seventeen, she was fifteen. After three manths they split, rejained three manths later, have never been apart since. She's at least 50% af his success.

"SWELL GENT"

HE'S NEVER KISSED THE BLARNEY STONE, BUT THE O'LUNDIGAN SWEARS HE LOVES EVERYBODY—WHICH IS SOMETHING FOR THE FUTURE MRS. BILL!

The only thing Bill Lundigan hates is jive music. The only people he hates are one or two who have done him dirt. He's a naturally blithe spirit. Life's too full of a number of things, all fascinating, to be wasted on grievances. Hating, says Bill, is for him a villainous business. He can't unhate. He can't be sure that a sight of the enemy won't lead to pitched battle. That's the touch of black Irish in a nature sunny with tolerance. He resents having to hate even one or two, but the proportion is negligible since he numbers his acquaintances by the hundred and has a single epithet for them all, irrespective of gender. "Swell gents!" he calls them.

In his four and a half years at Universal and Warners, he copped just one good role—the trailweary bum of a brother in "Dodge City"—the role that made Hollywood conscious of him as an actor. Under such circumstances, you take for granted sour cracks by the player about the studio. You don't get them from Bill. From the cop at the gate (Continued on page 91)

Bill's pet economy is washing, polishing, perking up his car. Spends real dough on up-front theater seats.

Bill tells it to Jean Rogers in M-G-M's "Sunday Punch." Nice going for a guy who won't be 28 until this June 12th. He's a southpaw, loves plenty of rare steak to fill his 6' 2" frame!

In October, 1941, a romantic, dark-eyed man, aged 25 and named Jaime Jorba (pronounced Hymie Yorba), married his first cousin in Mexico, D. F. Oddly enough, that ceremony closed a chapter in the life of an eighteen-year-old beauty in Hollywood, California.

Linda Darnell says with quiet sincerity, "I think every girl in the world should fall overwhelmingly in love sometime during her high school days, with a boy she can't possibly marry. It gives her poise and establishes a set of values for the future. So that's that. But don't think for a moment that this wasn't love—the real thing—because it certainly was, quite as much as if Linda had been 24 instead of 14 when she met Jaime. The dividends that Linda brought out of the experience were (1) an emotional overcoat of asbestos and (2) a spiritual depth that won't hurt 20th Century-Fox the next time they're looking around for Dramatic Understanding.

"ECSTASY" GIRL

She may be a fabulous legend to millions—but to those who know her best, Hedy's a thorough-going homebody who gags on champagne and caviar!

One day five years ago a black haired girl walked into a publicity office at Metro-Goldwyn-Mayer studios, her blue eyes round with bewilderment, her alabaster brow wrinkled with doubt.

Hedwig Eva Maria Keisler laid a newspaper under her press agent's nose, pointed to a story about herself and inquired innocently,

"What does this word mean, anyway—this word 'Glamour'?"

Since that day Hedy Lamarr has had plenty of opportunity to find out.

No star in Hollywood has ever been showered with more of the stuff Webster calls "deceptive and alluring charm." No star has ever become such a model for feminine copy-catting or masculine sighs. Not in years has a name signified so completely seductive allure, sophistication, exotic luxury—all the out-of-reach fascinations of the movie world—as has the name Hollywood tacked on Hedwig Eva Maria Keisler of Vienna.

What Helen Wills was to tennis and Sally Rand to fans, Hedy Lamarr for five years has been to the fabulous feminine legend of Hollywood—Miss Number One. Bob Hope, Jack Benny and Fred Allen bandy her name about as a stock catchword for socko bowl-'em-over sex and beauty. Artists paint her famous features into magazine illustrations. Shopgirls, society girls, Judy O'Gradys and Junior Leaguers—even other movie stars—ape Lamarr's make-up and manners. The army, navy and marines tack her sultry features on barracks walls and forget k.p. and fatigue. No one is immune to the Lamarr legend.

The day Hedy married Gene Markey, Clifton Fadiman stopped the quizzing on "Information, Please." "Gentlemen," said the scholarly Cliff in melancholy tones, "we will now observe a minute of silence. Hedy Lamarr has just been married!"

A Petty drawing, a Powers model, a Gibson girl—Cleopatra, Salome, Madame Pompadour—all the womanly witchery of the past and present lives in the Hedy Lamarr legend—through good pictures, through bad pictures—it makes no difference.

And yet—

The same Hedy Lamarr who stands for all this in public, privately is the girl who gags on champagne, who hates night clubs, who sits at home with her dates, who has the most prosaic romances in Hollywood, who thinks every girl should have a husband and babies, who likes fudge sundaes at drive-in restaurants, who has never done anything spectacular or glamorous in her Hollywood life!

Hedy's manner of living, her personal tastes, her friends, her men all shy completely away from the popular picture of a charmer like—say, Marlene Dietrich. In private, Hedy just isn't the type. On the contrary, she is one of the plainest, most conservative, naive and untheatrical stars Hollywood has ever peeked at.

Hedy herself says, "I have a peasant's tastes." She set about proving that from the minute she first arrived in the land that thrives on acts and poses. Oddly enough, Hedy was then a fugitive from very real and super sophistication as the wife of the Austrian millionaire munitions king, Fritz Mandl.

Hedy ran away—literally—from the most luxurious Continental life a woman could have. From a mansion and servants. From dining on the delicacies of Europe off solid gold service, surrounded by ambassadors, princes and the rulers of states. She had more fabulous clothes than she could wear, more luxuries than she could enjoy. She couldn't stand it, so she ran away, came to Hollywood and immediately let down her long dark hair.

She has kept it down.

Hedy's first house was a cottage atop Benedict Canyon overlooking Beverly Hills. She stocked it with chickens, ducks, rabbits and all sorts of barnyard life. She got a crush on slacks and stacked what fancy clothes she had left from the millionaire days. They've stayed stacked ever since. When occasionally she drags some of them out, she's a sensation.

The other day Hedy showed up at M-G-M in a pert and obviously expensive hat. Immediately it set all the fashion hawks and clothes gossips chattering. They simply had to know what great designer had whipped up a creation for Hedy. Obviously it was the latest thing. Hedy was pried with questions. Her eyes expanded.

"This hat?" she said, "New? Oh no—I got it six years ago in Vienna." Then she took it off and carried it home. She's never had it on since.

Actually Hedy is a hat hater. They make her feel uncomfortable and spectacular just as do all extravagant clothes creations. One of the greatest headaches Adrian had before he left M-G-M, was luring Hedy Lamarr into his swank salon for glamorous drapings. Knowing her weakness for the hokey-pokey man, candies, ice creams and such simple girlish fare, Adrian used to work a trick. He'd call the Good Humor man and have him stand by the salon door tinkling his chimes. That put Hedy in such a happy humor she could be talked into stepping inside for a few gimps and gussets.

Hedy's real taste in clothes runs to dark tailored things. Black and blue are her favorite colors. She acquired the black taste as a Vienna schoolgirl when she wore black dresses with white collars, an adult variation of which she often affects today. She hasn't many evening gowns left (she arrived in Hollywood with a trunkful, but has given a lot of them away), but what she has are on the plain side and exquisitely fashioned. Hedy is no half-way-measure girl when it comes to clothes or anything else. She either likes to be togged out in the most formal fashion or else she wants to be completely relaxed. She doesn't own one "afternoon" dress.

Hollywood once gasped when she showed up at a fashionable Beverly Hills party wearing a big sparkling diamond in her black hair. The town also did a double take when it saw her strolling down the shopping district in slacks. But that's Hedy. She does what she likes, and she usually does it well. Right now dirndls are her favorite off-set costumes. And it doesn't matter a whit to Hedy that dirndls had their American vogue some five years ago. She's just as relaxed about her hair.

Pop took a look at the doubtful molar and suggested the old string and slamming door method. "Aw, can't you just tie a string to it and hold the end while I fall backward onto the floor?" Junior wanted to know.

After four or five tries, the tooth was still clinging like a quaking aspen to its moorings. Every time the seven-year-old fell backward, the string simply slipped off the tooth—probably because pater couldn't quite bring himself to tie the string good and tight. Finally he said, "Well, son, I guess this tooth business is like an arithmetic problem. There are some things a guy has to manage without help. It's up to you."

Junior squared his shoulders, nodded and repaired to the bathroom. Several moments later he returned, grinning around a great open space. "Thum fun. Don't I look thuper?"

They Knew what they Wanted

Gene Tierney and Oleg Cassini let the rest of the world go plop—knowing their love would outlive all scorn!

It is difficult to define the atmosphere in the little white cottage at the end of a dirt road in the hills of Hollywood which the Cassinis call home. There is an eager air about it, as if its people desperately wanted to be liked and understood. There is a slightly defensive air, too, as if those same people still expected to meet criticism and were ready to stand up to it. And there is a warming air of two young people terribly in love and breathlessly afraid of time running out on them.

The cottage is unbelievably small, which adds to the impression of two moon-struck kids playing at housekeeping, or young lovers keeping a secret rendezvous. There is a living room, done in early American style with chintz drapes, hooked rugs and knotty pine and crowded with Gene's prize antiques—an old Franklin stove, a Boston rocker, an enormous Lazy Suzan, an old clock and a cobbler's bench cleverly converted into a coffee table. They dine here each night by candlelight on a drop-leaf table which is put away by day.

There is a bedroom with white-washed walls, a slanting ceiling and tall white cupboards ranged against the walls. It holds a small dressing table, a chintz chair and an enormous bed—7 by 7 feet—which is covered with a white chenille spread. On the walls are pictures of both mothers, quaintly framed in white petticoat lace.

The one bed is their insurance against sleeping on a quarrel, a well-known antidote for spats which, given time, might grow into serious issues. One night, Gene admits, she made a grand gesture of leaving the room after an argument which had begun to wax hot.

"The love-seat in the living room was the only other bed space," she giggled at the memory. "After lying all cramped up for half an hour I decided maybe I wasn't as mad as I thought and crept back to Oli. And that was the end of that quarrel."

There is a small bath and a cozy, old-fashioned kitchen with a big table in the center and racks of blue and white Enoch Wood (Continued on following page)

Now that Gene's tolents have been tried and found true, sociolions from Miss Porter's swank deb school quietly admit she's an alumna.

Designer Oleg says: "Clothes must reveal the woman, but with delicacy." Gene's T.C.F. contract nixes all bathing suit poses.

crockery on the walls. The table is the nerve center of the household and usually is littered with books, Oleg's paints, Gene's scripts, housekeeping accounts, playing cards and other odds and ends.

Actually, the cottage is a temporary abode while the "big house" on the property is being renovated. The big house boasts three more rooms and sits in the midst of a grove of fruit trees 100 yards or so above the cottage guest house. The Cassinis are full of plans for their estate.

"We got a wonderful buy!" they enthuse. "Only $10,000 for the property and both houses. When we move into the big house, we plan to rent the cottage, and use the rent money to pay for the renovation costs. Now we ask you—how's that for sharp business acumen?"

French Madeleine, who comes in by the day, runs the household. Madeleine is far more than a servant to the two; her position is a unique one of friend, confidante and mother confessor. It is just as well, however, that she happens to be an excellent cook. Both Gene and Oleg are woefully lacking in experience along that line. On one occasion when Madeleine was away and Gene was down with a cold, Oleg volunteered to prepare some soup for Gene. He puttered in the kitchen in mysterious activity and finally emerged with a steaming bowl.

Gene and Oleg scrutinize blueprints for their dream-house to the last nail and splinter. Hard-to-get materials delay completion. There'll be a bomb-proof cellar.

Gene competes with Oleg for original design honors. This lid's her own creation, made of fresh lettuce, celery, a carrot, apple blossoms and avocado trim. It's a Tierney exclusive!

The Countess Cassini poses for her husband in the kitchen. It's part of the guest house which they'll occupy until the mansion's completed.

Oleg and Gene drink a toast to her new T.C.F. film, "Thunder Birds." She's "little Cassini", he's "big Cassini" to her in-laws. They adore rumba-ing together.

STORY

At the time it all started, Pilon felt one might call it a visitation of the saints—if one could but picture as saintly either the smug little lawyer called Señor Cummings or that old gila monster who had been the father of young Danny's father.

Two fine houses and a watch! In Tortilla Flat, a legacy of two houses and a watch was the equal of a great fortune.

Who less likely to inherit such riches than Danny, languishing in the jail? Pilon had interrupted a lazy afternoon's schemings with his good friend Pablo, to guide the unctuous advocate thither. But already he had new schemes. If Danny were to pawn the watch with Torelli, the junk man—how (Continued on page 96)

PRODUCTION

The bushy beard Frank Morgan sports in this one looks like a poor man's version of Monty Woolley's famous jaw-warmer. Half-way through production, Frank discovered it was being used as a luxurious playground by a dozen or more happy fleas whose home base was the bodies of the many dogs in the picture.

Even the pleasure of smoking was denied to him, until he found a special type of ladies' cigarette holder in a local shop. He used it constantly, ignoring the taunts of his pals and the worried glances of the fire chief assigned to the set.

Spencer Tracy, John Garfield, Morgan, Akim Tamiroff, Allan Jenkins and John Qualen pitched in and helped the wardrobe departments age their costumes. The complete wardrobe list read something like this: 4 old hats, 6 ditto shirts, 6 assorted lumber jackets in various stages of wear, 6 pairs of blue jeans, one thin sweater, one white crepe wedding dress (for Hedy Lamarr) and 2 thin blouses and skirts.

Priorities experts gathered up all the rubber fish owned by the studio, so the cast had to resort to clothes-pins clamped over its noses between takes while the prop department tried to whip up some plastic fishes that wouldn't deteriorate under the hot lights.

JOE: "The parch! I buried it under the porch!"

PILON: "Quiet! Quiet! We will now hold the roffle for Danny's guitor. Now thot he is married he will not need it any more!"

beauty is in your hands

Hands are busier than ever in 1942. They've taken on extra jobs for defense and victory. Next to keeping them active, it's patriotic to keep them beautiful. Well-groomed, comfortable hands make work easier—and graceful, tinted fingertips are the best little cheerer-uppers we know. So if you're the smart girl we think you are, you'll do your bit—and keep beauty in your hands!

Shapely fingernails are always ten points in your favor—whether over a dinner for two or when you're sewing or knitting—so treat yours to a manicure once a week—even oftener if your hands come in for an increase in heavy work. The best way to do a good job is to provide yourself with all the aids that you need and keep them together in a convenient place—so you won't skip a single important step. Here's a list of the essentials: a small bowl for sudsy water, an emery board or file, polish remover, nail brush, cuticle softener, orange stick, nail white, cotton, buffer, cleansing tissue, polish base, lacquer and a colorless aftercoat.

Begin by removing all old polish with a special remover and a bit of cotton or cleansing tissue. Then with your emery board, or fine-grained file shape your nails to graceful ovals, being careful not to file too deeply at the sides if your nails are thin and brittle. Dip your fingers into your bowl of sudsy water and scrub them vigorously for a half minute with your brush. After nails are dry, work your orange stick wrapped in cotton and saturated with cuticle softener around the base and tip of each to remove dead tissue. Put a little nail white under each tip to clean and bleach discolorations, then scrub your nails once more in sudsy water. Now, with nails well groomed and shaped, you're ready to think about polish.

Buff the nails about ten times, always in the same direction, and then apply your waxy polish base which will give nails extra protection against chipping as well as provide a smooth surface to which your polish will cling faultlessly. Then apply nail lacquer in a few bold strokes, outlining the moon first and covering the rest of the nail in about three or four parallel strokes from moon to tip. Choose a cheerful new spring shade to harmonize with your skin tone and complement your favorite costume colors. "Fashion At Your Fingertips" on page 56 will suggest to you flattering polish and costume harmonies. After your polish, comes a colorless aftercoat—which gives nails resistance and adds a high lustre to lacquer.

If with all your extra rushing about this summer, your nails become bone dry and begin to split and break, don't jump to the conclusion it's the polish and leave that off your nails for a while. Far from being harmful, that cheerful coating with its base and aftercoat is a triple threat against blows, drying liquids and dust—all causes of nail splitting. Then look to your health and diet. Although (Continued on page 74)

Fashion at your fingertips . . . BY CAROL CARTER

Keep your hands in style with lacquer to match accessories and highlight your costumes.

● Short sleeves, long full sleeves, tight sleeves with flaring cuffs of organdy or lace—all are high fashion this spring. There is but one fashion, however, for the nails on the lovely hands which emerge from these sleeves, the same style that was correct for the hands which appeared beyond grandmother's leg o' mutton sleeves. "Well groomed" was then, as it is now, the vogue for any girl's fingernails.

But in another way fingertip fashion is not at all what it was 50 years ago. Granny spent hours buffing her nails to gain a faint lustre, while granddaughter brushes her nails with lacquer from a bottle, giving them not only a glossy polish but bright color which makes them an important costume accessory. And each season brings forth nail enamel in brand new color schemes—both brilliant fiery shades and mellow smoky ones. This spring it's deep burnt colors from the hot countries and frosted tints from the cold countries, not to overlook courageous Yankee shades inspired on the home front. But if you want to be ultra smart, don't choose your nail polish according to your mood alone. As ten accessories in one, your nails must match your other cosmetics, particularly lipstick. And if you are really beauty-alert, you can attract lots of admiration by painting buttons or costume jewelry, such as earrings with the same nail enamel you are wearing on well shaped fingernails. Try it, and see how impressed all of your even slightly color-conscious friends will be. Another striking "match trick" is to choose a belt or neckerchief, exactly the same color as your favorite nail polish; or vice versa, pick polish which matches your pet accessories. It's equally effective to couple polish with such standard accessories as bags, gloves and shoes or the band of your new summer straw bonnet.

HOLLYWOOD DIARY

Thurs., Apr. 2nd: Must have acrophobia. Just back from Gene Tierney's mountain home where Kay Proctor was interviewing Gene for the June M. S. And I'm still whoozy! Why must people live on mountain ledges! Gene and Cassini are billeted in a three-room cottage, high in the hills, till their new home, which is higher yet, is completely renovated. They selected a hilltop hideaway because Gene hates neighbors. Well, she needn't worry about any Federal Housing project moving up there! Her nearest neighbor is Ingrid Bergman, whose home on the next mountain peak is barely visible!

After the interview, we plodded up the path from the cottage, to inspect the new house. Gene expects it to be ready for occupancy in about two months. By that time, Cassini will probably be in the army. He was reclassified, the other day, and placed in 1A. Even if he's gone, Gene will move into the place. It'll be lonesome, but she'll have her maid, Madelaine (who calls her "Countess") and Oleg's father to stay with her. I gather the elder Cassini is much closer to the pair than the elder Tierney!

Gene invited us to come again, but I remember the time Myrna Loy and Arthur Hornblow visited the former occupants of the house, the late writer Douglas Churchill and his wife. Their car stuck in the muddy mountain road, and they were eight hours getting free! Uh, uh, I'll leave the place to the Cassinis—and the squirrels!

Dinner at the Hollywood Brown Derby. Vic Mature stopped by on his way to join John Payne at another table. Says he's living with John at Payne's beach house. Watched them for a while and can't honestly report that either has that "lost" look they're supposed to have. For a pair of newly-divorced gents, I should say they're standing up quite well!

Tues., Apr. 7th: Bonita Granville phoned bright and early. Would like us to print a line or two about the state of her romance with Jackie Cooper, just to let her fans know the truth. She says: "All those rumors that Jackie and I had had a quarrel and were splitting up started when I went to New York with Mother, and Jackie went on a tour of army camps. We talked everything over one night and agreed it would be silly for either of us to refuse invitations from other people while we were apart. I certainly couldn't—and wouldn't—ask Jack not to go out with other girls. As for myself, I'm sure I'd have been in a rut in no time, sitting in a hotel room night after night!

"We still see each other three or four times a week, but we make other dates, too. We think that's the best way. We're not ready to marry, and, besides, the future is so uncertain. We may both change a lot in the next few years. And, of course, there's the possibility Jack will have to go to war. . . .

"I can't understand why there's been so much fuss. It isn't the type of publicity either of us wants."

Saw Jackie later in the day, when Ida Zeitlin interviewed him for her Dating Story. (Page 28.) He talked cheerfully, but the sadness thrown over him by his mother's illness and death is still evident. And more than ever today. He was going to the warehouse after we left to look over the furnishings of his old home. It'll be his job to separate the items to be disposed of from those he wants to keep as mementos.

Mon., Apr. 13th: Set-called at Columbia. Started with "Three's a Crowd" where Cary Grant, Ronald Colman and Jean Arthur are weaving some sophisticated nonsense. Found Colman chin deep in a copy of "Winston Churchill." He reads furiously between scenes. Only takes time out to scratch. And I do mean scratch! He's wearing a beard in this one, and the blamed thing itches horribly! He dropped "Winston Churchill" and told me about it. The beard, I mean. Seems he can't raise a really luxurious beaver, and the one he's wearing is half his and half false. That's why it tickles so awfully. It amuses him, though, every time he glances in a mirror. When he heard he was going to portray a bearded professor, he wanted something heavy and beautiful that would hang to his chest. But the studio heads hit the ceiling. Said they were paying too damn much for the use of his face to cover it up!

Lunched and then stopped in to watch Joan Crawford and Melvyn Douglas make "He Kissed the Bride." Just missed meeting Mrs. Colin P. Kelly, Jr., the lovely widow of World War II's Hero Number One, who was visiting with Hedda Hopper. Strange that both Joan and Mrs. Kelly should be on the set today, as the result of plane tragedies. Joan stepped into the "Bride" role originally intended for Carole Lombard. And Mrs. Kelly is here in California to fill a job as private secretary in a local aircraft factory, which will enable her to support herself and her son.

Douglas popped his head out of his dressing room to say hello—and good-by. When he finishes the picture, he's returning to Washington to resume his post with the OCD. Says efforts of certain hostile agencies to force his resignation have failed. He'll stick to his job till it's done—and he won't collect a dime for his services, either!

Wed., Apr. 15th: Ran into Frances Dee at the Farmer's Market, shopping for some groceries she can't get in the neighbarhood of the McCrea ranch. Frances seldom comes into town any more. Hasn't been here more than twice since she finished "Meet the Stewarts." She tried coaxing her sons, Jody and David, to make the trip with her this morning, but they turned her down cold. They're real country kids and the city holds no lures for them. Frances tells me they attend a little school with 60 other pupils and walk a mile each day getting there and back. Most of their classmates are Mexicans, and Joel and she are flabbergasted at the way their young 'uns toss off long conversations in Spanish—shutting out their mom and pop, completely!

Couldn't make the Linda Darnell—Cynthia Miller confab, but Cynthia called to say Linda looked weird! Not her face. Linda couldn't look anything but gorgeous if she were dressed like a zombie. But her clothes! She had to run out in the middle of a fashion portrait sitting to keep her date with Cynthia—and she ripped into the Publicity Dept. garbed in a white, quilted satin hostess coat splashed with purple and red flowers! The robe parted while she talked, and Cynthia gulped at the sight of Linda's shapely gams, sheathed in cotton hose toned a beautiful robin's-egg blue! According to Linda, it's a preview of what the well-dressed female will be wearing when the silk situation becomes acute. Colored cottons will be a common sight, so we'd better make up our minds to like 'em!

Tues., Apr. 21st: Looked in on Fredda Dudley and Dennis Morgan in the Warner Bros. Green Room, then went on to the "Constant Nymph" set. Joan Fontaine "died" this morning and was gone for the day, but Boyer and Alexis Smith were doing a scene. Alexis is more than five feet ten inches tall in high heels, and Boyer is just a little shorter. Diminishing Alexis' height for their shot together was a problem, but Director Edmond Goulding worked it out. He had Boyer hurry into the room, rush up three steps and then talk down at Alexis. On the screen she'll look inches shorter!

Met Brenda Marshall on the lot. With Bill flirting with the army, Brenda's already begun the mental adjustment to life without him. She's vowed that while he's gone, she's going to work and study so hard, she'll be the best actress in the business by the time he comes back! She wants him to be really proud of her. As though he weren't now! Must remember to tell her what I heard this evening. Samuel Goldwyn caught her last two pictures and hasn't stopped raving since. That's high praise from a master of the trade. Seems to me she's made a swell start toward that top rung, already!

The Lucille Boll-Desi Arnoz merger is still blissful. On their first onniversary, he gove her an exquisite ploin gold brocelet sentimentally engroved, "I love you more than ever—Desi."

Morried at 15, divorced at 18, momma of on 8-yeor-old, Mory Martin found the real thing with outhor Richard Hollidoy whom she wed in Moy '40. Their daughter, Mory Heller, is six months old this month.

Dotty Discovers America

Hollywood is so proud of Dorothy Lamour, it's pretty near bustin'! After selling $25,000,000 worth of defense bonds on her tour for the Treasury Dept. and losing so many pounds her sarongs won't stay on, Dotty's ready to hit the road again. In May she'll be off on another cross-country trip, this time to sell as many bonds as there are Japs and Nazis combined! When we talked to Dotty the other day, she was full up about her last trip.

"There isn't a thrill that can compare with it," she told us. "I had a chance to look America in the face. And it's a darn nice face. Take a good look at it yourself. It's strong and cheerful and decent, and it'll be around a long, long time!

"This is what I mean. One morning, I went to the Maryland Dry Docks to speak. I stood on a platform, and below me there were five thousand men, grim-faced and in overalls. I looked down and beyond them, and I could see half-built ships and the sea. It was a picture! I was nervous, but I talked.

"I finished my speech and then someone called, 'Dotty, will you sing for us?' I said, 'I can't. This isn't a personal appearance. This is business.'

"Then they started shouting. They said they'd buy bonds—sure—but would I sing first.

"So I said, 'Yes, I'll sing, if one of you comes up and sings with me, and all the rest of you join in "God Bless America"!'

"One big man, hands calloused, face dirty, jumped up grinning and put his arm around me. I put mine around him, and we faced the crowd. We had no piano, but we sang, five thousand of us—with the ships and the sea behind us—'God Bless America'!

"When I turned away I bumped against my public relations aide—a tough, hard ex-newspaperman. I looked at him. The echo of the song was still in the air against the sky. And this fellow's eyes were filled.

"I thought, 'Oh, God, this is it. This'll lick them off the face of the earth. All these people, together. We can't lose!' " Dotty brought back a chucklesome story, too. Seems months ago she asked permission to visit the Martin aircraft plant. An executive of the plant turned her down, saying, "When a beautiful woman walks through, all the workers stop working. It costs us a thousand man-hours of labor. Dorothy Lamour? She'd cost us half a bomber!"

Inspiration

Dotty thought she'd never get to see planes in the making. However, when she arrived at Curtiss-Wright, President Curtiss called thousands of his employees from their machines. Hushing the crowd, he nodded toward Dotty, standing at his side:

"I hear another plant won't let Miss Lamour in because it'll cost half a bomber," he said, with eyes twinkling. "Well,. I don't agree. I've given all of you twenty minutes off to meet Dotty. And do you know why? Because I think after you've heard her, you can go back and make two bombers!"

The Proof of the Pudding

After one year of wedlock, Gene Tierney is just beginning to feel like a bride! After twelve suspenseful months, wedding gifts are finally pouring in, old friends are phoning and wiring congratulations, and Gene and Husband Oleg Cassini are flooded with invitations to "bride and groom" dinners in their honor!

Gene and Olie are taking the sudden recognition of their marriage in stride. Only they think it's funny the world didn't accept their union from the start and admit the Tierney-Cassini nuptials were for keeps.

"When we eloped," Cassini confides "we were deprived of all the parties and presents usually showered on newlyweds. The ugliness and family fuss that followed our wedding made people think our marriage wouldn't last. Instead of getting together to wish us happiness, they got together and made bets on when we'd separate! As for gifts—they weren't going to waste their money!

"But I guess the probation period is over. At last we're being looked on as normal married folks. For Gene's sake, I'm very happy."

My best friend's big sister is getting married. I couldn't be fonder of her, but couldn't be poorer at the moment. Can you think of a present with much splash at a tiny figure?

A big and elegant salad bowl with fork and spoon to match is useful, impressive and around $3.00 at any fair-sized department store. If the couple is anyway musical, they'd love an album of records. You can get a Beethoven symphony for around $5.00. Or how about four colossal crystal ash trays at $1.00 per? Shop around till you find gargantuan ones. In your desire for "splash," don't be dazzled by very inexpensive atrocities in plated silver, glass or china. Stick to simplicity, and you can't go very wrong.

I know you shouldn't congratulate the bride, but what does one say if she's a total stranger, and you can't launch into how lovely she looks, etc.?

You simply smile at her and say, "I know you and John will be awfully happy" or "All the happiness in the world!" To John you say, "Congratulations!"

A family friend is marrying a girl I've never met. In this case isn't it permissible to send my gift to the boy?

No, the bride always gets the gifts, and they become legally her possessions, you know. It is permissible to send the groom an additional gift if you like, but this is rarely done except in the case of doting godparents, etc.

My one virtue is getting places on time, and I especially make a point of being early for weddings so's to get an aisle seat. However, nine times out of ten some oldish dame will arrive fifteen minutes later and glare me into moving in for her. Would it be terribly rude if I just refused to budge?

Not a bit! That aisle seat is as much yours as a reserved one at the theater, which you wouldn't relinquish to any doddering number under the sun. A young man is even entitled to retain his aisle seat in the face of glares from dowagers and debs alike. Of course, you rise to admit other people to the pew or at least get your knees out of the picture as much as possible.

Please tell me what clothes are appropriate for morning, afternoon and evening summer weddings.

A gay print with a cunning flower hat is perfect for both morning and afternoon weddings either in the country or city. In the country you can even get away with a pastel suit or an extra pretty cotton frock with a great big romantic-as-all-get-out hat. Don't forget your white gloves if you'd be ultra-elegant, though for the duration of the war that much formality isn't a bit necessary. By the way, did you know that "pardon my glove" or the removal of one when you shake hands is now as passé as a Willkie button? You can shake hands till doomsady with your gloves on, and with nary an apology. Any wedding after six o'clock is a long-dress event. You can go utterly glamorous in your most formal gown or be equally right in a dinner dress. Some churches, of course, require the wearing of headgear, in which case any small excuse for a hat will do: a bit of veiling caught with a flower, a chiffon kerchief wound into a turban—practically anything goes as long as it's vaguely hatty.

I've been asked to be a bridesmaid and at first I was thrilled. However, I've now become paralyzed with fright over the expense. Do I pay for the entire outfit, and must I give a shower? My allowance is infinitesimal.

Unfortunately, being a bridesmaid does run into a bit of money for you must pay for the dress, shoes and hat yourself. The bride's sole contribution is the flowers. However, she always confers with her attendants about their dresses, and invariably they speak up if she's partial to one with too steep a price tag. Don't be a bit shy about this! Try to sway her in the direction of a really cute dress that you can gad in all summer long, and be adamant about a becoming color. You're in no way obligated to give a shower. Let the more moneyed "senior" bridesmaids attend to that.

I'm going to a wedding in a strange town where I don't know a soul but the bride. Could I possibly invite a local swain to take me? If not, how best to avoid wall-flowering it at the reception?

If you know the bride very, very well, ask her if you may import your own man. Never bring him without her permission. However, if you go unattached, think of the potential conquests! No one needs to introduce you to anyone at a wedding, you know. Every man is fair game, and with the atmosphere simply supercharged with romance, what could be sweeter? For a conversation starter with any solitary lad you see lurking about, there's always how ecstatic the couple looks, and you certainly hope he's the very best because she's such an angel. This generally leads to a eulogy on the groom, and in the course of the conversation you garner bits about the chap you're talking to with which to keep small talk going indefinitely. If you get bored with him, on to greener pastures.

We have a child bride on our hands! The very first one of our cronies is being married next month, and we want to give her a shower. There are seven of us involved and not one bright idea among us. Please help.

Why not make it a lingerie shower? But instead of just doling out the presents in the usual unimaginative way try this little fillip. String a wide, white ribbon across the room, clothesline fashion. Then with the tiniest of clothespins, hang up your things. Be sure to put your card under the clothespin so she'll know which is from whom. You can make the party a dessert bridge (dessert consisting of indescribable chocolate

Which Face Powder
GIVES YOUR SKIN COLOR-HARMONY?
THE TEST OF A FACE POWDER, my dear lady, is how its color blends with your skin; but woe betide you if the blending is imperfect, because that means garish streaks and noticeable blotches.
TRY THIS TEST. With the tip of your finger press out a bit of your present face powder against the hard surface of your mirror. Now can you see little streaks of raw color? Don't trust that kind of face powder to blend harmoniously with your skin.
FOR NATURAL, GIRL-LIKE COLOR HARMONY in your complexion, switch to Cashmere Bouquet Face Powder. So perfectly is the color blended into Cashmere Bouquet it gives your complexion an all-over veil of delicate beauty . . . a color harmony so natural you can detect no flaws. We get very few invitations to our graduation. Would it be proper to send out a lot of announcements to people I can't possibly invite?

Graduation announcements are considered in rather bad taste, and most schools no longer distribute them. They're really sort of gift come-ons and are frequently resented by recipients.

The family and various relatives are planning to send me flowers for graduation. Should they be sent to school?

Customs vary in every school, so we'd advise you to check with your pals about this. If their flowers are being delivered to school, you naturally don't want to feel orphan-ish without a bloom; on the other hand, you don't want to feel star-of-the-occasion-y if no one gets them but you.

I'm at a girls' school and have to invite a boy to our graduation dance. The boy I'd really love to ask has been to our house a couple of times with his family, but we've never had a date. Would I dare? And what tack should I use to make dead sure he'll come?

Invite him, by all means; he'll be flattered to death. Write him a friendly little note along the lines of: "It was so nice seeing you last week, and I did enjoy our chat ever so much. Lately we've been terribly busy trying to get smart for our exams, rehearsing for plays, etc., but on the sixteenth we're taking time out for fun. It's a prom—with divine refreshments and music—and informal, no less! Could you come? Have lined up at least a dozen gorgeous things who're dying to meet you, and can guarantee you'll be the 'beau' of the ball. With fingers crossed, Jane."

It's traditional at school to have everyone write in your yearbook. What's a good thing to put in a boy's book?

Something unsentimental—and something you won't mind your hubby and children coming across years hence. People hang on to yearbooks forever, and you never know when one's going to cross your path again. "Best of everything" plus your full name is the ticket for boys you hardly know. "Best always, Jane" is slightly warmer for the chaps you know quite well, but is definitely nothing you could pin a breach of promise suit on. For the favored few, something like "Don't you dare forget Janie" is heart-warming but harmless. Avoid anything lovey, and try not to put the exact same thing in every book.

After graduation there's always a dance at school. I haven't a date for it yet, and I don't know whether I want one. I live in dread of being horribly "stuck." Are there any ways to unstick oneself? Should you apologize to the boy if he's waltzing you round by the hour?

You get yourself asked to that dance! (Read up on "date bait" in our January Co-Ed—yours for ten cents sent to the Modern Screen Subscription Department, 149 Madison Ave., New York, N. Y.) And here's how not to get stuck. Brush up on your dancing so you're really good. Then look your very most heart-breaking—nice shiny hair, radiant complexion, your prettiest gown. Before you leave for the dance, get a stag's-eye-view of yourself (that's from the rear, remember) and check on attractiveness of hair (it may be gorgeous from the front, sad from the back), invisibility of shoulder straps and need of a girdle. Once at the dance, concentrate on your date. If you and he look as if you're having a wonderful time, the rest of the boys will be intrigued. Don't get grim if a few pieces are played, and you're still with him. However, before it becomes chronic say to him, but casually, "Gosh, Bill, I hope this isn't going to be one of my off nights. I think I'll go glam up a trifle while you talk me up to your cronies." When you come back he'll have rounded up some chums. And once the stags see you being cut in on, they'll cut, too. Of course, one tried and true popularity insurer is to have a few couples to dinner before the dance. Then when you get there, your little group sort of stays together, and everyone's a belle.

I need money for college next year and want a job this summer. Please, please offer some concrete advice.

Ah! That's another story. See you next month with ideas on how to make this summer count—financially, romantically—you name it, we've got it!

He opens the door of the black Cadillac convertible, gets in beside you and drives to Tale of the Cock, a little loghouse restaurant where the food is good, prices reasonable and swing bands anathema. If you want a cocktail, you'll have to take it alone. George drinks milk. His favorite meal consists of salad, filet mignon, baked potato, any vegetable, ice cream or fresh fruit and more milk. At dinner you gab about everything under the sun and decide what movie you'll go to.

Whether or not you hold hands at the movies, depends. If it's a cold show, you don't. (Q.—Even with Hedy? A.—Don't be silly.) The cream of the evening follows—a drive to the beach, radio tuned to a symphony, waves lapping, star-spangled sky stretching off to infinity. On the way home, orange juice or something at a drive-in because Hedy loves drive-ins.

A couple of weeks ago they stopped at the Farmers' Market, loaded up on groceries and drove to Sunland to spend the week-end with Hedy's hairdresser. The girls cooked, George and the hairdresser's husband did the dishes. George says his girl looks gorgeous in an apron. He won't talk much about her, says what's the use, he could never do the subject justice. But his face talks for him—turns kind of still with worship.

He calls her Penny—his lucky Penny. For Valentine's Day she gave him a money clip. As he unclasped it, a penny fell out. "That's me," said Hedy.

Bill Lundigan . . .

Since Bill Lundigan's current dates are non-professional, we won't drag their names in. That leaves the field open for you.

He phones for a date and makes it short and sweet, because he hates phone gabbing. "Also easier on my Irish ego," he explains, "if I get turned down. Why linger over pain?"

"Busy tonight?" he asks. If the answer's no, "Would you like to be?" If the answer's yes, "Dinner? Okay. See you at seven."

He thinks there's something routine and mechanical about date-corsages and prefers to send flowers between times. He can't get dressed without yelling, "What happened to my shirts? Where in thunder's that blue tie?" Since one brother got married and another joined the army, his clothes do fewer disappearing acts. But he still yells.

"As I don't wear them, darling," his mother replies, "I really can't say." Then she breaks down and finds them for him. There's also a parting gag, carried over from the days when she sent the boys off in knickers. "Remember who you are and what you represent."

"Yes, momma," he assents, pinches her dignified cheek and is off.

He's tolerant about being kept waiting. Having been late himself on occasion, he knows how it is. Besides, it gives him a handle for wisecracks, strictly high-school stuff, like: "Why don't you sell the cow and move into town?"

If you want to see the gleam of approval in his eyes, wear something black and simple, with a touch of white and a single clip. And admire his Lincoln Continental, it's his baby. Hopefully he leaves the car top down till you ask him to put it up. His soul may be blighted for the moment, but conscience tells him it was a dirty trick to leave it down in the first place, especially if you're going where the coiffure really has to be coiffed.

For food, music and atmosphere he'll take you to Bublichki. He loves the intimacy induced by candlelight, softly-cushioned chairs and Chico's violin, and will deepen said intimacy by dousing the candle on your table. He can't resist the hors d'oeuvres and doesn't have to, his capacity covering seven meals a day. As the main dish, he'll suggest shashlik, beef Stroganoff or chicken Kiev—and won't serve the chicken himself, not any more he won't, not since he tried it once and sent butter squirming in all directions, chiefly his eye. Now he lets the waiter do it. He also tried halvah once. The more he chewed the thicker it got in his mouth. So he avoids Russian desserts and winds up with coffee.

After dinner you'll drive out to Charley Foy's in the valley to catch Phil Silver. You can dance at Charley's, too, though the floor is small. Bill's an ad lib dancer, never knows what step he's doing till it's done.

Lousy or not, he loves to dance. So if you insist on a dancing smootheroo, maybe you'd better go skating with Bill. He'll pick you up at five, take you to the Brown Derby for a sandwich, then on to the Westwood Skating Rink, cosily patterned after a Swiss chalet. There you'll spend three hours or so, enjoying the music as much as anything else—the rhythm and grace of waltzes played by a deep-toned organ. You meet friends and sit out to chat and smoke and sip Pepsis, then you skate again and probably flop—everyone does—and Bill picks you up and dusts you off and makes comforting sounds, after which he flops.

By nine-thirty you've had enough, and want to eat again. So you go to Schwab's. Schwab's is the famous drug-store at the corner of Laurel Canyon and Sunset. At one time or another they've staked half the players in Hollywood to meals, and some players don't forget. It's the rendezvous of big names and small—the country store of Hollywood—all it needs is a potbellied stove to spit at. You bump into Bob Taylor and Jack Benny, and Ray Milland's at the cash register, making change because the clerks are busy. Bill sits you on a stool, slithers behind the counter, cooks your hamburger and mixes your soda himself. You get more laughs per hour at Schwab's than per month at fancier places. You don't ever want to go home.

But it's getting late, and Bill's working tomorrow, and if you've had a good time and want to reciprocate, you say let's drive home with the top down—and boy! do you rate.

After leaving you, he gathers up the morning papers to read in bed—covers the headlines, sports, movie stuff, Runyon, Durling, Bill Henry—and falls asleep like a cherub surrounded by newsprint.

Jackie Cooper . . .

A minor quake rumbled through Hollywood columns a while ago, because Bonita Granville and Jackie Cooper went out one night, but not with each other. It was just a little experiment they were trying and didn't mean a thing. Bun is still Jack's girl.

They don't go out dancing very often these days. Not only because of the recent death of Jack's mother, but because times being what they are, it seems silly to spend a lot of money at nightspots.

Their dates are frequent and informal. Jack phones. "Want to do something tonight? Early movie and bowling?" Bun says yes and, "Let's have dinner here. Six-thirty so we can catch the first show."

When they eat out, he makes her happy by donning a white shirt, one of his two blue suits and a red-and-blue-striped tie. Overdressing, he calls it, but she calls it lovely. In return, he keeps after her to wear more color. Averse to anything even faintly showy, she favors beige and brown. So Jack makes a deal. "I'll wear my blue suit if you'll wear a print."

Tonight he wears his own favorite rig—brown or gray slacks and a sports coat. Hair slicked down with grease else he looks like a Ubangi. A short tie with a large knot. Knize-Ten toilet water. His dresser is stacked with gift bottles but, except for Knize-Ten, they're just pretty bottles to him. A white handkerchief for his breast pocket and a special technique for its arrangement. "What's the patent, Coop?" ask the boys.

Bun meets him at the door. Dinner, preceded by little cocktail sausages—they don't drink—is served promptly, this being Mrs. Granville's contribution toward getting them out on time. They have steak or roast beef because Jack likes red meat. If the roast is large, he carves it. Mrs. Granville gets a kick out of that. They have baked potatoes and three vegetables, because Jack likes baked potatoes and a lot of vegetables. Ice cream's the only dessert he cares about, so he gets ice cream even if the others have cake. Bun's crazy for sweets, but thinks maybe she shouldn't take dessert. Jack shoves the plate under her nose and grins as she says, "I won't, I won't," but does. For reasons he can't explain, he loves to see her eat.

In theory, Bun's ready to leave right after dinner. Through long, hard experience, Jack's resigned to a fifteen-minute wait. She has to change bags, she has to rub off her lipstick and put it on again, she has to muss up her hair and comb it out again. Jack thinks there's something girls like about keeping a fellow hanging round the living-room. He used to fume but gave it up. Where does it get you? Now he sticks a record on the machine and, like Montgomery, plays with the dog. It's his own dog. Bun took him when Jack moved to an apartment. "Treats him better than I did. Worries about his food and brushes him every five minutes."

Like Lundigan, Jack's a fervent top-downer, and Bun rides with her head done up in two neckerchiefs—actually an emergency head bandage as Jack learned to make them when he was a Boy Scout. If a Spencer Tracy picture's showing, they go to that, sit through the cartoon and newsreel but not the second feature, as Jack's eyes get sore when they're fixed too long on the screen. When the plot thickens, Bun squeezes his hand. Sometimes she likes to tell him what's going to happen, a procedure he discourages.

Next stop—Hollywood recreation on Vine. They take off their coats and put on bowling shoes. Maybe they'll find a little competition in the next alley and bet a nickel or dime on a game. They're both average players. Jack doesn't really like to bowl with four because, after making a good shot, he can't wait to get up there again.

After an hour or so they've had enough and go on to Carpenter's Drive-in at Sunset and Vine, perhaps dropping by at the Music Shop for a record. The radio's always on, tuned to record programs or dance music, preferably Dave Rose or Kostelanetz or Tommy Dorsey. Over coffee and hamburgers with melted cheese or chicken sandwiches, all white meat, they chew the fat about pictures and performances and the war and "things to do in the future." They're making no personal plans till the war's over. "How can we?" says Jack. "I'll be twenty in September. Twenty to kids nowadays means just one thing."

He gets Bun in not later than twelve or twelve-thirty and takes two good-night kisses home with him—one from his girl, one from his girl's mother.

Cesar Romero . . .

Last, a glamor-date with Cesar Romero. They don't happen often. Cesar's outlived the night club phase, prefers informal get-togethers at the homes of his friends—Ann Sothern, the MacMurrays, Powers, Millands, Walter Langs. Besides, you think twice nowadays before shelling out for things that aren't Red Cross or USO or defense bonds. Finally, he's on duty three nights a week as first lieutenant in the California State Guards.

All of which isn't to say that he's turned recluse. He steps out of a Saturday night with Ann Sothern or Carole Landis or Priscilla Stillman. Whether they go formal or not is up to the girl. So far as Cesar's concerned, a dinner jacket's as comfortable as a suit coat. Ann likes to dress. With Carole, it's a toss-up. If she decides against it, Cesar wears any business suit that's not a tweed.

While bathing, he sings an improvisation that makes no sense, and he can't sing in the first place, but it sounds like a million dollars in the shower. To make himself smell pretty, he uses an old-time preparation called Florida Water, very cheap, very clean and pleasant to the nose.

He doesn't send flowers because most girls find them a nuisance. Either the pins leave marks or your dress has little thin shoulder-straps, and you have to stick the corsage on your purse where it gets in the way, or carry it and look silly.

If he likes your dress, Cesar will tell you so. If you go in for midriffs, which he loathes, he'll keep his mouth politely but significantly shut. In either case, he'll say, "Shall we go to Romanoff's?" and you'll say yes. The food's superb, and the music doesn't blare. Cesar recommends the split minute-steak with potatoes and a green vegetable and nothing beforehand to take the edge off. If you're going to have a good steak, says Cesar, enjoy it. Don't stuff yourself first with shrimp salad and soup.

At Romanoff's you always meet people you know. Maybe you take your vodka martinis to a friend's table till the steaks are ready. Cesar drinks milk with his dinner and coffee after it. No exotic desserts. Ice cream or a piece of good apple pie.

His manners are a nice blend of American informality with Latin courtesy. He never says, "Let's do this," always, "What would you like?" If you like entertainment, there's the Little Troc where Lena Horn sings and Katherine Dunham dances. You can dance there, too, but the floor is small. So if you'd rather just dance, how about Ciro's?

It needn't cost you a fortune, Cesar points out, to go to Ciro's. You can order a lot of drinks and wind up with a check that looks like the war debt. Or you can get away with four or five dollars. He's gone to Ciro's with girls who didn't want to drink, and they've sat all evening over a Pepsi. He doesn't say Ciro likes it, but he's out to please, not Ciro, just a girl and himself.

You sit out a lot, enjoy the music, dance maybe five or six times. Cesar likes the tango and the good old fox-trot, and will rumba if you wish, though he doesn't much care for it. As for the conga, he thinks there ought to be a law against people hopping around in hideous contortions.

You stay till closing time, which is two, then if you're hungry again, drive to the Brown Derby, open all night, for scrambled eggs. At your door he'll tell you what charming company you've been, and he hopes to have the pleasure soon again. If he's not caught in a blackout, he'll be home by three-thirty. Once anti-aircraft started popping, and Cesar worked with the wardens till seven.

Sometimes he'll have dinner at Ann's house or she at his. They'll play gin rummy or go down to Olvera Street where the Mexicans sell their wares from colorful booths, or drive out to ride the roller-coasters at Venice. One of their pleasantest evenings was recently spent at the Ft. MacArthur Canteen. The boys were a little shy at first, but Ann soon had them around the piano, singing their heads off. A couple of homesick Cuban kids from Key West took possession of Cesar and chattered Spanish with him. Later they played gin rummy and chewed the rag over coffee and doughnuts. The boys enjoyed it, but no more than Ann and Cesar who made a date to come back in two weeks.

Any more questions, girls? Will he kiss you good night? Certainly. To send you home happy? Hell, no. To send himself home happy, logically enough!

I SAW IT HAPPEN

It was at the World's Fair "Girlie Show," and the barker called out in his typical barker manner, "Beelieve me, folksies, if'n this here show's good enough for Joan Bennett and Walter Wanger, then by gum it oughter be good enough for you!" And sure enough, there were Joan and Walter coming out of a side door. Surprise! Funny thing, while we were nearly dying from the heat, she was wearing a smart fur jacket, looking entirely unconcerned.

LAST WILL AND TESTAMENT OF CAROLE LOMBARD

poking days. "A little sign to say that love cannot die—" laughter, too, cannot die while we remember Carole. And she's remembered—

They were full-bodied and lusty, those jokes of Carole's. "Vigil in the Night" was a grim picture, shot in long, still corridors, silent and sombre. George Stevens, the director, was a duck-hunter, and it appealed to Carole to break the solemnity of the picture-making by suggesting a shooting week-end in the Gables' blind near Bakersfield. "Uh-uh," Stevens said, "the best duck hunting is in Imperial Valley around Salton Sea." So he went there, and he didn't find a duck. Monday morning he came back onto the "Vigil" set and stared. Dead ducks hung from the chandeliers, draped the walls, a decoy stared at him with beady eyes and six live ducks quacked from a cage. "Personally," read Carole's card attached to this greeting, "we didn't have any trouble finding ducks."

Equally imaginative was her Christmas gift for Myron Selznick. Carole, rummaging through trick presents of her own, found a little tank complete with toy soldier and gun. That offered possibilities, given a phone and a metal worker to consult. When Myron, a few days later, heard a clatter at his door, he saw a toy tank advancing across the floor, with a soldier in it methodically putting his thumb to his nose in perfect rhythm as he advanced.

"What do you want for Christmas?" she demanded. She had money now, and people wanted things, and to sturdy Carole there was no sense in waste. "What do you specially want?" Loretta Francell, nicknamed "Bucket" by Carole whose blonde hair she dressed for thirteen years, had an equally practical notion. "The bathroom seat has been damaged," Bucket suggested. "How about a gorgeous new white Church seat?" So Bucket found the plumber attending to this Christmas task, proffering the card that went with the remembrance "To dear Bucket and Ralph—when you use this, remember Carole loves you."

Loretta was Carole's long-time friend. Their birthdays, October 6th and October 3rd, linked them under an astrological sign, and like all who were close to Carole, Miss Francell found her warm and affectionate and eager. There was the Ford car that Carole bought for Loretta's birthday, and, bursting with excitement, had to tell her about a month before. There was the philosophy that spilled over. From Carole's bequests, Loretta remembers this. "I'm tired of helping people," the hairdresser scolded. "My husband and I have taken more youngsters to live with us, and as soon as they get going good, they leave us without a thank you. But I never learn. Just the other night, the daughter of a friend of mine needed going over. So I toiled out and gave her the works, and fixed her up. She looked pretty when I finished."

"Gee," Carole said, "I wish I could have looked in and seen you. And maybe could have helped. You know, Bucket, you can't get tired of helping, really. If you're where you can—that's really what the whole thing of living is about, don't you honestly and truly think so?"

That's the way she felt about it, and that's the way she behaved. Money, advice, help—if you needed it, you told Carole and she came through.

Sick? Betty Hall, Carole's stand-in for six and a half years, doubled for Carole in the long, dreary rain-in-the-night scenes in "Vigil." Pneumonia followed. Betty was afraid, facing weeks of hospitalization, worrying about her job. "Don't worry," they told her, "someone is taking care of everything." That wasn't the big shots, who might not have found out—that was Carole, who did. When Betty came back and found the seasonal shut-down in jobs going on, she also found two weeks salary in the mail from Carole Lombard.

Sick? Lots of people phone the florist and have flowers sent around with a card. Those friends of Carole Lombard who were ill, have a bequest of memory more sturdy than this. Flowers came, sure.

Pretty, of course. But you look at flowers awhile, and they begin to smell of the sick room. You watch the door and wonder. Is there ever going to be anything happening again? Carole made things happen. After the flowers, she telephoned the Brown Derby chefs and suggested your favorite dish, nicely arranged. "And in through the door came that!" Johnny Engstead, photographer, remembers. "Then it was time for a laugh, and Carole could always figure out a gag. And then came what she called 'the important gift'—something that a person could keep after the hospital days were over. When Mitchell Leisen was ill, she sent him a handsome comforter, for instance, and one of the girls at Paramount was given a stunning bedjacket. And finally Carole made a personal call. She followed this routine on all occasions. No one knew how she found the time—but she did."

Carole could always figure out a gag—

That's not a bad way to be remembered, for Carole's were funny and good, and as ego-deflaters, they worked. Carole couldn't get over being surprised at being 'way up there with the big shots. A yellow-haired gal—right in among 'em. Every now and then those boisterous spirits broke through. They remember those gags in Hollywood, they chuckle, and they mop their eyes and remember—

When Danny Winkler, big-shot at RKO, moved into his new berth, Carole was working on one of the four films she made for his company. She wanted his first day on the lot to have "something to remember her by." So she phoned her florist. "Get me all the old dead flowers that you can. Make up a giant good luck horseshoe of wilted carnations and stuff and toss wilted flowers around the carpet. Stick 'em in the vases. And send in some white doves to fly around to add the right touch." Mr. Winkler walked into this bower of wilted posies, encircled by white doves —with love from Lombard. He remembers!

And there was Harry Stradling, cameraman, who likes things artistic, shadows falling. Twigs and branches, shadow-etched on the film. In "Vigil in the Night," the little man with the twig was always there, running around holding it "a little higher, a little lower —shadowing Lombard's cheek." There was nothing the matter with Lombard's cheek! On the final day's shooting, she grabbed Harry's hand. The huge stage door opened, and outside, standing on the studio street, was a great, beautiful, full-

Are they moving in on you—those blemishes you've worked so hard to prevent . . . enlarged pore openings, oily shine, blackheads, or rough scaly dryness?

Thousands of girls and women have found the right answer to their skin problems in two creams which are different. Phillips' Milk of Magnesia Creams.

PHILLIPS' MILK OF MAGNESIA SKIN CREAM (FORMERLY TEXTURE CREAM)
Give this remarkable cream a chance to work its benefits at night. Here's what it does: It softens and neutralizes accumulations often of an acid nature in the external pore openings. And because it contains cholesterol it holds moisture in the skin and so helps to keep it supple and pliant, and to relieve excessive dryness.

A smooth-holding foundation. Phillips' Skin Cream also seems to have a special ability to take and hold make-up. It prepares the skin by removing excess oiliness and softening roughness and dryness so that powder and rouge go on evenly, and last.

PHILLIPS' MILK OF MAGNESIA CLEANSING CREAM
You'll find this cream cleanses in a different way too! It not only loosens and rolls away the surface dirt but penetrates the outer pore openings and cleanses away accumulations which may daily lodge there. Leaves your skin not only clean but softened, smoothed, and refreshed.

Try this different kind of beneficial care which Phillips' Creams give for your skin.

grown olive tree. "Here's your tree, Harry," Lombard cried.

There's a sequel to that. Stradling lived in an apartment, no room for trees. So he went out and bought valley acreage for his tree, and he's a rancher now.

Carole's gags: When a holy gent running the studio had decreed "No gentlemen allowed in ladies' dressing rooms," Carole forgot. She wanted to talk contract with her agent, Frank Joyce. Talking with Carole was fun, and shouts and howls of merriment assailed the ears of the pained studio head.

"Have you a man in your room?" he phoned Carole.

She waved for Joyce to climb into her clothes press in French farce fashion, and—

"Come over and see!" she told the inquirer.

He stomped in, he saw, he blushed and apologized. And then a muffled sneeze from the wardrobe betrayed the invader, and the French farce was complete. Everybody blushed but Carole. They remember, today, how she laughed.

She didn't like stuffed shirts. The producer of several of her best films impressed her that way. But discipline is severe in the films, and Carole had to go through the motions. She knew a girl whose father and mother were deaf. Carole had always been entranced by her friend's fluent use of the sign language. Now she found a use for it. "Teach me the signs for 'you're an old fool' and some other similar notions," she begged.

Carole met the gentleman with her choicest smile. But there was something he never quite understood. "Funny gal, Lombard," he said to a friend. "I wonder what she means by all those signs she makes with her hands?"

George Stevens, quiet-spoken director of "Vigil in the Night," was no stuffed shirt, but he was new to Carole as a type. In the middle of the day's shooting, he would retire into introspection, and no Carole cajolery could blast him out of it. Lips tightly folded, he would sit in deep thought in his chair. At three o'clock one morning Myron Selznick, her agent, had a phone call. "Yes?" he asked sleepily.

"Myron," Carole's decisive tones informed him, "I have just discovered what Stevens' silences mean."

"Oh, yeah?" said Selznick. "What?"

"Not a darn thing," said Carole and hung up.

the hand is quicker . . .

Selznick remembers that and another time as well. Contract renewal time was round again, and Carole opened her mail to find the new Selznick contract ready for her signature. The madcap in her burst loose again—that wild, gay child who was forever amazed at this rigamarole of papers and ink. She phoned Russell Birdwell, her press agent. "Bird," she said, "I'm playing a swell trick on Myron. Get a printer to imitate the contract type, and we'll have fun." Selznick signed his copy of the contract, and two weeks went by when Carole's attorney called him and asked for an accounting for Miss Lombard.

"Accounting," said Selznick, "who's crazy? Why does she want an accounting from me?"

"Because the contract you both signed calls for ten per cent of your profits and complete control of your books," replied the attorney. "Take a look at it."

Selznick looked and turned green. It was there in black and white . . . "and for one dollar and other good and valuable consideration, I, the undersigned, Myron Selznick, do give ten per cent of the profits of my company and do promise to open my books—"

She spoke every language, saltily, vigorously. "Come over here," she told a surly five-year-old. "I'm going to kick you in the shins," he informed her. "And if you do," this amazing grownup returned softly, "I'll knock those pretty little baby teeth of yours right down your throat." He stared—and grinned. And the next day he brought her an apple. She knew how!

Her speech was racy, charged, vital. And she would detour for a pun when one offered. Sig Ruman, Gestapo chief of her last film, "To Be or Not to Be," recalls the day they were doing the scene where, as Colonel Erhardt, ("So they call me 'Concentration Camp Erhardt,' eh?") he visits Maria Tura (Carole) in her Warsaw rooms. Erhardt was nervous, he paced up and down. "You make me nervous," Carole told him. "Sit down." He couldn't, he said, "I've got to concentrate on my lines and I concentrate better walking back and forth."

"So that's why they call you 'Concentration Camp Erhardt'!" Carole exclaimed, as she dodged. "If you concentrate too hard, Sig, you may have concentration cramp—" forgetting no one . . .

Something to remember her by? The memories are legion, close packed, glowing and rich. Helen Hunt's little six-year-old daughter, Beverly, remembers the white kid gloves and scarf that she'd specially wanted. And Carole "happening by" with them on Beverly's birthday. The models, the studio crews, her staff, all remember actual gifts. Irene of Bullock's-Wilshire remembers the engagement book gift "so you won't forget appointments"—a gentle, Caroleish reminder. The girls Carole's size who got her dresses remember. Once, when a charity wanted an old Lombard gown to be auctioned off, she wrote a check "because if I send a dress, the kids will miss out," she said. And Clark remembers, among other things, the time when Selznick International studios auctioned off its stuff and closed. Carole bought shovels, rakes, pitchforks, picks—"These will be swell for Paw."

Those were things purchaseable with money. Carole stinted not at all in more precious gifts of time and attention. Margaret Tallichet, now wife of Director William Wyler, remembers when she took a newspaperman to Carole for an interview and found the star staring at her instead of concentrating on the reporter. And presently Carole telephoned an agent—Zeppo Marx—telling him to drop around and see her. She called Adolph Zukor and asked for an appointment. She bullied him into giving Margaret a part-time acting contract while she went on with her job as a secretary.

"And then," Mrs. Wyler remembers, "she arranged for the studio dramatic coach to give me lessons, and she had Loretta Francell, her hairdresser, cut and dress my hair. And after that she asked for a portrait sitting for me." The lonely little Texas girl went to dinners and parties at Lombard's, and presently her career was launched.

They remember these things in Hollywood—"a little sign to say that love cannot die—"

She was no cold and glittering star, gleaming aloft, not Carole. But how they remember! The rocking horse, wreathed in flowers, that she presented to Director Mitchell Leisen in memory of his fondness for the ponies. The huge carnation-covered "set piece" for Garson Kanin. The real horseshoes bound in red ribbon for her cast members. The trained bear for Director Norman Taurog who'd wearily coped with a bear through "We're Not Dressing." Taurog raged at his gift then—now he blinks and smiles, and remembers—

She loved parties, and she gave them with gusto. Roman parties with guests in togas. Cuban parties with rumba orchestras, a Hallowe'en party with bales of hay all over the floors and chairs, an appalling sight for evening guests who'd been told to come in white ties and tails.

She did that till she tired of it—and then it was the ranch and hard work and Clark. And finally, service for the country she loved so richly.

"If I make pictures, I make money, and I can spend it. People depend on me and I have responsibilities." So she worked, and she made $468,000 in a glorious year. Surtaxes? Sure—that's where it came from and she meant to go right on making it and giving it back in hunks "for the duration." Her tax money would buy ships and guns and ammunitions. She wasn't quitting.

She wasn't quitting even though, on those slender, squared shoulders, there rested a burden that few strong men could have handled. She wasn't quitting, and she wasn't satisfied. She wanted to do something personal, tough, real.

So a plane crashed in flames, and in the pyre there perished what was physical of Carole Lombard. But the legend grows and grows, and above that pyre, there's the sound of laughter because she lived for laughter. Let that be her last will and testament—that because she lived, a garland of memories grows green and gay forever around her spirit.

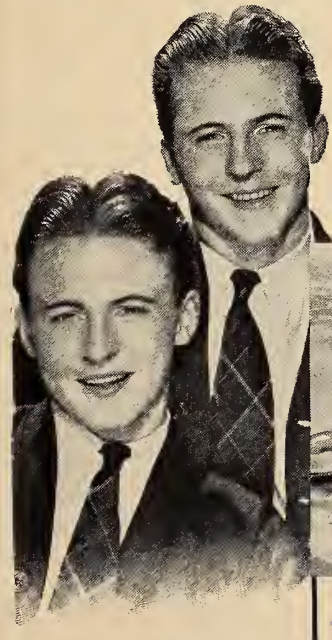
TWICE AS BRIGHT

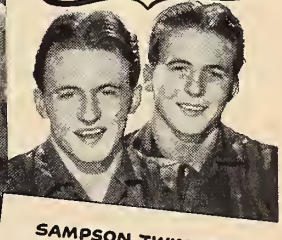


Jack and Alan, the Sampson Twins of Norwood Park, Illinois, champion swimmers, tournament golfers, team up in a new contest.

"Honors are usually pretty even between us, in swimming, golf, or track...almost any sport. But when we made the tooth powder test... wow! Jack beat me a mile because he was using Pepsodent... I had chosen another well-known leading brand."

"It wasn't even close! At school, friends knew Jack at a glance... because his teeth were twice as bright! No question about it—Pepsodent made the difference! That's why the family began using it, too, even before the test was over!"

IT'S A PHOTO-FINISH TIE... WE'RE BOTH USING PEPSODENT NOW!



SAMPSON TWIN TEST CONFIRMS THIS FACT:

INDEPENDENT LABORATORY TESTS FOUND NO OTHER DENTIFRICE THAT COULD MATCH THE HIGH LUSTRE PRODUCED BY PEPSODENT. BY ACTUAL TEST... PEPSODENT PRODUCES A LUSTRE TWICE AS BRIGHT AS THE AVERAGE OF ALL OTHER LEADING BRANDS!

For the safety of your smile... use Pepsodent twice a day... see your dentist twice a year.

your fingernail isn't a living part of your body, it grows from vital cells beneath the visible part of your nail, and this area is nourished by the bloodstream. Whenever your body lacks sufficient water or those nail-building materials found in milk, orange juice, fresh vegetables, butter and cream, fingernails become dry and brittle. Extreme fatigue, overwork, nervousness or any depression in your health also show up in nail imperfections, so organize your hours to allow time for rest and regular living habits.

However, you can give brittle nails more resiliency and pliancy by extra lubrication. Use oily preparations when manicuring, and several times a day massage cuticle oil or a special manicure oil or cream around the sides and under the tips. Then keep the surrounding area of your fingers soft and smooth with hand cream or lotion. Before retiring at night, dip your nails in warm manicure oil and let them soak for a few minutes. Last, massage your hands with a soothing cream or lotion and leave on all lubricants overnight. If you wear soft cotton gloves, you'll protect bedcovers from being soiled.

Tapered, becomingly tinted fingernails are desirable attributes of charm, but they deserve hands that are just as carefully groomed. Hand lotions and creams are your allies in keeping skin soft and protected, so keep them handy wherever you work and apply them before every job, before going outdoors and always after washing hands. To make the most of their softening, soothing qualities, massage them well into your hands stroking downward as if you were drawing on tight kid gloves.

And wear real gloves as much as possible—durable work ones for such heavy jobs as housecleaning, gardening or painting—and rubber ones whenever you need to keep your hands in water for any length of time. And don't miss a good fashion bet by neglecting to wear gloves on the street—spring or summer. They're not only smart accessories to any outfit, they are important hand protectors.

Washing your hands properly has a lot to do with their beauty, so never be satisfied with rubbing them together with a piece of soap and drying them hurriedly. Take a few extra seconds each time to do the job right, and you'll be rewarded by hands that are whiter and softer. Scrub your hands briskly in lukewarm water using mild soap and a soft brush, and concentrating on knuckles and fingertips to remove any fine grime or dust that may mar the texture of your skin. Rinse your hands carefully in clear water and dry them thoroughly, pushing back the cuticle on each finger with your towel. Then, of course, follow up with lotion or cream.

Come summer and short-sleeved fashions—and elbows come out of winter hiding to add to or detract from your appearance. If they're rough or dry, they're most deglamorizing, so let them share the nightly beauty treatment you give your hands. It's worth your while.

Knowing your hands are lovely to look at builds up poise which expresses itself in confident gestures, but even so, pay attention to hand behavior if you want it to say flattering things about you. If movements are easy and natural, they denote charm and self-assurance, but short, nervous mannerisms make you appear awkward and ill at ease. Why not sit in front of a mirror while chatting with a member of your family or a friend and see just what impression your hands convey. Since their grace and expressiveness depend so much on the flexibility of wrists, keep yours limber by the following exercise each day: Drop your arms loosely at your sides, then shake them vigorously from the wrists for a minute or two. Then, whenever you reach for something, lead with your wrist and let your fingers follow through naturally. This action is ever so much more graceful than rigid arm movements. But beware of affected mannerisms. Hands which wave wildly about in meaningless gestures or which finger with beads or with other objects distract attention from your conversation and are every bit as unattractive as tightly clasped or clenched, nervous hands.

Useful hands are the fashion for 1942—but so are shapely, expressive hands that are well groomed and lovely to look at. Not only do they do their work more capably, but they have an appealing charm that begets and holds romance.

With the arrival of law in Nome in the form of Judge Stillman, Cherry runs into competition. For with the judge comes his niece Helen Chester, a fashionable beauty attracted to Roy. And with the law, too, comes a sudden and mystifying upsurge in claim jumping. The judge, in reality, heads a crooked bunch whose aim in Alaska is to get control of The Midas.

Worked out in the best action tradition of the movies, the picture moves from climax to climax. Glennister and his men storm the claim-jumped Midas aboard a train, crashing through the barricades, sweeping into a gun fight with the crooked gang. Cherry, using her best weapon, her beauty, corners the tough and crooked Gold Commissioner, McNamara, while Roy retakes the mine. It's on Roy's return to the Northern that the famous fist fight takes place. Sweeping through several rooms and landing some beautiful haymakers, the men battle it out savagely.

There's a stellar cast in "The Spoilers." Marlene Dietrich, who earned her spurs in "Destry Rides Again," plays Cherry Malotte. John Wayne is Glennister, Randolph Scott draws McNamara. It's a two-fisted cast rounded out by Harry Carey; and don't miss Richard Barthelmess in a supporting role.

"The Spoilers" is tested and proved action drama. It has all the sweep and excitement of a Western, set against Alaska's snows and blizzards. Here are all the familiar and satisfying old favorites: guns blazing in a darkened room, horses outlined against the sunset, fists pounding, a tough, smart villain, a two-gun hero, the old settler and the courteous drunk and the beautiful, self-willed woman.

Put them together and more often than not they add up into an hour of sheer entertainment. If anything is native and original to the movies, it's the rip-roaring Western. The movies were weaned on it in their early days. They've never quite forgotten how to do them.—Univ.

THIS GUN FOR HIRE

Peeling a cautious weather eye into the skies over Hollywood these days you might be able to spot a trend forming North by North-East. It's not a brand new, just-out-of-the-box trend; it's been in hibernation in some out-of-the-way cave around Beverly Hills. It's the old gangster epic, shined up a bit, slanted for the times and touched with international treachery rather than the pure Chicago brand. But it still carries a gun.

"This Gun For Hire" begins in a cheap San Francisco boarding house where an odd character named the Raven wakes of a morning to go about his business. Without putting too fine a point on it, his business is killing; it's his gun that's for hire. And it's hired by some of the damnedest people this side of the Axis territories. There's a bulky gent, terrified of violence, loving ice cream sundaes and peppermint candies: a crochety chemical magnate, complete with wheelchair, who sits behind three sets of barricaded doors and chortles at every killing while he sips his milk mush.

It's not all blood and thunder by any means. For Veronica Lake is mixed up in the proceedings, and where Veronica is, you're likely to find Cupid as well. There's a spot of singing, too, for Miss Lake plays the part of a night club entertainer and they manage to find room for a production number or two. But the whole business winds up in a skyscraper with bullets winging and dead bodies strewing the elegant floors.

Sounds complicated? Well, it is. "This Gun For Hire" follows the trail of the murderous Raven and the trail of a highly important chemical formula as they weave through the lives of several people. Half the impact of a picture like "This Gun For Hire" is in the complicated crossing and criss-crossing of the plots, all tying into a neat knot at the end.

Stacked up against some fairly recent thrillers like "The Maltese Falcon," "I Wake Up Screaming," "Johnny Eager"—"This Gun For Hire" doesn't quite make the grade. But for all of that, it's different, tense and worth an hour or so of your time. There are some odd and unprecedented characters with a sort of weird fascination. Of the three great Hollywood themes—make 'em laugh, make 'em cry or make 'em shiver—this one sets out to do the shivering job. It doesn't quite succeed; but maybe that's a reflex from today's headlines. There's little left to make us shiver, that's sure.

Sad to say, Veronica Lake seems to be slipping back into that dead pan style of delivery. She's still startlingly beautiful and wondrously photogenic; maybe that's enough. Laird Cregar and Robert Preston handle the other main roles. Cregar, who's really a hunk of man, adds another feather to his cap; a very clever actor, Mr. Cregar.

In the none-too-sympathetic role of The Raven, Paramount has cast its new discovery, Alan Ladd. He turns in a nice job, neatly conceived and tautly projected. But from the one smile he ventures on the screen, it's easy to see that he's due for better things than this role. He can come out from behind the gun; the world is waiting for a bit of sunshine. All things considered he's not really up to the old triumvirate of gangster killers, Muni-Cagney-Robinson, Inc. He's a good deal more handsome, though.—Par.

P. S.

"Ronnie" Lake receives her first screen kiss from Bob Preston. It was really eight, so the cameraman could get all the angles. Said Preston: "I'm giving my day's salary to charity." Commented jittery Veronica, "I—I'm going to ask for a stunt check" . . . Laird Cregar, 6' 4" tips the scale at 280 and looks mighty, mighty big alongside 5' 2", 96-pound Veronica. Laird once worked at Paramount as a member of the swing gang, moving furniture between sets . . . Coincidence Dept.: Laird once used the name of Alan Ladd Miles. He's already made two pictures with Alan Ladd, who has the lead in this one . . . Ladd is the 24-year-old actor hailed as the "find of the year." His agent, who plugged long and hard to get him a break, is former star Sue Carol . . . Veronica and the second femme lead, Pamela Blake, once worked in a picture together ("Sorority House") when Veronica was known as "Constance Keane" and Pamela was "Adele Pearce" . . . The pic has two locales—San Francisco and Los Angeles. Every scene shot in traditionally foggy San Francisco is bright with sunshine. The Los Angeles scenes, shot in pouring rain, are going to make the Chamber of Commerce very unhappy . . . The studio had to rent $6000 worth of tropical fish to fill the huge bowls in the "Neptune Club" . . . Veronica again climbs into men's clothes for a few scenes and gets all mussed up being dragged through gas houses, alleys and such . . . Mr. Cregar, for all his avoirdupois, can kick 'way over his head and turn perfect cartwheels!

THE GREAT MAN'S LADY

Roll out the wailing wall. For "The Great Man's Lady" is a bad picture; silly, overly sentimental and pointless. It would be easy enough to pass it off with a wisecrack or two and leave it to blush in its flat black cans; but it's bad manners to joke at a wake.

If it were a jerry-built quickie, shot on the cuff with a cast of amateurs, the result might be understandable. But "The Great Man's Lady" flaunts top-notch stars, Barbara Stanwyck and Joel McCrea, a grade A director and three or four name writers; obviously time and money were lavished on the production. How come?

The picture is laid in the late eighteen hundreds when the West was opened to settlers. It tells the story of Ethan and Hannah Hoyt, in the forefront of the pioneers, eager to found a city in the wilderness. Now an idea like that is creditable and important. Surely the sacrifice, sweat and tears that went into the building of the West is worthy of record. But the idea is lost in a shuffle of melodrama and easy sentiment. Hoyt City, instead of being the focus of the story, becomes an almost apologetic tail pinned to an incredible story.

The picture is told in a series of flashbacks. Starting from the present with Hannah Hoyt a wizened old woman, it uses the unveiling of a statue of Ethan Hoyt as a point of departure for a series of incidents. That's the root of the trouble. The picture must stand or fall on the power and integrity of these separated scenes. For "The Great Man's Lady," the script writers gathered up all the bedraggled clichés they could lay their hands on.

There's actually a line where Mr. McCrea says to Brian Donlevy: "Take your hands off my wife." Miss Stanwyck gives birth to twins only to see them die in a flood. Mr. Donlevy plays a gambler with a noble heart. Miss Stanwyck gives up Mr. McCrea to clear his road to fame and fortune. Mr. McCrea, believing Miss Stanwyck dead, marries again and then is confronted by her at a crucial point in his career. Miss Stanwyck becomes a hostess in a glorified gambling saloon in San Francisco. Mr. McCrea, in a white beard, finally dies in Miss Stanwyck's arms just as you expected he would ever since reel one.

Now, such a list of calamities and banalities calls for the greatest care in handling. But they're dealt out as casually as a gin rummy hand. Catastrophe upon catastrophe pile on the screen without a moment of true tragic import seeping through. Tragedy is an exacting master; multiply it needlessly and pointlessly, and it merely becomes embarrasing. Here, too, the technique of the picture stumbles over itself, since we know from the very beginning that Hannah Hoyt will end up a chipper and contented old woman.

So what's all the crying for?—Par.

This is the fifth time Barbara Stanwyck and Joel McCrea have teamed up as co-stars . . . Barbara Stanwyck figures she spent 110 hours on tests and being made up for her portrayal of a 100-year-old woman. Wally Westmore purposely changed her appearance so she'd be unrecognizable, working on the assumption that no one at the age of 100 looks like he did when he was 20 or 30 . . . MEET THE STEWARTS

"Like them?" I said.

"Them? Who?" My Lady said. "Oh, the Stewarts?"

"Candy and Mike."

"Is that her real name—Candy?"

"Short for Candace. And also yum-yum."

"Call me peppermint," My Lady said. "I didn't think she was so hot. Looked a little run down as a matter of fact."

"It hasn't been easy. Housecleaning, doing the dishes, cooking. Hard on a kid."

"I like that," My Lady said. "What do I do every day?"

"You never had a million dollars or so to throw around in your vanished youth, darling. You were never pampered."

"Was she really that rich?"

"At a quick count."

"What happened to it all? Taxes?"

"Papa didn't like Mike. Cut her off without a cent."

"She looks bright enough to add. Why in the world did she marry Mike?"

"Love," I said.

"Oh," said My Lady. "Love."

"Ever hear of it, darling?"

"That's the stuff you live on—if you want to go on a diet."

"That's what Mike told her."

"But she married him anyway?"

"Like a shot."

"And the grocer took kisses for the milk bill, and the butcher sent steak for every hug, and the moon is made of green cheese."

"Don't be cynical, dear," I said. "They had a budget."

"Why didn't you say so in the first place?"

"In the first place Candy ran fifty dollars over on the furniture."

"So they pruned it from entertainment—"

"So they joined a golf club and ran up a bill of $324."

"I don't see how that helped," My Lady said.

"That's what Mike told Candy."

"Very perceptive, Mike is. What did Candy say?"

"Candy got a job."

"Work? The little pampered darling went to work?"

"She went to work and bought a couple of dresses for her new job with the rent money. So they were $324 in the hole at the golf club, $50 behind on the furniture and fresh out of rent money. So Mike—"

"Popped her a couple on the chin, chained her to the bed—"

"No. Mike walked out."

"Just like that?"

"Just like that. He'd had enough, he said."

"Hurrah for our side. So they were divorced and lived happily ever after. Right?"

"Wrong."

"Well, what happened?"

"It's a long story and I'm thirsty and tired, and besides they made a movie of it. They paid any number of charming people to act it out. William Holden, Frances Dee, Grant Mitchell—"

"Good. We'll catch it when it opens uptown."

"Uptown?" I said. "We'll see it at a neighborhood theater. After all, it is about a budget."—Col.

P. S.

Frances Dee had to get a furlough from her defense position as air observer before she could accept the feminine lead . . . She and hubby Joel McCrea temporarily deserted their thousand acre ranch for an apartment in town, so she wouldn't have so far to travel . . . Dee was given her first break in pictures by Maurice Chevalier, who saw her eating at the next table to his in the studio commissary and insisted she be given the lead in his picture . . . Tommy Dugan worked three weeks in the picture, had exactly eight speeches, each only one word—"Yeah" . . . "Meet the Stewarts" is an adaptation of "Candy," a magazine story by Elizabeth Dunn . . . Grant Mitchell spent his time between "takes" making plans for working a Mojave mining claim . . . Ann Gillis, only 15, is a terrific cake-baker. She puts together a super-size triple-layer job every week and sends it to her step-father in the U. S. Air Corps . . . Bill Holden's first job was keeping an eye on cars parked at the Pasadena Community Playhouse —the closest he came to the "theatah" until he joined a dramatic group in Junior College . . . Marjorie Gateson, daughter, sister, niece and cousin of clergymen, shocked the entire family by deserting her obvious destiny to become a chorus girl on Broadway.

Here are four good reasons why you can stop worrying about any possible swim suit shortage this summer. Alaine Brandes, the original Jantzen model—you know, the gal Petty used for those glamorous black-suit billboard posters—has gone on to fame and Hollywood. But she returned to her first love, posing, long enough to show off some of the newest styles, by Jantzen, of course. One piece with dark panel or fruit motif or ricrac; figured bra and shorts, all of these will hit the waves and carry you out to sea.

Peasant-inspired, the NADOCKY ushers in a lilting tune, a polka dance and a printed playsuit, all sweeping the country in a record wave of popularity. Listen to the song on the radio, play it on your phonograph and with just a little coaching, you'll be doing the NADOCKY yourself. Here you see how easily one of our Bluejackets, in spare hours, takes to the instructions of the Arthur Murray teachers. Everyone seems to like the last step best of all, for that's when the girl sits on the boy's knee. As gay as the dance, the Freshy playsuit, a two-piece cotton, banded in bright red with large tulips on the full skirt, is fast color and easily laundered all summer long.

keynote is harmony or artistic contrast rather than matching. Red ensembles are a notable exception to this principle. Nothing, in fact, is such strikingly good taste as a red costume worn with lips and nails that look as though they had been dipped in the same dye vat or painted by the same artist.

For combining other costume and cosmetic colors, here is a guide to selections:

Green—With dark green, wear a bright new military nail polish or a smart berry shade with blue undertones. For olive, chartreuse or blue-green, choose a burnt, smoky red tone with lots of orange in it, and with pastel green, wear pastel polish in a delicious pink or in flesh tints. With bright Mexican green a leathery brown polish will make you look like tomorrow's fashion picture.

Blue—Give bright blue, French blue, or medium blue a lift with a brilliant South American inspired shade of lacquer made with some blue pigment. For powder blue, harmonize rosy or pastel polish in a delicious pink or blue-red tint. Wear these with aqua, too, unless you prefer enamel with a warm coppery orange tone. With navy blue, your principle is one of contrast rather than harmony so you may wear your particular pet red polish with assurance.

Purple—With your purple or wine, choose harmonious purple-toned enamel or a deep red full of blue undertones, or if you wear violet, match it with a fairly intense blue-red shade of lacquer. With orchid, wear shell pink nail polish.

Yellow—With bright or pastel yellow, wear a bright fire-engine or military red or one with lots of orange in it. With mustard or gold, choose a burnt sienna or a new brown-red south-of-the-border shade. If you want to be daring, create contrast with one of the fuchsia nail polishes.

Brown—With all shades of brown, wear copper red, bronze or actually brown shades of polish.

Black—Wear any shade as long as it's red. Sparkling tones worn with black have an entrancing jewel-like effect.

White—Choose nail lacquer according to the color of your accessories.

Gray or Silver—Complement these with subdued orchid or contrasting red.

Beige—Brighten your costume with red-red or orange-red lacquer.

Since beauty rituals must be brief these busy days, yet their effect more gay and gallant than ever, it is important to use a colorless aftercoat with your nail enamel, because it prevents chipping and injury besides adding lustre to your polish. This saves time because less frequent polish changes are necessary. For other suggestions that will make you proud of your fingertips as they accent every gesture, see "Beauty Is In Your Hands" on page 52 and the nail beauty chart on page 54. Whatever the shape of your own nails, you can find an ideal way to flatter them by the way you apply your enamel.

If thus you treat your fingertips with the respect they deserve for their contribution to your beauty, you can have the happy assurance that they not only accent your gestures, but add excitement and warmth to your whole personality.

When summer rolls around, pretty faces take on deeper skin tones, and eyes more than ever need make-up to bring out their color and beauty. She's a smart girl who keeps her eyes bright and enchanting with a special daily beauty program. To make lashes darker and heavier, she applies Maybelline Mascara, either cream or solid, in a flattering shade—brown, black or deep blue. Then she accents trim brows with smooth-marking pencil and uses a special brush to keep them well-groomed and lustrous. To intensify the natural color of her eyes, she uses shadow artistically, selecting the right subtle shade for daytime and evening. Before retiring, she never forgets to smooth on special eye cream to soften and protect delicate skin. She wins compliments and admiration wherever she goes, so why don't you, too, ensemble a set of Maybelline eye glamour aids.

Once women who wanted beautiful hands avoided work and exposure to weather. These days your hands are busy working for victory, and they are exposed to wind and sun. in the world," pleaded the exasperated bulb squeezer, "do you expect me to get any glamour into a shot with those queues of yours?"

"Oh, I'm sorry," replied Hedy. "Wait a minute and I'll fix them."

"I'll call the hairdresser," offered the photographer. Hedy shook her head, untied the ribbons and tumbled her hair into the familiar loose center-part. That's all there was to it.

neat as a pin . . .

In fact, Hedy has never changed the style of her hairdress or her make-up since she came to Hollywood, except for picture parts. In private she wears the style which glamour girls from Brenda Frazier on up and down have snitched. The only time she fooled with it was when a friend mentioned her fairly high forehead. Hedy cut herself some bangs that night and regretted it the next day. The bangs bothered her. "I couldn't think," she recalls. So she brushed them back and went around with a ragged hairline for weeks rather than feel a speck unnatural. That's Lamarr. Comfort before glamour any day.

That's not to imply she's the least bit sloppy. Not a bit of it. In fact, anything lax or out of order gives Hedy the jitters. When she powders her face, she slips on a shower cap so the white dust won't fuzz up her hair line. She's extra fussy about how her lipstick sets (although the kind she uses she gets at the five-and-dime); even the cut of her slacks and lounge suits has to be just right. Anything or anybody even slightly out of kilter makes Hedy restless until she has set it to rights.

There used to be a little neighbor girl near Hedy in Beverly Hills who had long straggly hair. Often she'd run up to Hedy's and hang around. That was okay with Lamarr, but the child's tangly tresses almost drove her mad. One day the kid arrived when Hedy was snipping something or other with some scissors. "Whenever I have scissors in my hand something is going to be cut!" Hedy admits. The girl's hair met her eye.

"Come here, dear," said Hedy, sweetly. Then—snip, snip, snip. Before she realized what she was up to, the objectionable hay was gone, and the girl looked neat and natty with a very special Lamarr bob. Of course, the minute she'd done it, Hedy was filled with remorse. She thought the child's parents would be up there after her with the police any minute. Oddly enough, they were tickled to death. "We've been trying to sell Annie on the idea for weeks!" they said. "I don't suppose she'd have let anyone but Hedy Lamarr do it."

It may be the Teutonic blood coming out in Hedy, this housewifely desire for neatness and order. Anyway, she has redecorated every house she has ever lived in in Hollywood, rented or otherwise, and the one she now owns has gone through two or three transformations. Not even Jean Harlow's old dressing room, Hedy's headquarters at M-G-M, has escaped. It gets a workover every few months, or rather, every few minutes. For one quality of Hedy's is that when you talk to her she's never relaxed. She's always walking about or leaning over fixing something.

When Hedy was making "H. M. Pulham, Esq." not long ago, King Vidor, the director, found himself stumped for some "business" for a certain scene—the one where Bob Young packs to leave. He had plenty for Bob to do, but Hedy's action was lining up pretty flat. They called off the shooting while Vidor racked his brain, and his pacings led him into Hedy's set dressing room. Absently talking over the headache with her, Vidor suddenly leaped to his feet and shouted, "I've got it!" And he had. All the time he'd been gassing with Hedy, she had been nosing nervously around the room, fixing this and that. So that's what she did while Bob Young packed in the next scene of "Pulham."

Part of this is nervousness, because despite her placid exterior, Hedy is a little jumpy underneath. She flares up easily and melts as quickly. She has insomnia a lot (she ought to; she sleeps in a hard bed). One jovial director at M-G-M calls her "my charming chameleon" because she changes so suddenly and violently. Like her taste in clothes, Hedy is never "in between." She's either keyed up or relaxed. In either case she's always curious. She's a great parrot for American slang (and usually gets it all wrong). She's a constant set-hopper and loves studio gossip.

One of Hedy's best friends and greatest confidants is Ann Sothern. They have the same street numbers—723—on two parallel streets in Beverly Hills. They can shout at each other from back windows and occasionally do. They go to movies a lot together, both mutually admiring Bette Davis and Disney. Hedy has seen "Fantasia" five times. The chumship started when Ann separated from her husband, Roger Pryor, and had her house done over. The carpenters banging away stirred up Hedy's insomnia. So she dropped in to see what she could do about it and discovered Ann. Sothern had been practicing rug cutting along with the carpenter whacks, for a "Maisie" picture. When Hedy discovered she had an M-G-M star for a neighbor, she announced her surprise. "I thought you were a jeeterbug!" she said frankly.

Hedy is always naively frank in her remarks which have had Hollywood guessing for months whether or not she has a subtle sense of humor or is just ingenuous. She appeared on Edgar Bergen's radio show a while back, and afterwards her host asked her what she thought about him. "Charlie McCarthy is very nice," replied Hedy, "but Mr. Bergen has no personality." They didn't get it. When Hedy first came to Hollywood and her great fascination with ten-cent stores was duly noticed, she was also asked once if she had ever seen a five-and-dime in Europe. "No," replied Hedy, innocently, "but I knew Barbara Hutton." Lamarr's sense of humor is still more or less of a mystery.

She does like making jokes on names. For instance, she called her photographer, George Folsey, "Foliage," and she'll occasionally come out with a pun. But by American standards the gags aren't killer-dillers. When Bob Hope, who has been taking Hedy's name in vain for years, finally met her at a party recently, he exclaimed, "Wow! I'm burning up on one side and freezing on the other!" Hedy didn't even smile. "That's too bad," she said, seriously, as if Bob really needed a doctor quick.

This straight approach to life is just another side of always-natural Lamarr. She was stopped by a traffic cop recently during a Beverly Hills safety drive. He showed her how to lock her windows inside to foil any would be fender-hoppers and a few other hints for ladies driving alone. Hedy took it all so seriously that the next morning she went down to the police station and bundled home literature on the safety subject. The station house gang almost fell over.

Automobiles are the one thing where a little personal glamour creeps into Hedy's life. She has a weakness for monogrammed and sporty cars. She drives a blue convertible coupe equipped with red leather upholstery and the finest radio money can buy. Radio is one of her great weaknesses. She turns it on the minute she gets in the car. When she takes a walk she carries a portable. She once sponsored a radio program "Nobody's Children" for homeless kids. Hedy has stayed home from big Hollywood events more than once to catch "Information, Please," Bob Hope and her favorite Sunday program, Andre Kostelanetz. She catches popular tune favorites off the air and hums them until her friends go crazy.

Music, in fact, is a major hobby with Hedy. She likes both popular and classic. The ivory capers of Art Tatum are her particular joy, because she can bang the keys a little herself (not too good, however). She has stacks of classical record albums, most of them presents from various boy friends. She doesn't read much, outside of occasional best sellers and magazines. She likes to cut color pictures she fancies out of certain magazines, frame them with mats and hang them around the house. Occasionally

I SAW IT HAPPEN

Los Angeles, May 28, 1937. I stood with many thousands at Wrigley Field, as a busload of stars pulled in to watch the boxing match that night. I saw a great, handsome man emerge in tweed coat and trousers, crepe sole shoes, and hat down over one eye. Behind him, his wife. Carole Lombard, dressed almost exactly like him.

"Clark Gable!" I whispered, and he immediately pushed his hat back and grinned like only he can. I grabbed onto his right arm (Carole was on the other) and buried my head so that the police couldn't see that I didn't belong there, and walked all the way to the gate on Gable's arm. What a thrill! Near the gate, I raised my head and he grinned again. Could I have an autograph?

"Not a chance tonight!" he whispered.

Through it all, Carole just smiled like the sport that she was and like I will always remember her. What a swell couple!

WE'RE DOING

Our Part...

HOTELS OF SOUTHERN CALIFORNIA are doing their part in this great national cause by maintaining normal facilities and operations in every department for the use of Americans seeking mental and physical release from strain and fag.

To facilitate the business of Americans, and in the interest of war production, there is augmented service at the great metropolitan hotels of Los Angeles, Hollywood, Long Beach, San Diego and the other large cities of Southern California.

There are no rations of fun at the fine resort hotels located on the desert at Palm Springs; by the sea at Coronado, Carlsbad, Laguna, La Jolla, Santa Catalina, Santa Monica and Santa Barbara; and amid the beauties of Pasadena, Beverly Hills and Riverside. Health and energy still bubble from the earth at the famous mineral springs resorts.

Golf, tennis, riding, swimming, cycling, badminton and a multitude of other sports and recreations are still to be enjoyed every day of the year by the visitor to this sun-blessed land.

Hotel rates in Southern California will continue at pre-war levels. Nowhere is there a greater variety of hotel accommodations to suit every budget and every taste.

In spite of rumors, travel IS normal in Southern California. Transportation to and throughout the state IS normal, and hotel and resort life IS normal.

she'll embark on a piece of handwork, like the afghan she started about a year ago. But she ran out of purple yarn, so she quit. In spite of her home loving ways, Hedy isn't too domestic.

She hates to cook, and a sandwich is about the extent of her kitchen lore. Keeping track of grocery, milk and other routine household bills is beyond her; she shoves them off on the cook. Hedy admits she's lazy that way but blames it on the mushy Southern California climate. Still she refuses to exercise violently like most Californians do to keep awake. Hedy will swim a little, because she has a little swimming pool in her yard, but anything more strenuous is usually out. She has never taken a sunbath or acquired even a freckle of tan. She doesn't have to bother about her weight although she's a sucker for all sorts of rich food. A daily massage takes care of that.

Hedy eats a lot of her meals in bed, being a night owl by nature and a late riser except when the studio whistle blows. She instructs the cook to leave her "a surprise" in the icebox each night. She raids it about midnight. Her favorite surprise is cold boiled artichoke.

With the aid of two servants, a nurse and a cook, the Lamarr household buzzes quietly along in the pseudo-Spanish house she recently bought. The members, besides Hedy, include her mother, a pretty and surprisingly young mother, Hedy's adopted boy, Jamsie, Mama Keisler's Scotty, "Cheri," and Hedy's canary "Gretel." Hedy's mother is a smart, pert looking woman who finally arrived here after fleeing Nazidom with more roundabout stops and adventures than a travel book. Hedy took her at once to see her set at M-G-M. The scene was a London bomb shelter. Mrs. K, who had spent weeks in London through Hitler's air blitz, quickly got the heck out of there and back home. "Good Heavens! I ran away from all this, I thought," she said nervously.

Hedy takes after her maw that way; her home is her refuge from everything. When she first arrived in Hollywood she even stayed there in bed every Friday the thirteenth, just to keep out of harm's way. Hedy's first movie colony friends were people who found their social fun in private homes—Merle Oberon and Alex Korda, the Charles Boyers, George Cukor, members of the quieter Hollywood set. Her trips to the deluxe night watering spots, always rare, slimmed down to almost nothing after the only two even semi-playboys—Reginald Gardiner and Gene Markey—had stepped out of her life. Neither of these, however, was the "screen siren" type of romance.

Reggie Gardiner, a great wit and party man, is far from a suave, polished man-of-the-world, amusing though he is. Gene Markey, personable, universally liked, wrapped up in Hollywood's social goings-ons, was just another American boy who made good in Hollywood. But even genial Gene's tastes for people and parties and public fun were too much for home girl Hedy. She adopted her baby boy right after their marriage and wanted to stick around home like a good wife and mother. That to Lamarr is what women are for; she has often stated, in fact, that every girl should be married, no matter what she is—actress, glamour girl, business woman or what. When Gene preferred to carry on his social whirl, the rift arrived. But from Hedy's glamour aura, anyone who didn't know her would swear it must have been Hedy who insisted on heavy night-clubbing.

John Howard, as a Hollywood wit puts it, was "the pipe type." A comfortable, easy-going, thoroughly adult and relaxed guy, John fitted comfortably into Hedy's romantic ideas. They sat at her home and played records, went out to dinner and a movie or visited John's mother. It was hardly the love affair you'd expect from the number one Venus of the screen. Yet it was all very gemutlich, and there's no doubt Hedy was very fond of John Howard. He's the only man on record she has ever given jewelry to. John drew a set of gold "lover's knot" cuff links for his birthday before the romance broke up. In all the time it lasted—about a year—they went night clubbing once—at Mocambo.

Hedy's phone rings constantly, and anxious Hollywood swains still besiege her for dates. She can't be bothered. "Cafes are stuffy," she says, but that's not the reason. Hedy knows, as she has confessed to her close friends, that there are plenty of beaus who want to take her out simply because she's Hedy Lamarr—object—publicity. She's canny that way. She can spot a phony a mile off—and frequently has.

The way she met her recently announced fiancé, George Montgomery, is typical Lamarr. (And George, an outdoor cowboy type of guy, is certainly no masculine charmer on the smooth side.) Hedy was in the street in front of her house chatting with some street-workers above the clatter of a jackhammer drill when George tried to pass only to see the Lamarr vision in slacks bending over a manhole and definitely in the way. He pulled up and Hedy looked up—and that's how it all started.

Hollywood society hasn't seen much of Hedy and George—and it probably won't. Neither likes night life; neither takes even a cocktail. Two less personally glamorous people you'll hunt a long way to find. What do they do? Well, a few weeks ago Hedy and George indulged in this exciting excursion: With Hedy's favorite hairdresser, Edie, and her hubby they drove to the mountains to week-end in a rough little cabin.

On the way they stopped at the Farmers' Market in Los Angeles where fans ogle movie stars and loaded up on provisions—George in his mountain boots, Hedy in her favorite polo coat with a peasant scarf over her raven locks. Glamorous?—well, not exactly. But whatever Hedy Lamarr does in her private life—for some strange reason—will never make five cents worth of difference in the Lamarr legend.

Hedy Lamarr is Hedy Lamarr to the millions. She always will be—the Hedy Lamarr of "Algiers"—cool, luxurious, orchidaceous, the epitome of glamorous womanhood. That's the funny thing about her. She could live in a poorhouse and tag about in cast-off clothes, and she'd still be glamorous. Hedy is just a woman that people can't seem to forget.

His own business methods are unique. He refuses to be told how much money he earns. "When a comic knows he's got money, he stops being funny." Edna and the business manager, whose curious name is Boo Roos—they know. They handle it.

Red was enchanted with the checkbook Boo Roos gave him. He had a lovely time, adding deposits to withdrawals—or dividing or multiplying as the fancy took him. On the stubs he'd write: "Guess what I spent this for," or "Darn foolishness," or "None of your business." Now he gets his allowance in cash. And no charge accounts, if they can catch him first.

His sales resistance is zero—minus zero, when the article's red. He'll lug home anything that doesn't have to be paid for till the first of the month. Nine times out of ten Edna lugs it back. The tenth time she connives with him, as when he bought five cases of soap from a man on a corner because once he hawked soap on a corner himself.

He also picked up a six-dollar organ, painted it red and stuck it in the middle of the living room. This, he explained, was for Edna's pleasure, so he could wake her up with his one-finger version of "Good Morning to You." She thought that was fine and had the organ moved to the den. Next day it was back in the living room.

Then there's the motorbike, a red single-seater, on which they go chugging to the neighborhood stores, Edna clinging behind. The office said no to the bike, they might get hurt. Edna sneaked Red the dough. "Could be they think it's undignified, too," she speculates, her feeling being that dignity's a thing you can get too much of.

Their house in Brentwood is large. It scared Edna at first, but Red, cramped for years in hotel rooms, thirsts after space. He doped it all out. "Two rooms for jokebooks, two rooms for the dogs, two rooms for Lottie May and Bert"—their domestic staff. "That leaves us six, which is normal."

They're furnishing piecemeal as their allowance permits. Red stipulates only that whatever they buy should be big. Neither he nor Edna can play, but he wants a great big piano, because everybody's house you go to, some guy sits down and bangs hell out of the piano. With the aid of some great big music rolls, he plans to sit down and bang hell out of his when he gets it.

To the average eye, his bed suggests a Rube Goldberg nightmare. To Red it's a pearl beyond price. Seven feet square, he nailed bookshelves to the headboard, and mounted the whole on a platform set with drawers for scripts and junk. That made it too high for the animals to jump on, so he built a stepladder for their greater convenience. No bedspread will cover this object. He won't have it painted. But if that's what he wants, Edna thinks that's what he ought to have. It's his bed.

The two dogs are Boston bulls. The cat's a stray who walked in and recognized a good thing when she saw it. On the death of his ten-year-old Boston, Red insisted he'd never have another. Instead of arguing, Edna steered him to a kennel, where he picked out the skinniest pooch with the biggest bat-ears. The second they took from a family who couldn't keep him. The dogs' room adjoins Red's. Edna couldn't understand why, for no apparent reason, they'd suddenly start yapping like mad, till she caught her husband knocking stealthily at the wall to egg them on.

Hers is the only fully furnished room in the house. On Christmas Eve she was writing two scripts under pressure—one for the regular broadcast, one for a special Red Cross show. When her typewriter broke for the third time, she stormed out to finish the job down at NBC, returning to find her bedroom complete with lovely eighteenth-century pieces and a note on her typewriter, reading "Sabotage by Red."

Ask him what he does with his spare time, and he'll give you a blank look. "When I'm not working at the studio, you mean? Sit around and write jokes." Somebody told them they ought to go in for golf. Obediently they bought clubs and went out to the course. The first day Red stood it. The second day he dropped his arm in the middle of a swing. "Do you really like this, Mum?"

"I think it's silly."

"C'mon, let's go home and write jokes."

They enjoy bowling and the movies but haven't had time for either in months. Edna's days are as full as his. She does the outlines for all his radio and benefit shows, and both wish another word could be found for benefit. They're passionate on that score. "We give 'em a song and a joke, and they risk their lives. Who's benefiting who?"

On Saturday, the boys come in with their gags which are worked into the outline. Sunday, rehearsal and preview. Monday, rewriting. Tuesday, rehearsal and broadcast. Wednesday, the outline for next week. Thursday morning, ambulance corps. Thursday night, drill. Thursday afternoon and Friday, fan mail. Red reads every letter and says how he wants it answered, reads and signs every answer and signs every photo himself.

Edna fits her time to his. On a recent afternoon off, he took a yen to go to Ventura to see the boys of the 143rd Field Artillery, of which he's been made honorary major and Edna honorary sergeant-major. The ring they gave him never leaves Red's finger. Edna went with him and finished her script that night while the major slept. She's used to being up late from show business.

They do no formal entertaining, but people drop in. Lottie May gets her money for the week and runs the house. "She knows her business better than I do," says Edna. Nowadays Red drops invitations right and left. "C'mon up for dinner. We have forks." That's because he took flatware instead of cash for a recent appearance on the Silver Show. "Makes it nice," he says. "Now we don't have to wait till one guy gets through before the next guy can eat."

Except on broadcast nights, they always have soldiers to dinner. If there aren't enough, Red cruises around and picks up more. N.B. to soldiers in Hollywood. Some evening a carrot-topped guy in a green-and-tan car, flaunting the regimentals of the 143rd Field Artillery, may pull up alongside.

"Where you going, boys? Got a date? C'mon over to the house, there's a party." That's Red Skelton, boys, and he's okay to go with.

They have no rules for a happy marriage, just trust to instinct and common sense. If it happens to be an off day for either, the other keeps away or they fight it out. When Red is moved to pop off, he pops on the spot. Any other course, he maintains, is two-faced. "I'm not gonna smirk and smile and wait till I get her home, then turn around and yell, 'Now about that what you said.' By the time I get home, I feel different, anyway." They don't offer apologies for temper—only angels are good all the time, which must be quite dull—and they don't carry grudges.

One point on which Edna won't yield is Red's work. He's impulsive, likely to go overboard sometimes on an idea she thinks might be harmful. Let him rave his head off. She stands her ground, till they find a happy medium or till Red caves in. It's much easier to have him plain mad at her than to have him hurt.

They also differ on the subject of Edna's clothes. Where his own wardrobe's concerned, Red's mind is a blank. He doesn't know the size of his shirts or socks. Edna buys them. He'll wear only plain Burgundy ties. Edna buys them. He won't be measured for a suit, and the tailor has to cut the new from the old. But he's highly vocal on what his wife should wear.

She likes sports clothes. He doesn't. He likes funny hats. She doesn't. Her favorite colors are chocolate brown, black and dark blue. He hates them all and screams like a panther for red. He reproaches her (calling all husbands!) for not spending enough. Whatever she owns that cost real money, he bought. He'll saunter into a shop, pick anything red and expensive, have it modeled by a girl her size and send Boo Roos the bill, charged to overhead. She wears what she likes till he gets too obstreperous, then wears what he likes for a while.

One day she was trying to explain a mortgage to him. She should have known better. The figures showed a profit. By the time Red got through with them, he had himself in hock. To switch the argument, Edna had to be the villain.

"And besides that I'm in hock—"

"But you're not in hock—"

"And besides that I'm in hock, you don't wear anything but suits. And you don't fix your hair like in the movies. And you don't spend enough time and money on your looks."

"I made her feel bad," says Red mournfully, telling the story. "I made her cry." Edna corrects him. She cried because she felt mad, not bad.

"How'm I going to be a glamour girl and wrestle with five gagmen at the same time?— Anyway, I've got plenty of things besides suits!"

She flung her closet door open. Fifteen suits—Red counted them. Not a dress in sight.

"Okay, you win. You want me to wear slinky dresses. For slinky dresses, a girl needs a fur coat."

"Buy one."

"We can't afford it."

"We can too afford it. I asked Boo Roos when you wanted a beaver, and he said yes."

"You said he said no."

"Because I didn't want you to have beaver. Beaver's like suits. No oomph."

"I still want beaver."

"We can't afford beaver. We can only afford mink. And one of those upsy hairdos. And a red dress—"

"I can't go shopping. I'll get way behind on my script."

"So the sponsors'll worry."

She got the mink, and makes sheeps-eyes at every beaver she passes. She got the hairdo, mashes it slightly lower each morning and expects to be back to normal in a couple of weeks. She got the dress, one of those Paul Revere things. "Two pieces," said Red. "It's still a suit."

To add the last touch of glitter he bought her a star sapphire. "Think she'll like it?" he asked the girls at the studio.

"Who wouldn't!"

"Edna," he replied sadly. "She doesn't like rings."

She modelled the radio character of Junior from Red. Red looks like a brat, and Junior is how he acts. As, for instance, he sees somebody and says something fresh, and Edna finds out. So he hides in her room, leaving Indian trails behind him, on each scrap of paper a message: "I'm a bad boy—I dood it—shame on me—isn't I am cute?" By the time she tracks him down, she's giggling and what's the use?

"Mummy!" he yelled the other day, a yelp so anguished that not only Mummy, but Bert and Lottie May came running. He stood at the head of the stairs, clutching a finger, charmed with the sensatioin he'd created.

"I got a splinter," he beamed, holding his finger up high. "Whoever of you bids the highest, gets the right to pull it."

"Nonsense!" Oleg said confidently. "This is an old Russian recipe for soup and very good for colds. Drink it down."

Dutifully, Gene swallowed the last mouthful. Later Oleg confessed the recipe was something he had dreamed up on the spur of the moment—a combination of boiling water, one raw egg, a bouillon cube, a dash of Worcestershire sauce, a touch of Kitchen Bouquet and the juice of one lemon!

The only meal Gene ever prepared turned out to be a grand success. It was a breakfast party, and the guests raved about her pancakes.

"But she cheated," Oleg said. "I found out later Madeleine had left the batter already prepared."

"As if that mattered," Gene sniffed. "In pancakes it's the cooking that counts."

Money and the difference in their incomes—he earns $150 a week to her $1500—never has been a source of conflict because they face facts frankly and Oleg, sensibly, has no false pride about her larger salary. They share all basic living expenses such as food, the house, upkeep of their two cars of modest make, Madeleine's salary and entertainment on a 50-50 arrangement. He pays for his own clothes and expenses, and she pays for the extra luxuries she wants plus the over-average wardrobe her position demands. The rest of her money goes into her personal savings account. They contribute from their own earnings to the support of their families.

Their divergent conceptions of the importance of time has been a source of casual conflict. Like most Americans, Gene is driven by a burning ambition and begrudges every moment not spent in pursuit of a goal. "Hurry, hurry, hurry. Time is fleeting" is her credo, and it baffles and irritates her that Oleg should take a leisurely tack. She constantly is at him to plug, plug, plug, but as he put it, he prefers to take time out, now and then, for station identification.

Both have become acutely aware of the word "thrift," although it's something of a new experience for Oleg. Always before he was one of those people "born with holes in their hands," as the Russian proverb has it. Now he is concerned only with protecting Gene and taking care of her and their future together. That future includes babies, sooner possibly than their original plans.

"Frankly, I still hesitate about it," Oleg said. "I don't feel it is fair to Gene's career right now, and with me being in 1-A classification and subject to call at any time, I can't feel it is right to leave her with such a responsibility."

Gene's eyes clouded with brief tears. Normally she would agree with him about the career angle, but if there was a chance Oleg might be lost to her——

"I feel as any woman does," she said simply. "I would want at least to have his child."

Oddly enough, it is Gene who most frequently is guilty of unreasoning jealousy. Oleg has learned to discipline his emotions and wisely accepts many of the unusual situations which arise from Gene's career with a semi-paternal air. She, however, still flies off the handle with a fiery show of temper at the faintest threat of encroachment on her private property. Recently they encountered a girl whom Oleg had known several years ago. The girl laid an affectionate arm around his shoulders, explaining that she had known Oli in Washington.

Sparks shot from Gene's eyes. "Is that the way they act in Washington?" she commented icily. The flustered girl beat a hasty retreat, Oleg squirmed uncomfortably, and Gene went into a black sulk, fed chiefly from the knowledge she had behaved badly.

They bicker amiably over poetry and swing music. Oleg dislikes poetry, especially when Gene elects to read it aloud, and swing stuff gives her a headache. "Chattanooga Choo Choo" became a battle front when, after singing it constantly in English, Oleg broke out with "Pardonez moi, garcon, est-ce-que c'est le Chattanooga Choo-Choo?"

Gene got even by reading aloud the stickiest of Elizabeth Browning's sonnets for five straight nights!

Both like dancing (he's a whiz!), the theater and their immediate circle of friends which includes Deanna Durbin and Vaughn Paul, Judy Garland and Dave Rose, Mary Martin and Dick Halliday, the Lee Bowmans, Cobina Wright, Jr., Rouben Mamoulian, Baron Poland, and before they split recently, the Victore Matures. Their rule of thumb in selecting friends, incidentally, is to eliminate those whom Gene doesn't like. They entertain rather infrequently because (a) their current thrift campaign discourages unnecessary spending and (b) they can't "fight in peace" with an audience present. Once they are moved into the big house, they expect their social life to widen proportionately.

Tennis is a serious bone of contention in the household. Gene cannot comprehend Oleg's absorption with the game (he's one of the ranking players of the United States), and he cannot fathom her complete disinterest, particularly after the first lesson he gave her proved she had a natural talent for the game and, with a little practise, could become a first-class player. His mother spotted the danger on their recent visit to her.

"I have analyzed you both," she told Oleg seriously," and I have no fears for your future and your marriage. I am worried, however, about your tennis. In Gene's eyes, your love of the game is almost like the love of another woman."

It was an accurate diagnosis. Recently Gene raised such merry Ned over a Sunday tournament that Oleg was forced to withdraw at the last moment.

"I wanted him to spend the time at home with me," she explained. Though the act had placed him in the awkward position of letting a partner down, Oleg was generous and patient with her. "Some day my lovely one will have time to learn the game," he said. "Then she will understand."

her man friday . . .

Although at 29 he is but 8 years her senior, Oleg is both father and lover to Gene. He guards her health and well-being with the ferocity of a watchdog and constantly seeks to perform little services, even menial tasks, which will take burdens from her shoulders. So acute is his interest in her work and success that in a sense he has pushed aside his own life in the interest of hers.

Yet he does not forget to be the eager lover. There was the succession of gifts he brought her to mark anniversaries. Flowers for the day they met. Perfume for the first date. A lovely watch for an especially happy evening. A perfect jewel for the first kiss. Then one night an enormous box of her favorite candy.

"What's this for?" Gene asked.

Oleg smiled. "To be honest, I don't know," he admitted, "but I didn't want to take a chance on missing any day."

Naturally they have little habits which annoy each other. Gene frequently yawns in front of company without covering her mouth with her hand. Her ingenious alibi is that she knows better, so it doesn't count. Oleg tried to explode the theory one night by deliberately indulging in careless language and using the same excuse. Gene was horrified, but she still yawns—uncovered. He has a nervous habit of biting at his finger nails, which gives her the screaming willies. She tried to break him once by painting his nails with colorless polish, the idea being that it would taste bad and hence he would desist.

"Instead it almost ruined me!" he recalled with a grin. "I arrived in Washington with my polished nails to hear my brother yell 'Whee! Get the glamour boy from Hollywood!' "

Obviously and admittedly, each has exerted an enormous influence on the other during the year of their marriage.

From the beginning, Oleg had a natural flair and talent for gown designing, as his work in Paris, New York, Washington and in Hollywood under contract to Paramount proved. Under Gene's ambitious program of plug, plug, plug, however, he is climbing into the top ranks of filmdom's free lance designers. More and more the studios are seeking his services to costume such pictures as "Shanghai Gesture" and "Tales of Manhattan" in which he created the gowns for Ginger Rogers, Rita Hayworth, Marlene Dietrich and their feminine costars. He still dreams, as do all creative artists, but now those dreams are harnessed to the production line. Now there is a pattern to his life and work. When he is on assignment, he has offices at the studio; between pictures he works at home, creating new things for Gene's personal adornment and devising costume ideas for future pictures.

Gene has developed mentally and emotionally. Each conflict has added to her stature as an actress, as the studio readily admits. She is in better health and no longer scatters her energy in activities which lack direction. She has gained in self-confidence, which is reflected in her screen portrayals, and has learned to take ideas, study them and make decisions.

"Before marriage, I was like a totalitarian government," she said. "Everyone told me what to do, and I followed orders, blindly and without reason. Now I function as a democracy."

She has a new grace and dignity as a woman, and a depth which was there but unsounded before. She has a new beauty, too, for which Oleg is directly responsible. He taught her to dress well and smartly, capitalizing on the best points of her figure and concealing her shortcomings. Before she had a tendency to overdo in dress and to select things merely because they appealed at the moment.

The other day Madeleine watched in fascination as Gene smeared her face with a white ointment. "It's for sunburn," Gene explained, "but I wonder if this is what he meant."

Madeleine was shocked. "You mean you are putting that stuff on your face just because he told you to?" she demanded.

"Of course," Gene said. "Why else?" Are you listening, Hollywood gossips?

"MY POPPA DONE TOLE ME"

Morgan, Jr.," it announced loftily. But that appears to have been the only time Stanley ever called upon his father's fame for identification. At school, the son of the husky who made such a hit in "Captains Of The Clouds", is called "Stan" or "Morny" or "Giggle Puss." The latter only upon dire risk of an extensive shiner, as he inherited his punch from his old man.

This separation of name may account for an interesting phenomenon of Dennis Morgan's personality: as a father, he is only about 3% parent. The other 97% is elder brother. He carries no succession of progeny pictures around to display, although he has shot thousands of feet of 16 mm. film of them since birth; he didn't have their baby shoes bronzed to keep as sentimental mementos ("my kids are so active that they destroy their shoes completely—nothing left to save"); he doesn't buttonhole passers-by to recount some bright saying or to boast of some small fry accomplishment.

He appears to regard his offspring as he accounts all the good things of life: something to be studied, enjoyed, shared, but not taken too seriously. And he maintains that his youngsters teach him as much as he teaches them.

Take, for instance, that plane flying overhead one Saturday afternoon when he was out for a walk with Stan and Kris. "Being the Pa," he says, he identified the plane.

Stan squinted skyward, then glanced at his dad. Clearing his throat, he said with courteous diplomacy, "It's against the sun, Dad. That's probably why you thought it was a B26, but it's really a B25—notice the split tail."

"Do Jap planes make a different noise from ours?" Kris wanted to know at this point.

Her father said nothing. Stanley explained indulgently that in large numbers, all planes sounded very much alike.

"Then," demanded the air-minded four-year-old, "how can lookouts tell our planes from Jap planes?"

The senior generation retained a dignified silence while Stanley elucidated. "The design—that means the shape—is different, Kris, and all the markings on the wings and fuselage are different. Isn't that right, Dad?"

Dad agreed quickly. On the q.t. he drove to the nearest book store—that night—and invested in a volume identifying American planes so that, hereafter, he would not be caught in flight with his pontoons down.

care and feeding of parents . . .

Lesson No. 2 came a few weeks later. It seems that Dennis—without being remotely aware of it—had fallen into a habit of vocalizing with violent gestures. He would practice scales while lifting his elbows on an even plane with his shoulders and flopping his arms. Like Wee Gillis, this was fine for his lungs, even though it would have been tough on mirrors.

Dennis came in from the garage one Sunday morning to find the two young hopefuls howling like Comanches and brandishing their arms like washed long underwear drying in a whirlwind. "We're practising our singing," they were chanting. "This is Daddy doing scales."

"It was the first time," says a rueful male thrush, "that I realized what a darned fool I was making of myself. Believe me, when I vocalize nowadays, I do it without calisthenics."

Dennis has developed a theory about his astonishing family. "The children of each generation surpass their parents in intellectual capacity," he opines. He feels that this notion is substantiated by the mere fact that each new crop of youngsters inherits a longer list of gadgets to control, and that successive generations take advantage of accumulated race history. Deep, huh? Well, that's Dennis for you. The man is a brain, no less.

Because Dennis has so much respect for the younger generation, one can understand how difficult it is for him to impose discipline. "I'm lucky," he says, "in that my kids are really well-behaved. They don't take much correction. Of course, they'll 'in-a-minute' a guy to death. And getting them to bed at night is a major engagement."

It was this belated bedtime that brought on a battle between Stanley and his dad. Stanley had been ordered four or five times to turn off his radio. No soap. Then he could be heard running to the bathroom for innumerable drinks of water. At last he gingerly opened Kris's door to find out if she were asleep. About this time, Dennis lost his temper completely. He went up the steps two at a time, picked up Mr. Morner, Jr., and whammed his seating equipment soundly. Stan bit his lips and bore the punishment in silence.

Dennis put his son in bed, tucked up the covers and said, "Let that be a lesson to you. The next time I tell you that it's bedtime, I want you to turn off the radio and the lights and go to sleep. Understand?"

A small underlip quivered. A pair of tear-glazed eyes opened to scan a father's face. "Okay," Stan said, choking off a sob. "Anyhow, I didn't cry, did I, Dad?"

Whereupon, six-foot-two, 200-pound Dennis Morgan patted his son's head and went swiftly out of the room, his own eyes filled with tears and a baseball-sized lump in his throat. "That settles it," he told his wife, Lillian, afterward. "Stan's too big to spank."

trial by jury . . .

Nowadays, when one of the youngsters breaks a family rule, he or she goes to Dad the moment Dennis comes home and explains exactly what happened. If the incident were accidental—like a broken window or a group of drowned baby ducks (Kris gave them more water than they could negotiate)—Dennis explains how the trouble could have been prevented. If the error is simply disobedience, the miscreant and the magistrate agree on punishment. Something like cutting down the allowance or skipping three desserts or missing Lone Ranger or Orphan Annie for two nights. The real haymaker is having to shut off Captain Midnight for a night or so. Captain Midnight gives code directions—Stan has one of the decoders—every night, detailing certain secrets. To be deprived of one of those broadcasts is equivalent to putting W. C. Fields on a three months' diet of lemon phosphate.

Kris doesn't have an allowance yet—"She cadges nickels from her grandfather at every opportunity," Dennis explains—but Stan gets 50c each and every week in exchange for certain work around the yard. He is vice-president in charge of weeds, fence breaks and incidental gophers. His total take goes into Defense

Stamps. He manages to stir up a little extra work, like watering a rose bush or de-snailing an area, and for this he gets the moola with which he buys candy.

Stan seems to have inherited some of his father's musical ability; he plays the piano extremely well—as long as he isn't told to practice. The moment he's ordered to limber his digits, the whole business becomes discipline, and he's bored; but, if left to his own devices, he'll spend hours at the keyboard.

Stan and Dennis share their general approval and amusement with Kris. Stan took her to school one day, as a visitor. That night, in man-to-man tones, he told Dennis, "Gosh, I was sure proud of Kris. She looked so cute. All the guys in my grade are crazy about her. They've got crushes on her."

In the theatricals that Stan prepares from time to time, Kris is always leading lady. One day Dennis heard via operator 52 (mother of the dramatis personae) that a production of "Little Red Riding Hood And The Big, Bad Wolf" was in the offing. He chuckled and said he would be glad to supply any number of wolves for the cast; thereafter, he kissed Lillian good-by and proceeded to the studio.

As he crossed the lot, he appeared to create plenty of mirth. Someone yelled, "That's being frank about it, Denny," without much rhyme or reason, as far as Dennis was concerned. Someone else shouted, "If you hadn't admitted it, I would never have guessed." Not until he reached his dressing room and removed his coat did he find that he had eloped with some of the dramatic company props. Carefully pinned to the collar of his sports coat was the bushy tail from a discarded red fox scarf.

Despite these adventures, Dennis doesn't see much chance of establishing a cinematic dynasty. He asked Stan one day what he wanted to be when he grew up. An actor, perhaps?

"Naw," chirped Stan. "I want a real he-man's job. Maybe I'll be an aviator or a mechanic. But I want to work."

Dennis delights in telling such stories of the low esteem in which he is held by his closest of kin. Another yarn he loves is that about Stanley, an ardent radio listener at the age of four, paying strict attention to a broadcast on which John Charles Thomas faced the microphone for one song, was followed by Dennis, then returned and sang again. "I'm afraid," observed a critical offspring, "that John Charles Thomas sings gooder than my dad."

As a story-teller, Dennis ranks A1 *. With Stan on one knee and Kris on the other, he spins yarns that rival Jules Verne. Oddly enough—and this tells a great deal about the essential understanding of young hearts that resides in Dennis Morgan—the principle characters in these adventures are always a boy and a girl.

Sample: "Once upon a time, on a summer day, a boy and a girl were swimming out in the ocean near Santa Monica. The boy was about seven or eight, and his two front teeth were out. This was swell for whistling. As he was floating out in the deep water, he saw a periscope break the surface suddenly just a few feet away. He and the little girl swam quickly over and got on the deck of the sub. This boy was hot stuff on guns, and the girl knew all about the hatches on a sub. Now, this turned out to be a Jap vessel, so. . . ."

He doesn't try to include a moral in these stories—they are strictly for laughs and thrills—but the children are subscribers to a group of juvenile magazines, and Dennis and Lillian keep an eye on the stories printed. "They're excellent character builders," Dennis says. "Sugar coated advice. They cut down the number of subjects a parent has to harp on, and so give a person more chance to be—well, kind of a real kid oneself."

One of the kid-pal things Dennis and Stan like best, is an occasional all-day hike, taking along a lunch; on one of the walks they located what Stan fondly called a "hideout." He had brought along his beebee gun, so he and Dennis took turns shooting a tin can off the branch of a nearby tree in a dry wash. Their scores were about even. "I had to watch myself to keep from getting licked," Dennis chuckles.

Saturday after Saturday this went on. One lazy, hazy, golden afternoon, Stanley looked up at his boyish dad. In the lad's eyes was something of comprehension, something of dawning awareness of the changing, moving, puzzling passage of time. "Look, Dad," he began, the toe of his shoe digging a small, unhappy furrow in the sand, "when I'm as grown up as you are, will you still be around to go on hikes with me? Will you still be like you are now?"

Dennis' arm went around the small boy's shoulders; the father's eyes, searching the horizon, saw only a blur of green and brown. When he found his voice, he said huskily, "You know I will, Stan. You can count on it." Perhaps, in those words, was all of prayer that strong men ever say.

In the Morgan family, as in all well-regulated homes, the question of dissemination of information about The Facts Of Life recently arose. Mr. Jimmy Fidler telephoned one morning to ask if certain rumors were true. Trustingly the maid who answered the telephone confessed, "Yes, we're to have another member of the family in September, but we're keeping it a secret at present." This answer must have topped Mr. Fidler's very, very public career.

Kris, who holds all speed records for answering the telephone, happened to come in second on this occasion, but she stood attentively while the conversation took place. Dennis, learning this fact later, realized that he was going to have to have a Quiet Talk with the children.

Now, however, he is just trying to be nonchalant. Seems some guests dropped in the other day, and one of them said subtly, "I hear that good news is in the offing."

"Oh, yes," Kris cut in quickly. "Now that we're living in the country, we're just raising chickens and rabbits and horses . . . and babies."

Stan gave his sister A Look. "Secret code!" he growled by way of warning a junior partner against giving out premature information about a contemplated expansion of The House Of Morgan.

So Dennis isn't sure exactly what he should say. "Put me down," he begs, "as a perpetually perplexed parent."

to the head man behind the desk, they were all swell gents.

Discretion plays no part in this attitude. By a gentleman's agreement, such cracks are off the record. But off the record you still don't get them from Bill. All you get is a note of sheepish apology. Can he help it if he met up with a set of grand guys and gals? Sure, he was wary on first coming out. He'd been warned against a certain amount of backbiting and knifing. So he finds himself working with people who go out of their way to tip him off to all kinds of helpful dope. No, those four years weren't wasted. Anything but. He made valuable friendships, gained valuable experience. So he's a Pollyanna, so do him something.

He has certain advantages over the average male—wheedling blue eyes, a gorgeous thatch of blond hair, a light heart, a lively tongue, long masculine dimples cutting thin cheeks and a grin that gets you. Lucky Joe he calls himself. The world's his oyster and people are his passion. To be cut off from new and interesting humans is the saddest plight he could conceive for himself. His favorite hangout is Schwab's Drugstore, where actors congregate, and the mob mills and wisecracks pop in a holiday atmosphere of good will to men. A friend, meeting his father, offered condolences.

"Too bad Bill lost his job."

"That's news to me. He went to the studio this morning."

"Why, I saw him jerking sodas at Schwab's last night."

"Schwab's," explained the elder Lundigan, "is our Bill's avocation."

Son of a politician and a clubwoman, both Irish, he comes honestly by his gregariousness and his gold-tipped tongue.

The Lundigan name is woven through the annals of Syracuse. O'Lundigan it used to be, back in County Tipperary. "Did you ever," asks Bill, "see an Irishman who wasn't a seventh son of a seventh son of Brian Boru, including me?"

big time politics . . .

For generations the family's been prominent in the civic affairs of Syracuse. His mother, he says, wielded a mean gavel. His father he describes as a cute guy who never ran for office but was one of the boys in the back room at conventions, smoking cigars and pulling the strings. Even at five, Bill loved to hang round his dad's store, located in the town's biggest hotel, and chisel ice cream sodas from Republicans and Democrats alike.

Growing older, it was their talk that fascinated him. He was just a kid with big ears, Mike Lundigan's kid, so they paid him little heed as he sat bug-eyed, absorbing his first political lessons. He decided to be a lawyer, a thought planted by his father's friends who clapped him on the shoulder, winked an eye and promised there'd be an opening in the office when he graduated from law school.

He bossed his three younger brothers, but an outsider who picked on any of them had all four to fight. Born two years apart and healthy, there were times when they tried the fondest of fathers. His system of discipline went something like this: "Next time one of you lets out a yell or kicks a chair over, you're going to get strapped." Came the next time, and out came the strap. His eldest chuckles, recalling that no man ever missed by a wider margin.

It's a wonderful thing, he adds in a brief moment of seriousness, to be blessed with parents who command the utmost in respect, yet remain buddies. He had only two complaints against them. Every Sunday morning the four boys, dressed as nearly alike as possible, were herded down the aisle of the church their grandfather had helped raise money to build, and plunked into the Lundigan pew. This made him feel like a self-conscious dope. In many matters the kids were allowed their voice. In a few, they were told, "This you do," and they did it. Little Willie, for instance had to take piano lessons. When company came, he was dragged out to perform. Agonized protests got him nowhere. Whether he or the suckers who listened got the worst of it, there's no way of telling. He studied for eight years and can now play the first sixteen bars of "The Desert Song" badly.

He skipped lightly through high school, entered the University of Syracuse at fifteen and was somewhat astonished to find that he couldn't get passing grades, as heretofore, without tending to his books. This had nothing to do with the abrupt termination of his college career a year and a half later.

The '29 crash had put a crimp in his father's business, so on week-ends and holidays Bill helped out at the store. He got to know Jack Shannon, production director of the CBS station, located in the same hotel. One glimpse of the pageantry of radio, and Bill decided this was for him. Shannon used him on a couple of programs, found his voice to be natural, suspected his gift of gab would prove no handicap and said: "We need an announcer. Why don't you try out?"

Lucky Joe won the audition. There was no parental opposition to his quitting the law. Even if the folks didn't see eye to eye with him, they were always in his corner. "Go ahead and try it." A couple of swell gents he picked himself to be born to.

For four years he worked himself to the bone and had the time of his life, bathing in excitement, meeting the great of the world, putting men like Al Smith and Lehman and Roosevelt on the air, getting a terrific bang when they said, "Hi, Bill! How's your mother? How's Dad?" He revelled in the fellowship of the studio. Bull sessions were his meat. Having worked from seven one morning till two the next, he'd join the gang at coffee downstairs and refresh himself with shop talk. He wound up as ex-officio production manager and the station's white-haired boy. Yet, loving radio as he did, successful though he was, he dropped it without hesitation for an uncertain spot in the movies, because the movies offered new and untried fields.

His voice had attracted an RKO scout who invited him to New York for a test. Too busy to take advantage of the offer, he didn't get himself down to New York till '37. He was sitting in the office of King Horton, a swell gent who worked for CBS, when Steve Feld, another swell gent, walked in. The amenities over, Steve wanted to know what he'd come to New York for.

"Mostly to see life. Partly for a test at RKO if they still want me."

"Why RKO?"

"They asked me."

"How about Universal?"

"Well, how about it?"

Steve picked up the phone, called Harry Evans, gave him a line of shmoos about a find named Lundigan whom he might be able to snatch from under the nose of RKO if he worked fast, the net result being an appointment for a test next morning.

"I'd like to get a voice level on you," said the casting director. "Can you ad lib something?"

words without music . . .

"Again I repeat," Bill repeats—"Lucky Joe! Ad libbing's my business."

He went into a spiel about one of his broadcasting experiences—how at the last minute he'd been told off to interview a guy, how he knew only that the guy was a naturalist, how the guy appeared just before air-time with two huge boxes, how they lined up a few questions and went on the air, how in the midst of an answer the guy opened a box, produced a chimpanzee and hung it round Bill's neck—"Ladies and gentlemen," ad libbed Bill, "I am now in the strong but affectionate embrace of a young lady named Cheetah, who is a chimpanzee. We're getting along all right unless she decides to choke me to death"—how the guy opened the second box and, to Bill's horror, replaced Cheetah with a snake—how the engineers howled in the control room and his knees knocked, but he clung to the burning deck and quavered, "Look, folks, I am now in the toils of a fourteen-foot python. So-and-so tells me he's well doped. I fervently hope so. If my voice fades out, you'll know that my hopes were in vain and you're minus an announcer in the flower of his youth.—Thank you, gentlemen, you who are looking at the screen test. I have now produced the number of words required by Mr. Cochrane so you could get the level of my voice, so I will scram the blazes out of here."

exit Syracuse . . .

On the basis of this test, Universal authorized a contract. Bill was at home when the message came. "Please, may I have your autograph?" drooled Ted, the youngest.

Not till the train moved out of the Syracuse station did he once ask himself what the hell he was doing this for—and that was the only natural pang of parting. The home town laid itself out to give him a send-off. CBS wouldn't let him resign. "Call it a leave of absence," they insisted. There were parties, public and private, there were hundreds of people gathered to see him off. He was riding high till he kissed Mom and Dad good-by, and caught for the first time in the eyes of these two self-contained people, not tears, but a look that twisted his innards.

In Hollywood he found Syracuse waiting in the shape of a message from Manny Manheim, erstwhile an editor in Syracuse, now a Hollywood writer.

"What are you doing in a hotel?"

"Sleeping."

"If you're not down here in fifteen minutes with your trunks, I'll call the hotel and tell 'em you're Rudolf Hess."

Manny showed him around, introduced him to any number of people, and presently he was swimming in his accustomed element of good fellowship. Bill would never choose to live on a desert isle. "If I had to, I'd be gabbing with the monkeys inside a week."

He lives with his family now, having pried them loose from Syracuse without too much trouble, arguing (1) that he was lonesome, (2) that California was a wonderful place to be healthy in. The boys had been adolescents when he left. He could lick them one at a time or all at once. Now they bore down on him, three bruisers, led by Jack, boxer and gridiron star, who weighs in at two hundred and five. "Who'd you say was boss?" they chorused.

Mr. Lundigan found a large, homey, old-fashioned house in Hollywood—the kind, says Bill, that has glass in the front door shaped like a butterfly. Mrs. Lundigan heard again what to her was sweet music—Bill bawling Ted out for wearing his suede jacket, Ted bawling back:

"You've got three or four of my sweaters down at the studio. How's for bringing 'em back?" The brothers operate by the motto that the first one up's the best one dressed. But with Jack married and Bob in the army, trade's a little slow.

The third floor of the house is Bill's domain. Despite various remarks from his mother at various times, a closet to Bill is still something not to hang clothes in. He drapes his coat over the back of a chair and lays his pants lovingly across it. He can't stand towels on the bathroom floor, but neither can he stand returning them to the rack, so he slings them over the foot of the tub because there they look as if they were hanging up.

However early his studio call, either Dad or Mother trips down to have coffee with him. His sports are golf, swimming and hunting with Dennis Morgan in hunting season, but he can't live by the book and will break any date within reason if something that sounds more interesting comes along. He likes good clothes but won't fuss around with swatches, so orders while playing golf with his tailor. "I need a new suit, what have you got that's good?—Okay, build it."

He smokes cigarettes and a pipe, eats huge steaks, drinks two or three quarts of milk a day and keeps one on his table at night in case he wakes up. His car is the object of his idolatry. Ted knew Bill loved him when he loaned him the Lincoln—with trepidation—for graduation night. Bill chortles with joy, recalling Jane Wyman's crack. He'd been talking about the car—as if he tucked it into bed, covered it up and went out himself to sleep in the garage. Jane listened as long as she could stand it. Then: "Do you by any chance dust talcum between its rear wheels?"

He'll dash into a shop ten minutes before closing time to buy his mother a gift she doesn't need and, whatever the season, presents it with "Merry Christmas, Babe." A favorite diversion is heckling his parents. He has only to make a crack about the Irish or some political figure they admire to start the ball rolling. Then he sits back to enjoy himself. "They know I'm just out to draw blood, but—I don't know what it is in an Irishman—they always rise to the bait."

He thinks only a pompous ass would catalogue girls, say he likes this type and doesn't like that. You never know whom you'll like. Of course it makes things easier if she enjoys what you do, and he still enjoys bull sessions more than anything else—sitting around at somebody's house with music in the background—Wagner, if he can get it, or Debussy. Only at these sessions does he break a hard-and-fast rule not to argue about politics or the war. Among friends, you can grow heated, and it doesn't matter; you can call names, and they know you don't believe it. This kind of thing, Bill contends, does for the mind and soul what exercise does for the body.

He's been taking Ginny Simms out lately, on which fact no undue stress need be laid. Kay Kyser's still head man with Ginny. As for Bill, he regards marriage as a whale of an institution, but not for him right now. Eventually, yes. When he finds somebody he can nail down long enough to marry him. Interpreted, this means he wants marriage to be to him what it's been to his parents.

As noted, he likes people. But his special accolade is reserved for the few. If he asks you to drop around and meet his mother, then you've been tapped for honorary membership in the Lundigan club.

She has every intention of marrying—fairly soon, if the R.M. comes along—and having children, "three or four, I hope."

This being the case, it seems a good idea to blueprint the boy right now and to keep his description on file under the caption: Wanted—Lucky Lug For Love. Must have following qualifications:

First—he should not be an actor. Linda has never forgotten a date she had many moons ago with a tall, strikingly handsome young leading man who took her to the Trocadero before Hollywood night life was confined to Red Cross classes. He insisted on dancing every dance, but when Linda glanced up at him, she noted that his devoted gaze was not bent upon her, but was—with caution—concerned with a table in the more dimly lighted portion of the room. Finally, he could endure his Lone Wolf role no longer and decided to make Linda a confederate.

"When I whirl you around," he murmured, "look at that table over there and tell me whether Mr. X (a biggie producer) is watching me. He's casting his next picture, and he wants a suave juvenile who can really dance. The minute he notices me, let me know, and I'll give him some routines that will make him remember me."

Linda thinks ambition is swell, but who wants to mix moonlight and options?

better never than late . . .

Second—he should be as punctual as an army bugler. If there is anything that Linda hates, it is to wait for her escort to appear. She is always ready on the dot—maybe even a dash beforehand—and she expects to be shown the same sort of courtesy. One of the contributing causes to the downfall of her romance with Mickey Rooney was the fact that Mick—being swell and all that—was as unconscious of time as a sundial during a blackout. Also, Linda loathes rushing, and Mickey was always in a hurry to go somewhere or to go somewhere else. One afternoon Linda was kept late at the studio and didn't get home until a scant fifteen minutes before her Rooney date was due. In that fifteen minutes she showered, combed her hair, made up, dressed and zoomed down the stairs in time to answer the telephone. Mick was down in Long Beach looking at a boat and would be up as soon as he could make it. He knew she wouldn't mind.

Warning to Linda's future Lochinvar: Hell hath no fury like a hurried woman left cooling her heels.

In the third place, Linda admires a man with a king size sense of humor. Like, for instance, Kay Kyser who is Kwick with Kwips. Recently, she and Kay spent an evening at the beach, riding all the thrill-givers. The chute at Venice is no spot for the weak of heart, so naturally stout fellas Darnell and Kyser were seated in the front of the gone-crazy go-cart. It climbed laboriously on cogs to the top of a steep gradient, then oozed over and headed for h—er— the bottom while Linda clung to the rail with both hands and arms, braced her feet and fastened herself with mental glue to the seat. Mr. Kyser chose this moment to suggest laconically, "Let's play patty cake."

Linda considers that one of the best spur-of-the-moment cracks she has ever heard—on or off a roller coaster.

Furthermore, if his love deal is not to end in divorce, the Darnell Dandy must not object to a girl biting her fingernails. Up until October 16, when Linda became 18, she had no fingernails long enough to pick up a pin; after her birthday she decided to celebrate by growing claws enough to cut a cream pie. So far, she's 90 per cent successful, but the index finger of her right hand is still the worse for wear. And the instant her bright red polish on any finger has a nick, Linda scratches it until the nail is peeled. She has one other small, nervous habit: as she talks, she repeatedly lifts and lowers her right eyebrow.

As for amusements: Linda's ideal man should bowl. She herself once piled up a score of 196, but usually the figure slouches around the 120 mark because of a terrific left hook which she has tried both to correct and to take advantage of, with limited success. She likes to ride horseback—practically grew up on a pony down in Texas—and she swims a pretty good Trudgeon stroke. She loves to dance everything from waltz to jitterbug to rumba, but she begins to fold up at one ayem and wants to go home.

Not so long ago there was an 11:30 P.M. curfew imposed on Linda, but that was "a perfect mess. Things would just be getting started when I'd have to leave. Now that I'm eighteen, well criminy Moses, I feel that I should decide for myself what hours to keep when I'm not making a picture. The other night I stayed out until three, and nothing was said about it at home."

Although Linda doesn't want to marry an actor, she thinks that it would be wise for her to marry a man connected in some manner with the industry so he would understand the demands made on her by her work. The typical laboring day of an actress is no pipe course. If Linda has an eight o'clock set call, she rolls out at 5:30—having been awakened by her mother. She tried to use an alarm clock for a time, but the sudden noise gave her heart shock so badly that she was all tuckered out for several hours afterward.

Having leaped into the cold, grey dawn, she puts on her own make-up, which takes about thirty minutes. Her features are so perfect that no corrective markings are necessary, and her hands are so steady that she has no trouble cementing on those incredible Hollywood eyelashes.

This done, she dresses, ties a bandana around her head—the studio hairdresser does her hair because the coiffure is usually too complicated for achievement by two (only) human hands—and then Darnell, the student of world affairs, scans the headlines. She DOES NOT eat breakfast. "In the first place, I'm not hungry early in the morning, and besides, I don't like the things people have for breakfast. Not toast, nor Danish pastry, nor hot cakes, nor waffles."

After reading the paper, Linda consults her Movado wrist watch (yellow gold set with diamonds—a graduation gift) to be certain she's right on schedule, then drives to the studio in her Buick convertible which she was allowed to buy as a birthday present "from myself to myself with whoops of delight."

Around nine or ten o'clock on the set, she has fruit juice and cadges some of the doughnuts and coffee (with cream and sugar) that is regularly served to the set workers. This is rather a breaker-inner for her appetite, because "after that I go on sort of a food marathon. I'm simply famished by luncheon time and eat everything in sight. I have to have fruit, pastry, a sandwich or SOMETHING at four, and then I have a terrific dinner at 7:30."

When she isn't working, she doesn't roll out until she awakens naturally, which is usually on the wrong-rooster side of ten o'clock. And this late awakening is frequently caused by the fact that she has been reading the night before until two, three or four ayem. While she reads, she eats—candy, crackers, apples or Dagwood specials made by her 13-year-old sister, Monteloya, who is a positive genius before an open refrigerator.

She considers no sandwich worthy of the name unless it is an architectural triumph rising four or more inches above the plate. One of her cherished inventions is this recipe: take two slices of bread and spread thickly with creamery butter, after which spread on an equally thick layer of peanut butter. Add several layers of thinly sliced apples; add a layer of toasted marshmallow cooked just enough to squash nicely; add a layer of sliced bananas . . . and who said Joe E. Brown had a monopoly on oral stretchification?

The above is always taken with plenty of iced Pepsi-Cola. Linda loves the beverage and keeps the refrigerator stocked against a midnight thirst. She also adores triple thick malted milks and only wishes she had a personal soda fountain like Ginger Rogers' or Jane Withers'. She can't endure onions—first hand or fumes—and doesn't smoke or touch cocktails. She chews gum occasionally in a movie, but abandoned the habit in public because of a distressing incident in third grade when her teacher drew an awkward likeness between gum-chewing and cow-cudding.

Mr. Linda Darnell will find, like all husbands who wander innocently into matrimony, that he has been wooing a wardrobe as well as a woman. And, boys, that's where your wampum goes!

love is slacks. She has, at present, between 15 and 20 pairs. Several of these are four and five years old and thoroughly disreputable, but she cherishes them with a great and unreasoning affection because they make—in any state—superb garments in which to paint. She can wipe pastels on them, spatter oils on them, darken them with charcoal, and they only become more comfortable. She buys a size 14 for the leg length, but always has to have waist and hips taken in—she's smaller than average in the department that sends strong women screaming away from the scales. For these slacks she pays $7.95. With them she wears bright blouses—usually red or green.

Once in awhile she buys a complete slack costume for around $14.00—and these suits are white—her favorite color. Once she paid $29.50 for a suit, but she couldn't see that it was particularly better than the other suits, so never again. These statistics should cheer the most timorous of male pocketbooks.

As for dinner and evening dresses, Linda now has eight fresh enough to be worn in rotation. In Hollywood, the need for vast numbers of formal gowns that can be changed enough from time to time to fool the news cameras is a problem that can blast holes the size of the B 19 in any budget. Linda never pays more than $50.00 for her fancy frocks, although she remembers looking longingly at a luscious little number bearing a $250.00 price tag. "I didn't even try it on," she says, chuckling, "because I knew that if I lost my balance and bought it, I'd hate myself. Every time I wore it, I'd think of the starving Greeks or some such, and I wouldn't have a moment's enjoyment of my extravagance."

Notice that word extravagance. It's heartening to see what Linda considers out of bounds, because she is currently drawing about $1,000 per week, of which the government promptly takes almost half as income tax. The remainder is divided 35%-65%, the 35% going into Linda's trust fund, and the balance used by Linda and her family for living expenses.

But back to clothes. Linda has one silver fox coat that she wears over street clothes and slacks when the weather goes arctic, and one pure white fox coat that she wears only for evening.

She likes to shop alone, so her future husband won't be toted off to perspire beside a millinery mirror or to mumble vague suggestions about that blonde model in a play suit. The only time Linda takes her mother along on buying sprees is when a coat or an important evening gown must be annexed.

Linda's underthings consist of a bra and a satin lastex panty. She NEVER wears a slip. Her evening gowns have shadow-proofing built in, and when she has to wear some thickness under her street dresses, she scoots into a half-petticoat, perfectly tailored and split on each side to give stride room. She wears a size 5½ B shoe and makes no compromise on the heel situation—either skyscrapers or flat as an ungummed postage stamp.

Linda's mother buys her an occasional supply of pajamas, but Senorita Darnell's basal metabolism is active enough to make her want to sleep peeled. Still, Mrs. Darnell awakens her daughter every morning, so Linda compromises; she sleeps in uppers. (According to the latest census, this is a habit indulged in by 93 and 79/100 percent of the male population, so what complaint could there be?)

Every Wife Must Face This Intimate Problem . . .
HERE ARE THE FACTS!

Safe new way in feminine hygiene gives continuous action for hours!

● Whenever you see a happily-married woman, you can be fairly certain that she knows the truth about the vital, intimate problem of feminine hygiene.

You can too! Today no woman need trust the half-truths told her by misinformed friends! No woman need rely on weak, ineffective "home-made" solutions—or risk using over-strong solutions of acids which can burn, scar and desensitize delicate tissues.

Intelligent, well-informed women everywhere have turned to Zonitors—the new, safe, convenient way in feminine hygiene.

Zonitors are dainty, snow-white suppositories which spread a greaseless, protective coating . . . and kill germs instantly at contact. Deodorize—not by temporarily masking—but by destroying odors. Cleanse antiseptically and give continuous medication for hours.

Yet Zonitors are safe for delicate tissues. Powerful—yet non-poisonous, non-caustic. Even help promote gentle healing. No apparatus; nothing to mix. At all druggists.

It would be a good idea for the future head of the house of Darnell to possess an interest in art, because Linda's hobby is serious and takes up a great deal of her free time. Like many great natural talents, Linda's ability was evident during her childhood; she had a neat racket in grade school that paid her five cents per page for perfecting the music notebooks of her contemporaries. Also, she drew dolls and designed clothes for them (remember those cardboard tabs that folded over the doll's shoulders), and for this service she netted five cents per page.

In formal art classes she found still life dull as a drug store steak knife. "I never could see any sense in putting an orange, a banana, a grape and a wooden dog on a plate and then trying to reproduce them in water colors."

But when portraiture came to her attention, she won by a nose—preferably one like Tyrone Power's. "The human face is the most difficult, the most challenging of all subjects. Pev Marley fascinated me from the first" (the chap who took her first test and photographed her first three pictures), "and Lana Turner has a simply fabulous face."

Linda has done Marley and Ty Power in oils, Lana Turner in pastels from a photograph (Linda has never met Lana—a fact that she deplores), Clark Gable in pastels from a photograph, Ann Miller (Linda's best friend) in oils, Cary Grant in oils and Rita Hayworth in pastels.

As for music, the bridegroom-to-be had better dote on the Scheherezade and Nutcracker Suites, and he had better think that "Blues In The Night" is going to be as permanent as "St. Louis Blues," or he'll have a domestic argument on his hands. He might, also, cook up an okay for Glenn Miller's recording of "Chattanooga Choo-Choo" and Duke Ellington's "I Got It Bad And That Ain't Good" to be hearing ear to ear with the Little Woman.

Linda also likes Xavier Cugat's "Jalousie," Artie Shaw's "Begin The Beguine," Woodie Herman's "Frenesi," Paul Whiteman's "Rhapsody in Blue," and she really goes for the Ink Spots' "If I Didn't Care." Dave Rose is her favorite orchestra leader.

In case That Certain Man might be afraid of in-law trouble because of the apparent closely knit kinship ties of the Darnell family, Linda has something sensible to say on the subject. "It isn't my character to confide all my affairs to any member of my family. I'm devoted to every one, but I've always been a little bit of a lone wolf. I like to be an individual first and a member of a group, second—I think it's the only way to develop personality." And those who should know say that Mrs. Darnell—a wise woman—is gradually lengthening the apron strings and plans, eventually, to slip the last knot and to set the lady free.

It would be nice for Linda's lover to like to pet—animals. The presence of livestock in the Darnell backyard is so well known that there is no need to go into more than a census, to wit: 6 rabbits, 5 guinea pigs, 6 ducks, 1 grey goose named "Swoose," 2 cocker spaniels, question-mark number of pigeons, 2 white leghorn chickens and one highly raucous rooster. This menagerie has now been turned over intact to Linda's younger sister and brother as sole owners and operators.

As for gifts, Linda always welcomes perfume as long as the flavor is violet or gardenia. She thinks books are nice presents, too. Her favorites are "The Nazarene" by Sholem Asch, "The Sun Is My Undoing" by Margaret Steen, and "Keys Of The Kingdom" by A. J. Cronin. She dotes on murder mysteries, the more spine-chilling the better. Speaking of thrillers, Linda is to do the part of the wife in "Loves Of Edgar Allan Poe."

Final note to the going-to-be guy in Linda's life: Better develop a mass of muscles and look so formidable that the very sight of you would discourage a burglar. Be prepared to turn on and off all lights and to investigate strange sounds at night. Because Mrs. Darnell's little girl is still afraid of the dark.

TORTILLA FLAT STORY

much wine, now, might it not be worth?

Torelli, to Pilon's sorrow, had a niggardly answer to this; two gallons only, for who knew whether the gold in the watch was real?

But there was Señora Torelli. Pilon knew how to work her—for that matter, any woman. Four gallons made the start of a fine party. A party worthy of the dazzling stroke of luck which had befallen Danny.

If only he had not chanced to stop, with his liberated host of the evening, at the house of Señora Teresina!

There was a girl in the yard of the next place, a girl with a body made up of long curves like a wave just ready to break; with a mouth that was red and full at its center; with dark hair hanging loose in a cloud. She was new to the Flat, that one, and new to poor Danny, too. He kept staring after her, like a man left too long in the hot sun of noon.

According to Señora Teresina, the newcomer's name was Dolores Ramirez. But for a reason unspecified, she was also called Sweets. A girl who as Pilon tried to warn his friend, looked like she'd have notions of marriage under her soft black hair. But Danny seemed not to hear.

The house to which they were heading—only half the fine legacy, Pilon kept remembering—stood next to that of Mrs. Morales, who needed no other charms when one considered her yardful of plump chickens.

It was as natural as gravity, as a river's flow downhill, that Pilon should move in with his friend; and with him Pablo and Portuguese Joe and Jesus Maria Corcoran. They could do their amigo Danny good.

That they could also do him harm was not much considered. Not, at least, until the day they set fire to his house and burned it down.

During the interim, Danny had not been with them long enough to object. A landlord now, a man of substance, he was forever hanging over the fence adjoining Señora Teresina's. He was paying court to his Dolores in earnest—and making a good progress at it, too.

unrequited love . . .

The disaster of the fire, even, he could shrug off with good humor; for had he not another house? But Dolores' abruptly deciding she would have no more to do with him, since he had no job and was no good and befriended a houseful of no-goods—ah, that was something else again!

In private, Pilon considered it good riddance. But his heart could not help being troubled at the sight of Danny's misery. That Sweets, she had turned the whole world sour for the boy. . . .

If he had not been so busy with other fish to fry, he might have gone past that fatal fence and argued with the girl himself; or hit her, maybe. But the matter of the Pirate was vying for his attention.

This Pirate was one of the mysteries of Tortilla Flat. Five dogs, the queer old man kept with him. It was a known fact that he earned a quarter a day—yes, every day—cutting wood. Yet never had he been known to spend a cent of it. If one kept on piling up quarters, week in and week out, it became obvious what the ultimate result must be.

So, as a first step in his investigation of an intriguing situation, Pilon invited the Pirate to move into the second house with the rest of them. It was not as if Danny was around enough to protest at the dogs. Poor Danny was so much in love with that Dolores, so deep in his madness, that he actually stayed out all day looking for work!

Money which trickled in yet never trickled out. That fascination grew in Pilon, as the days passed, until it was almost as if the unglimpsed accumulation were a woman he hungered to hold in his arms.

Gradually, the Pirate became more at home in the house that had belonged to Danny's grandfather. Pilon then began his easy-spoken, brotherly murmurs. A buried treasure, that was the height of folly. Might not robbers dig it up? Spring rains, might they not wash it away? If it were to be hidden in some safe spot like this house, now—

To his utter amazement, to his horrified disgust, the Pirate did the one thing which was unforgivable. He willingly, freely, without suspicion, turned over his hoard for his good friend Pilon to guard.

Nombre de Dios! One who would have robbed the old man with never a qualm now must protect a wretched sack of quarters with his life!

It was the work of the Devil himself. A cache like that, all glittering silver, being saved to buy a golden candlestick for St. Francis—who had answered a prayer when one of the Pirate's little dogs was sick! Yet there was nothing to be done. Nothing but to face it.

The household was bright at high noon on a hillside, these days. Poor Danny was back in the good graces of his Dolores, who was touched by his efforts. He had bought her a vacuum sweeper, the ultimate in luxury even though there was no electricity in Tortilla Flat. Every evening, he walked her home from the cannery where she worked. He went about with a smile as sickly sweet as a child's penny candy.

Pilon bore all this as best he might. It was only natural that a man should jump to certain conclusions, however.

It could not be said he lied when he spread abroad the tale that Dolores and Danny were about to be married. He was sincerely amazed when the story, reaching Danny's own ears, was greeted with whoops of astonished joy; when Danny tore off to find the lady and confirm it.

ill winds . . .

That his friend was to be met by nothing but disaster, that the treasured vacuum sweeper had been stolen, and Dolores was in a mood to swear she'd have Danny on no condition whatever, Pilon did not learn until later. He was so busy making the Pirate ready to present his gold candlestick that he had time for very little else, thoughts for no one.

The ceremony of presentation was very beautiful, very touching.

Even Pilon had to admit that. He felt a strange goodness inside him, a sort of glow as if he had swallowed some of the candlelight. It was a pity all this should be spoiled by tragedy; by the shrewish accusations and outcries of that girl for whom Danny had turned respectable.

It took the black news quite a time to penetrate. The news that Danny, rejected, had gone on a blind drunk and turned up reeling at the cannery. Pilon had to follow it syllable by syllable. So then the foreman had fought with him? So then Danny had been pushed into the great, whirring machinery? So he was hurt, badly hurt?

Badly hurt! Those were the only words that mattered. Inside him, Pilon felt the light go out. It was black, instead. Empty and black.

Dolores kept screaming at him; telling him over and over that his clumsy lies were to blame for everything. He pushed past her, unheeding, and stumbled along the street. Badly—hurt—

For the first time since he was a boy, he went to the church. St. Francis had answered the prayer of the Pirate, had he not? A nice boy like Danny must be worth saving, even more than a little dog.

Badly hurt in the great, grinding wheels! Must Danny die now—for something foolish that he, Pilon, had said? For the mate to that handsome golden candlestick, St. Francis? For any offering a poor man might steal or wheedle or—or earn, even? Please, St. Francis!

It was good of St. Francis to listen. It was good of him to take pity. Even until the day when Danny once more arose from his bed, that sick little core of terror never quite melted in Pilon's heart.

It remained for the wedding day to make him feel good again, as if the candle in his belly had been relighted. The gay party, the music, the red wine, the laughing, were balm at last to the nagging sting like a wasp's in his heart. There was a raffle, and money was raised to buy the bridegroom a fine boat. Yes, it was a good wedding.

Afterward, back home, Pilon got to thinking. Danny was on his wedding journey, now. But how long would that magic last, indeed?

A man knew that women were trouble to him, soon or late. Danny had been happy until that first day he inherited the houses and saw Dolores. It seemed, looking back, that many misfortunes had come of it. Owning houses, that was not good. A man wanted more. A wife, a job—

Pilon's reflections broke off abruptly. There was a wild shout near him. Jesus Maria had accidentally tossed a lighted match in through an open window. Already small tongues of red licked at the warped walls. Danny's second house was going up in smoke around them! Pilon shook his head as he pushed back his hat.

TORTILLA FLAT PRODUCTION

bribes; talked to him like a father, a Dutch uncle, as one man to another. Nothing worked. John's answer, every time, was a loud laugh and a louder 'pop' of his Double-mint.

Johnny Weissmuller, whose usual picture costume is a muchly-worn leopard skin, wandered onto the set wearing a brand new suit, perfectly draped, expertly sewn. He watched Spence, Morgan and the rest fight their way through brambles and vines for an escape scene, then joined them for a minute after the fourth 'take.' Assuming a nose-in-the-air attitude, he commented "Really—what some actors will do to earn a living!" His pretty suit, for one whole minute, was in danger of being shredded!

Around the set: Myrna Loy, togged out in her Bundles For Bluejackets uniform, appeared bright and early one day and signed Tracy, Garfield, Morgan and Director Vic Fleming to a pledge to contribute $10 a month for a year, to pay for coffee, doughnuts and entertainment for the boys in service . . . John Garfield, who can barely make it around a dance floor without stomping on everyone, spent every available minute rehearsing the tricky native paisano dance he had to do in the wedding scene . . . Allen Jenkins showed up one morning with bags under his eyes and boxes of cigars under his arms. He had just become the father of an eight-pound, ten-ounce baby girl!

There were no location headaches. The Monterey home shots were photographed on the Metro-Goldwyn-Mayer lot, on a stage 310 feet long, 133 feet wide, 40 feet high. Art Director Cedric Gibbons spent days visiting the paisano settlements in and around Monterey, California, sketching the shacks, the vegetable gardens, the majestic Monterey pines. He arranged to have some of the trees transported back to Hollywood, then went home and dreamed up from his drawings and photographs an ideal set that captured the best points of every one of the towns he had visited.

Tons of earth were poured over the floor of the set, rivers and streams were planned, and dusty roads were designed so that they seemed to fade away into the distance. The set was built weeks before the cast was chosen. Goats, chickens and dogs were moved in immediately so they'd be used to their surroundings and act completely natural when the cameras began turning. Perfectionist Gibbons, worried about the perspective of the background, had all doubts removed the tenth day of production. Gertie, the sea gull hired for $2.50 a day to lend atmosphere, got nostalgia staring at the far-off horizon. With one mighty flap of her wings, she rose from her stone resting place, wheeled toward the panoramic backdrop painted to represent the distant ocean, and banged her big white beak smack straight into a canvas cloud!

GOOD NEWS

And for your sake, Mr. Cassini, we are happy. You're a right nice guy!

Modern Screen: Detective

As much as we hate to spike a good story, we think the truth ought to be told about the Mystery of Beverly Hills. For weeks, the good citizens of Beverly have been whispering and speculating about the strange building that has recently arisen in their midst—strange, because though no one works there, it is visited at all hours of the day and night by people like Red Skelton, Fred MacMurray, John Wayne and Patric Knowles!

Wonderful and fantastic tales are being told about the nature of the establishment. We are sorry to say they're all so much Malarkey. The building is not the scene of murder, orgies and spy plottings it has been painted to be. It is merely Polar Pantry, Inc., another prosaic link in the chain of frozen food warehouses which have sprung up across the country.

For $20 a year, Skelton, MacMurray, Wayne and Knowles, as well as Johnny Weissmuller, Lloyd Nolan, Ian Hunter and a dozen other stars, rent individual Polar Pantry lockers. In them they store several months' supply of beef, ham, pork and other meats. By buying in large quantities and storing their food in refrigerated closets, they reckon they can save $100 apiece over a period of twelve months!

"It's a nuisance to go down to the Pantry and whack off a chunk every time my cook wants a steak or chops," Knowles told us. "But that $100 saving—it's worth the inconvenience."

Incidentally, we hear the Pantryites have their own quip about the place. They're spreading the rumor that Skelton stacks his gag books there—to keep his jokes fresh! Ouch. . . .!

The American Way

Worried about democracy in our armed forces? Worried about class, money and position making themselves felt among our fighting men? Well, forget it. America still believes all men are created equal, and this story of Jimmy Stewart's will prove it.

Jimmy was in Baltimore recently, on an Army assignment. When his work was finished, he strode out of the building where his conference had been held and marched smack into hundreds of fans who had gathered to wait for him. From all sides, yells of "Hi, Jimmy," "Hi, Lieutenant," "Hi, Glamour Boy," went up to greet him.

Jimmy flushed with embarrassment, but smiled patiently as he worked his way through the mob. At the end of the crowd, he came face to face with a sailor—a hard-boiled gob who looked contemptuously at the fans and then at Stewart. As the actor approached, the sailor eyed him from head to toe, and—in two words that spoke volumes—he grunted, "Hi, soldier!"

Small Change

In the old days, between wives, George Brent was about as sociable as an ostrich. He liked people, but he liked his books, privacy and seclusion more. He wouldn't answer the phone. He wouldn't go to the door. He wouldn't circulate.

But now that he is a married man again—a very married man, if you'll notice the way he still makes klieg-eyes at wife Annie Sheridan—George Brent has become a completely changed person. And how!

He's no longer a hermit. In fact, he now overwhelms neighbors by assaulting them with the toothy friendliness of a Macy floor-walker. If the phone rings, he takes it himself. He talks to everyone. To his friends. To Annie's friends. If the doorbell rings, he almost runs over the maid getting there first, to greet and chat with bill collectors, peddlers, Annie's Red Cross friends and the gas meter man.

Old-timers who knew Brent when his favorite company was the four walls, now cluck their tongues and philosophize on marriage, murmuring, "Yes, this one is for keeps, all right. Just look at what it did to the guy. He loves everyone and everything! The hermit act is gone forever!"

But don't tell that to Ann Sothern!

"Hermit act gone forever?" she snaps. "Nuts! Listen, I decided to give George and Ann a wedding present—a dozen sterling silver sherbet cups. I thought I'd deliver them in person with my own two little hands. I knew they were living in George's home near Toluca Lake. That's about four miles above Hollywood. Well, I had Bob Sterling drive me out one bright morning. Drive? It was a full-scale expedition. We looked for their home all morning and all afternoon, ringing doorbells, hiking through lots, pulling dogs from our calves. We went round and round in a maze of side roads. But we couldn't find the house!

"Still, I wasn't discouraged. The next morning we drove out and tried again. Same thing. Couldn't find the place at all. It was either give up my movie career and continue the search or else—so I turned the present over to Railway Express. Yesterday I got a postcard from Railway Express. They're still looking for Brent's home! Not a hermit anymore, eh? You find him!"

No Greater Love

When a gal's willing to dig into her own pockets and give her husband financial aid so he can afford a second love, that, brother, is one for the books! When the gal is Brenda Marshall and the husband Bill Holden—well!—that bears immediate looking into!

It all began when Brenda was at work at the studio, and Bill, out for a solitary walk, saw her. It was love at first sight. She was smart, flashy, tricky—and what a chassis! Just his type! Bill's eyes filled with longing. His mouth watered. He had to have her.

Then he remembered Brenda and his business manager. They'd be furious. Bill shrugged his shoulders and decided to forget the whole affair.

Yet, that evening at dinner with Brenda and the b.m., Bill found he couldn't forget. She'd stirred his imagination. Filled him with excitement. But she'd require money. That was the rub. And his business manager wouldn't allow him more than $25 a week. Or would he?

Bill couldn't stand it any longer. He waited for Brenda to leave the table and then confided his secret to the keeper of accounts.

"Nothing doing," stormed the professional Scrooge. "You ought to be ashamed of yourself! I don't care if she is terrific! I won't give you a cent for her!"

Just then Brenda walked into the room, eyes blazing. Bill gulped. The time had come to lay his cards on the table.

"Honey, when we were married, you promised you'd understand everything," he said with a pleading puppy-dog glance. "I've got to have money. I need $150."

Brenda was aghast. "What for?" she demanded. Bill gulped again. He thought fleetingly of abandoning his cause, but he'd already taken the step. There was nothing to do but tell the truth.

Did Brenda stand the test? Did she show the wifely understanding expected of her? We are here to report, she did! For six long, torturous weeks she shared her allowance with Bill, doing without a dozen little things she wanted, while he accumulated his own. The six weeks were up the other day.

"And now she's mine, all mine!" boasts Bill. "The snappiest little midget racer you ever laid eyes on! Smart, tricky, and, boy, what a chassis!"

Activities Deferred

These are mighty black days for the friends and followers of Errol Flynn. With word out that Errol is suffering from an enlargement of the heart, those who hold affection for the fighting Irishman will have to face the gloomy fact that for a year at least, all his strenuous activity must necessarily be confined to the screen.

According to his doctor, Errol's condition, known as "athlete's heart" was provoked by his excessive devotion to athletics. Intimates think that the innate restlessness which keeps him constantly on the go, plus his concern over the upset state of his marital affairs, are other factors which prevent him from getting a 1-A health rating.

If he follows the advice of his medico, Errol can hope to be his own robust self by the early part of '43. The doc says athletics are out, and from now on it's rest, rest and more rest for Mr. Flynn.

But the doc's a sly one. Though insisting on eight hours sleep every night for his patient, he's given his professional okay to an "occasional night off."

Hedy and Annie

We kibitzed on a strictly feminine gab session between Hedy Lamarr and Ann Sothern the other afternoon and discovered that Ann is the gal responsible for Hedy's new pigtails. It all came about when Hedy told Annie that she hadn't changed her hair style since she was a mere slip of a maiden. Ann thought that was but too terrible and set about fixing Hedy's locks some other way. Hedy liked the result so well, she kept the hair-do for some of the scenes in "Tortilla Flat."

We also discovered that Hedy always protects her raven tresses from powder marks by donning a shower cap before wafting a puff over her face. Ann gets entirely dressed and covers her clothes with her favorite blue and white dressing robe before putting on finishing make-up touches.

The story of how maestro Artie Shaw lost his first job sounds like the kind of nightmare that comes after a midnight ice cream-and-pickle feast.

While still in his tender teens, Artie was hired to handle clarinet for a theater orchestra at a summer resort. He worked during the evenings and spent his days toasting his torso on the beach. One day the sun beat down with lots more oomph than usual, and Artie passed out with a mild case of sunstroke. When he awoke, it was dark, and all he could remember was that he had to get to the theater on time. Streaking off the beach, he tore back to town and piled into his seat in the darkened orchestra pit with only one minute to spare before the overture.

Artie tootled gaily and a little shiveringly through the first half of the program, and at intermission time, had one foot out the door when the manager suddenly appeared on the stage.

"Ladies and gentlemen," he bellowed. "Night after night you've been entertained by a group of men whose praises usually go unsung. Tonight, I want you to meet the lads whose work has given us all so much pleasure. I give you—the house orchestra!"

Up went the lights, and there, in full view of the entire audience, sat the musicians, every one neatly togged out in snappy summer suits. Everyone, that is, except Mr. Shaw, whose bare chest and legs, gleaming in the spotlight, caused a Class A riot in the audience and a Class A case of apoplexy to the manager!

Good-By To Love

Olivia de Havilland is getting a mite fussed. She wishes people would forget her romance with Jimmy Stewart and stop reviving those marriage rumors every time Jimmy comes to Hollywood. All that love stuff, she says, is deader'n a herring and twice as cold. They called it quits a year and a half ago, she insists, and all that's left is friendship. Period.

"The talk started again," Olivia told us, "when I was at dinner at Burgess Meredith's house, and Jimmy stopped by. Both boys escorted me to a broadcast I was doing that evening. Then Jimmy left to return to camp. We weren't even alone for a minute! Anyway, I don't think there's a place for a girl in Jimmy's present life. He's a 100% soldier, you know. Can't think or talk of anything but the army. The damsel doesn't live who can buck competition like that!

"And I'm not suggesting we'll be an item when the war is over! Jimmy's first and deepest love is acting. When he's released from service I believe he'll turn all his energies to his work, and that Eligible Bachelor tag will probably stick for years!"

Well, Livvy's entitled to her say. But we're entitled to ours, too. We think the little de Havilland is one of the sweetest, finest girls in these or any parts. We think career and duty may be terribly important in the Stewart scheme of things. But shucks. We think a man's a man for all that!

Short Shots

What the . . .! Dept: Paramount announces it is changing the title of "Nightmare of a Jerk" to "Nightmare of a Goon!" A promotion, no doubt . . . Footballer Johnny Kimbrough, up for army duty, has accepted $15,000 in settlement of his contract and quit Hollywood . . . It's thumbs down on Tyrone Power. Ty was nixed as a flying cadet because he's married and isn't a college grad . . . "The Life of Wendell Willkie" is being gabbed about as possible flicker for Director Sam Wood . . . Dennis Morgan is doing all his home vocalizing in his new bombproof, soundproof shelter. At his neighbors' request . . . Robert Donat, recovering from a serious illness in England, is due on these shores for a major part in "Keys of the Kingdom" . . . And Cary Grant's been nominated for the George Gershwin role in Warners' filmization of the composer's life . . . May Robson is putting fret lines on Hollywood's brow. She's not too well . . . Ex-marathon dancer June Havoc once trotted her tootsies over a Florida arena for 2,500 consecutive hours, only pausing for an 11 minute rest period each hour . . . Talk of the town is the lovely new melody tagged "Olivia," introduced by the Merry Macs and inspired by Olivia de Havilland . . . It's Alaska for Martha Raye when she winds her p.a. tour. She'll entertain the service lads there . . . Cesar Romero and George Montgomery are wearing lapel-less suit coats—anticipating the expected-to-be-passed wartime measure.

What's in a Name?

"Blues In The Night" are exactly what Harold Arlen and Johnny Mercer had while composing their hit song. Assigned to write a tune to fit a picture of that name, the boys had the entire thing cooking and ready to jell when word came from the powers-that-be that "Blues In The Night" was a lousy title and henceforth the picture would be known as "New Orleans Blues."

Hal and Johnny promptly went into a huddle and for days tried to work the new title into their already completed song, but without success. Finally, when they had decided to call the ditty "My Momma Done Tole Me" and let the clefs fall when they may, word was brought to them, via official memo, that the picture had been retitled and was back to the original "Blues In The Night"!

Now, after both Johnny and Hal have sprouted gray hair worrying about it, Dave Rose and Judy Garland, back from a personal appearance tour, reveal that no one requested the song under its present title. Everywhere they went, audiences asked Dave and Judy to do—"My Momma Done Tole Me"!

Artie Takes a Bride

Speaking of Artie Shaw, when his first three marriages came up they weren't news. His fourth made headlines because the bride was luscious Lana Turner. His fifth is worth noting for two reasons: (a) Any guy's fifth marriage would be and (b) the new Mrs. Shaw is Betty Kern, 23-year-old daughter of famed composer Jerome Kern.

Unlike his Las Vegas mating with Lana, Artie's midnight ride to Yuma with Betty was not a spur-of-the-moment elopement. The pair had known each other more than a year and a half before they faced the judge. They met at Hollywood's favorite jitterbug haunt, the Palladium, when Artie and his band were doing a stint there. They had a few dates, never thought of romance. Artie even left town for a while without troubling to say good-by to the girl he knew so slightly. But he returned, he says, because Betty was always in the back of his mind.

When they knew it was love, Artie went to Mr. Kern and asked for his daughter's hand. Papa Kern was all for it. But, please, he asked, would they wait a bit 'til they were sure? Artie and Betty reluctantly agreed. And were it not for Playwright William Saroyan, they might be waiting still.

Saroyan, who's never been married himself, urged them to hurry it up!

The night they decided to marry, Artie dined at the Kern home. He and Betty planned to leave immediately after the dessert—and after they had told Mr. Kern. Dinner was over at eight, but it wasn't 'til 11:00 o'clock that Artie found the nerve and the opportunity to pop the news!

Kern objected. He didn't want his daughter to elope. But he yielded when Artie argued that if they applied for a license in Los Angeles and waited the required number of days, reporters would spring at them, and they'd have no pre-marital privacy.

Shortly before twelve, on the night of March the 3rd, the wedding party—Artie, Betty and Mrs. Kern—set out. Mr. Kern begged off because of an important appointment the following morning, and supposed-to-be-best man, Bill Saroyan, was on a date and couldn't be located. The kids were grateful Mama Kern didn't disappoint them, too. When they arrived in Yuma they found they had no wedding ring, and Mrs. K. had to lend them her own before the ceremony could proceed!

Divorce Scandal

If the true story behind the recent divorce of a top-flight actress and her non-pro husband ever gets out of the hands of the few who know it, the lid will be blown right off Hollywood! Seldom in the history of this town has the stiff, cold language of a legal action hidden a nastier case!

Seems the star, one of the most beautiful in the business, had been at odds with her spouse for some time. When the final break came, she asked him to sit down with her while she outlined her plan for the divorce—a plan which was to terminate their marriage with decency and intelligence. Hubby listened carefully as she spoke, nodded occasionally, but made no comment. When she finished he asked if she'd mind his making a suggestion or two. The star said no. She was eager to settle their problem in complete fairness to both. She wanted to hear his side, too.

Hubby thanked her for her thoughtfulness, sat forward in his chair and began to talk. When he was through, the star was weak and trembling. Her loving mate had presented the cruelest scheme of blackmail she had ever heard! Realizing that an actress' career is only as good as her reputation, he had threatened to go into court and accuse her of shocking indiscretions unless she turned over to him every cent she owned!

Whether guilty or not, no star can stand up under a spot-lighted scandal. As a consequence, our poor heroine, rather than jeopardize her future, must accept her husband's terms. She must remain silent and watch the heel blandly make off with her $50,000 bank account, her automobile and her beautiful new home!

Skelton vs. Skelton

Red Skelton and his wife, Edna, are usually on the same side of the fence in issues at stake, but when the subject of Edna's clothes pops up, they're likely to square off in opposite corners. Edna loves conservative outfits, trimly tailored, with lots of brown. Red prefers her in clothes with dramatic flare and daring color combinations—and he hates brown!

Hats are another thing, Red says, "The screwier, the better." Yet, if Edna had her way, she'd wear sensible sports-like lids exclusively. That's why Red spends so much time at I. Magnin's. On days off, he pops down to the department store, all by his solitary, and shops like mad. Edna can't let his gifts dangle from a clothes hanger, so she wears 'em! Funny thing is, they're both right. Edna's one of the few women who can wear every type of outfit and always look just so!

This Way Out

One of the wealthier, more prominent stars has a nasty habit of ordering the clothes she wears in her pictures to be set aside for her purchase after a film is finished. That's okay. That's every star's privilege. But this one never pays for the duds! She just lets the bills collect dust on her desk, then sweeps through the studio in the unpaid-for creations, looking down her nose at the very women who worked so hard to make her look beautiful.

One afternoon the actress phoned to demand that a certain dress be pressed and readied for her to wear to a premiere that evening. The seamstresses decided to teach her a lesson. Gleefully they got busy and loosened every key thread in the gown!

Promptly at eight that night, our hoity-toity cutie swept up to the foyer of the theater, turning on the big smile every ten feet. Completely unaware that every move she made was gradually loosening those all-important seams, she bowed and waved to her admiring fans. Just as she was throatily informing her public, coast-to-coast, via the microphone, that she was "oh, so happy to be heah" she heard a snicker—and looking down discovered her skirt had slipped to the cement with that gentle whisper of sound usually heard on the runway of better burlesque houses!

P.S. She paid her bill, in full, the very next morning.

Designed for Working

We saw Barbara Stanwyck stroll into the Paramount commissary the other noon wearing a suit that was the perfect answer to a gal aircraft worker's prayer!

The slim sheath skirt of soft grey, plaited with thin brown stripes, had enormous compartments, like mechanics' pockets, stitched onto it—perfect for toting a flashlight or other emergency equipment. The long warm jacket also boasted roomy pockets and sported a lapel gadget—a nifty-looking pencil that actually worked! Even the pockets on the skirt had a purpose—little coin compartments had been sewed into them! The final utilitarian note was Barbara's purse—one of those slung-over-the-shoulder jobs that leaves the hands free for more important work with maximum efficiency.

EVERY PENNY COUNTS!

Movies aren't being rationed, thank Heaven. No. The stars are busy turning out new pictures each month for your entertainment—busy as only popular movie stars can be when the cameras are grinding. But with it all, not one has failed to join the ranks of those who are fighting shoulder to shoulder to keep America free. Paulette Goddard has bought $35,000 worth of defense bonds; Betty Grable, $10,000 (just last month); the Reagans put in every cent over what's needed for bare living. We could fill this page listing names.

It isn't only patriotism. These provident, far-seeing stars realize that buying defense bonds is primarily Uncle Sam's plan to help them save. Their money buys planes and tanks and ships—and in a day of peace to come, it will all come back to them with interest. Invested in bonds, it cannot be wasted in the purchase of automobiles and radios and new clothes—those peace-time commodities that are no longer being made, with factory machines geared to war production.

It isn't only duty, patriotism, the burning wish of all of us to defend America against bloody aggression. It's good common sense. Let's make stamp and defense bond buying a habit!

The greatest star of the screen!

Call us Nostradamus, Jr. At any rate we're following in the footsteps of the eminent foreteller.

We are about to prophesy that the Jan Struther novel, "Mrs. Miniver" will be the First Lady of the Screen for '42.

★ ★ ★ ★

We have our paw on the pulse of the public when we make our startling prediction. We saw William Wyler's production of "Mrs. Miniver" in a Hollywood preview.

★ ★ ★ ★

Let us tell you about that preview.

★ ★ ★ ★

Prepared for the screen by producer Sidney Franklin, who had had an editorial hand in "Goodbye Mr. Chips", there was reason to believe that "Mrs. Miniver" was an equally creditable picture.

★ ★ ★ ★

But it was not certain what the public would say.

★ ★ ★ ★

It was evident that William Wyler, one of the really great directors, had done his finest job . . .

★ ★ ★ ★

That Greer Garson as Mrs. Miniver had been perfection itself . . .

★ ★ ★ ★

And that Walter Pidgeon as Clem had been dream-like casting . . .

It was said that no finer supporting cast had ever been assembled than Teresa Wright, Dame May Whitty, Reginald Owen, Henry Travers, Richard Ney, Tom Conway, Henry Wilcoxon.

★ ★ ★ ★

Still, there was a lot to be learned from the first public reaction to this most unusual type of film about a peaceful little life caught in the maelstrom of the moment.

★ ★ ★ ★

Imagine the excitement! Only once before—it was the preview of "Big Parade" —had there been such a tremendous public demonstration in favor of a film.

★ ★ ★ ★

"Mrs. Miniver" had joined the big parade of the screen's noblest.

★ ★ ★ ★

Now it's true we haven't told you about the story. Perhaps we should have done it, because our purpose is to arouse your interest.

★ ★ ★ ★

Sounds selfish, doesn't it?

★ ★ ★ ★

But when you see "Mrs. Miniver" you'll remember whom to thank for the tip—

MOVIE REVIEWS

By Zachary Gold

After the blitz, the local vicar reaffirms the Minivers' and other townspeople's faith in the future.

Greer Garson, as Mrs. Miniver, and Walter Pidgeon, as Clem Miniver, are heartbroken when Starling, their home, is bombed.

MRS. MINIVER

In the long roster of England's heroes—the incredibly young RAF pilots, the mysterious and somewhat sinister Commandos, the sea-sprayed sailors of the navy, the lean and tough Australians of the Libyan campaign—it may be a little startling to find the trim, sedate figure of Mrs. Miniver. For the world of Mrs. Miniver was contained in a rose, a frilly hat and the unobtrusive excitement of a happy family. Yet through all the eternity of months of England's bombing, through days of fear and pain and death, the Minivers served their country as surely as soldiers at the front.

For all its roses and frilly hats, "Mrs. Miniver" has a greater impact of reality than a dozen of some blood and thunder dramas. It's just that—real. While movies of the armed forces may have more thrills per foot, a greater tendency to set the blood thumping, they are still, in these early days of the war, somewhat foreign, strange, unreal; we may know them to be true, yet, being outside our immediate experience, they're not quite believable at present.

It was the Minivers of England, holding out stubbornly, doggedly through everything, that set the tone for England; that's what's meant by morale. Just as it was the failure of the Minivers of France that contributed to her tragic defeat.

The Minivers' younger children, Christopher Severn and Claire Sanders, sleep in their air-raid shelter.

Before turning him over to the outhorities, Mrs. Miniver administers first oid to Germon porachutist, Helmuth Douteric, who londed injured in her garden.

For in these days of total war, civilian morale counts as much as divisions of tanks. And the Minivers of any country, the middle class, if you like, can swing that decisive battle either to victory or failure. Under the placid title of the movie is a bitter picture of what the American civilians may be asked to undergo and a pointed lesson in how to face it, if indeed any lesson is needed.

Mrs. Miniver marches straight out of your neighborhood. The story of "Mrs. Miniver" is the story of any middle class suburban family; a son away at college, two youngsters romping through a pleasant, not-too-large house, domestic plans and domestic budgets, the common joys of living. And when the war breaks over them the contrast is so sharp, so immediate and real that it seems almost as if it's in your own back yard the bombs are exploding.

How the Minivers meet the war is the spirit and heart of the picture. Living their lives in a cramped bomb shelter, aware always of death overhead, their eldest son enlisted in the RAF, the Minivers face the war like an army with banners flying. They would never use the word heroism in talking of themselves, yet they are, in their way, as heroic as the men with guns. Theirs is the heroism of those who can only "stand and wait." They also serve, but silently.

Still when the time for action comes, the Minivers have kept their faith and courage alive. At Dunkirk, it was Mr. Miniver in a small boat who helped evacuate the British army. And faced with a desperate, wounded German aviator, Mrs. Miniver acts with all the force of British tradition behind her; she turns him over to the police, of course. Unaided.

There's a touch of romance, too, in the picture, between Vin, the eldest son of the Minivers, and Carol Beldon, granddaughter of the very aristocratic Lady Beldon. And there's a delightful bit of the English masses and classes in the flower show which, war or no war, goes off on schedule.

Greer Garson and Walter Pidgeon play Mr. and Mrs. Miniver. Richard Ney and Theresa Wright are the romantic Vin and Carol. Reginald Owen and Dame May Whitty, Henry Travers and Henry Wilcoxon round out the cast. The picture is based on last year's best seller by Jan Struthers.

True enough wars are won by having the "mostest men there fustest"; on the production lines at home, it's tanks and airplanes and guns. But wars are won, too, by the people themselves; and it is the spirit of the Minivers that can keep a nation, no matter how the temporary balance of battles swings, forever undefeated. M-G-M. (Cont. on following page)

P. S.

No one had to be given direction on how to react during the Church sequence. It was filmed the day after Pearl Harbor, and as "Vicar" Henry Wilcoxon simply and stirringly informed his "congregation" that England was at war, the camera-man turned his lens first on one player—then another and another. Every face, from star to extra, mirrored the intense feelings of the soul behind it, and the result is the most gripping series of close-ups ever captured on celluloid!

Jan Struthers' book, actually a series of sketches, was fashioned into a movie story by Sidney Franklin and put into final screen play form by James Hilton, George Froeschel, Claudine West and Arthur Wimperis. Wimperis is the English author who was one of the few survivors of the torpedoed "City of Benares." His experiences in London and his harrowing trip to this country on the doomed ship qualified him to be technical director. He even plays a small bit—that of Sir Henry in the yacht club scene.

The production of "Mrs. Miniver" has some swell comedy touches, but they're all in the picture. No one bothered to think up gags to play between scenes. Walter Pidgeon didn't receive a single hot foot; Greer Garson's set chair wasn't sawed apart so it'd collapse the first time she sat in it.

Greer was working under a terrific emotional strain enacting experiences her own relatives and closest friends were actually undergoing. The air raid shelter scene took days to shoot, and by the time it was done well enough to satisfy Director William Wyler, both Greer and Pidgeon had kinks in their nerves as well as in their bodies.

Walter, particularly, suffered from being confined in the small, cramped space. Gave him the screaming meemies. His brow still gets dewy every time he recalls those mine-shaft scenes in "How Green Was My Valley." The day he got his first look at the air raid shelter with its regulation 6-foot radius, he suddenly realized how roomy that mine had been! The construction department added an extra foot all 'round to accommodate his bulky frame.

Dame Mae Whitty is forever being asked to explain her title. The late King George V bestowed a silver star and gold cross upon her in January, 1918, in recognition of the wonderful work she did for the Star and Garter Home, a rehabilitation center for disabled soldiers and sailors. As head of the Women's Emergency Corps, Dame Mae rounded up the English equivalent of $1,000,000—a man-sized job, His Majesty told her. At that time, there was no title that could be given to a woman, so the King created a new one—Dame Commander. Only three other women in the world have been so honored. All of them actresses who worked with her on the project.

10-year-old Claire Sanders, who plays one of Greer's children, is a British youngster whose father is on duty "somewhere in Libya." She hasn't seen him for four years, but hopes he'll see her in the picture "when it plays Africa."

Greer is always surprising her friends with some unsuspected accomplishment. Between scenes, Director Wyler would once in a while, whip out a harmonica and duet with his pal, Lou Borzage, who's a whiz on the accordion. One day they were joined by Miss G. at the piano, and the three of them ground out a very tired but fairly recognizable version of Tschaikowsky's "Concerto in B Flat Minor." Greer said she hadn't conferred with a piano teacher since she was twelve; nevertheless, she really coaxed beautiful sounds out of the keyboard, encoring with some of the more difficult passages of Rachmaninoff and Debussy.

Immediately after the picture was finished, she made a whirlwind tour of Canada, her bright red locks acting like a magnet on Old Dominion wallets. The occasion was the Victory Drive to sell bonds, and once more she surprised her pals. When it came time for speech-making, Missy Garson stepped up to the microphone and not only coaxed 'em to part with their cash, in English, but ripped off line after line of perfectly accented and enunciated Francaise!

Now that she's finished being "Mrs. Chips" and "Mrs. Miniver," Greer wants to play a part that makes her a little more exciting. When she wasn't studying her script for "Mrs. Min," she was hunting through books and plays for a role she'd like to do. On the last day of production, her wish was granted. She was told she had just been assigned the lead opposite Ronald Colman in "Random Harvest."

The entire story of Mrs. Miniver is a study in reaction, not action. There isn't a single battle scene in it. Wyler worked as many laughs as possible into the film, and all votes for the funniest scene went to the one in which Walter Pidgeon, exasperated by wifie Greer, rolls up a newspaper and whaps her one when and where she least expects it. Five or six takes were necessary to get just the effect Wyler wanted, and when it was finally completed, Miss Garson was unable to sit down for the rest of the day!

SWEATER GIRL

"Sweater Girl" isn't quite about what you think it's about; but, as one of the characters in this campus drama remarks, "Boy—what a student body!" "Sweater Girl" is primarily a murder mystery in a collegiate setting with a few side dishes of musical numbers and, of course—sweaters.

The student body at Whitmore College, like that at most Hollywood universities, never worries about exams. The only reading they ever do is in the telephone directory looking up the number of the nearest sorority; thesis and data, in their quaint vocabulary, are campus variations for this and that. But, naturally, they do work like mad preparing a musical show. Classes are the intervals between rehearsals.

Whitmore College, while strictly following the Hollywood party line on universities, has one little quirk all its own. It's students get murdered with a grisly and efficient regularity. The first to go is a campus imitation of Walter Winchell who gets his licking a poisoned envelope in answer to an admiring fan. The second is neatly strangled while strumming his guitar. A couple of other attempts are nipped in the bud. All in all, quite a place, this Whitmore College.

Suspects of this rampant skullduggery run the gamut from a beautiful sweater girl (perish the thought; of course, she isn't guilty) to a campus idiot (not one of the students). A couple of professors who have the disquieting habit of taking unescorted walks while these murders are being done, manage to get implicated also in this merry muddle. Not even the trustees are above suspicion.

Through the search and the chase, the musical continues to take shape. Life goes on at Whitmore College. Co-eds throw their cunning nooses at prospective husbands; a pair is found to be illegally married (according to college regulations, that is). A detective leafs morosely through the campus diaries. Nobody goes to classes.

But for all that, "Sweater Girl" is a cunning blend of jitters, both of the spine tingling and bug varieties. And while the mystery doesn't quite play fair, it's clever enough and has its moments. Romance is rampant all over the place, and young love, in any case, always has a certain amount of charm. The curtain never really does come up on the musical, but you peek in at enough rehearsals to get the idea. "Sweater Girl" aims at throwing in a little of everything so you're almost bound to find something you like. At odd moments there are always the sweaters to catch your eye.

Such attractive sweaters as June Preisser and Betty Jane Rhodes are involved. On the male side, Eddie Bracken, Philip Terry, Bill Henry and Nils Asther handle their collegiate assignments with fine bounce. One little thing may disturb you. The students talk a language quite their own at points and there's no glossary provided. Your reviewer managed to catch the sense of most of them, but will some collegian write in with definitions of potlatch and schmeerkaas?

Potlatch? Schmeerkaas?

Murder!—Par.

P. S.

Before the switch to "Sweater Girl," this one was gaily titled "Sing a Song of Homicide" . . . Eddie Bracken is wearying of being compared to every actor in the business. After his first role, he was hailed as a young Spencer Tracy. Next critics pegged him as a ditto Harold Lloyd, Harry Langdon, W. C. Fields. After the preview of this particular pic, pals swarmed around to tell him he reminded them of Eddie Cantor! . . . Five-foot-four, 118-pound Betty Jane Rhodes is a "blizzard head." Lights cause a halo about her blonde locks, and the juicers have to be careful with the kliegs . . . Betty's a pioneer of television, starting three years ago on W6XAO, only television station in the West . . . June Preisser wears a sweater only once, but one of the musical numbers has sixteen (16) co-eds strutting back and forth in wispy wool waists while Bracken sings "While the Sweater Girls Parade Around the Campus." An equal number of college boys (courtesy of Central Casting) also march around dur-

By MARJORIE DEEN

PRESENT them collectively on the screen, and you have the amusing, homey, universally loved Hardy Family. Speak to them individually on the set, and you find each one of them as typically American in thought and deed as the characters they so delightfully portray. Which is the same as saying that right now they are intent on doing everything in their power to further our national war efforts. Fay Holden, for example, was starting a campaign to get everyone she knows to go in for Victory Gardens and home canning. Her very first convert was Cecilia Parker who vowed she would learn, as Fay advocated, how you go about it the right way.

Certainly where it comes to home canning, far too many of us are still in the dark and should, therefore, like Cecilia seek further information on the subject. Not next month, mind you, but NOW!

VALUES . . . AND VITAMINS: Victory Garden enthusiasts will rightly point out to you that home-grown fruits and vegetables are most ideal for canning purposes since they are strictly fresh and may be canned within a short time after being gathered. This assures less waste, higher vitamin content and the garden-fresh flavor everybody loves. However, home canning is by no means limited to home-grown foods, for those bought at the market are quite as desirable when carefully chosen. Even with purchased fruits and vegetables, if the homemaker watches for the peak season for a product—when it is most plentiful, therefore least expensive—the savings effected by canning at home are tremendous!

THE SUGAR SITUATION: Latest Government reports indicate that there will be extra amounts of sugar allowed us for home canning purposes, based upon the number of people in the family. However, should there be a drastic sugar shortage, affecting even the recommended home canning of fruits, then you can turn to two substitutes (provided, of course, that these are available in sufficient quantity to meet the suddenly stepped-up demands for them). White corn syrup may be used in proportions of 1½ cups corn syrup to each cup of sugar called for in the recipe, or honey, measured like sugar, cup for cup. Many home canners prefer using half sugar, half substitute, worked out in the proper proportions, of course.

It should be pointed out that neither sugar nor a sugar substitute is essential to the canning of ordinary fruits, since they can be successfully canned in pure water alone. They're not as palatable that way, it's true. But then, at the time the unsweetened fruit is to be served, you may add some sugar from your regular weekly ration.

Also, if sufficient sugar is not available during the season when fruits for jelly-making are at their prime, then simply put up and store away the unsweetened fruit juices, carefully. Sealed in air tight jars these juices will keep perfectly. When the time comes that you actually have some extra sugar on hand you can make up small amounts of jelly at a time. It will be a better product turned out in smaller batches, anyway!

SUPPLIES . . . AND DEMAND: "And what about glass jars, caps and lids?" you may well ask. It seems that even last year there was an unprecedented demand for such things. As a result, dealers everywhere began ordering their 1942 canning supplies far in advance of previous years and manufacturing plants started operating on a twenty-four-hour-a-day basis to fill these orders. Therefore it is fairly certain that you will still find supplies on your dealer's shelves. But don't delay in stocking up. No, this won't be regarded as "hoarding"—provided, of course, that you do not make purchases in excess of your actual canning needs. The important thing is to cooperate with our government in their urgent plea not to allow any food to go to waste this summer. So be prepared, well in advance, to go to work on each type of fruit and vegetable as it comes in season.

From present indications the availability of rubber rings and zinc caps for home canning is in considerable doubt. However there is one type of glass jar and closure on the market that uses neither, since an airtight seal is accomplished by means of a special sealing composition which is flowed in under the lid. During processing the lid is held in place by a special screw band—which can be used over and over, year after year, if given proper care. Another fine feature is that one of these two-piece mason jar caps will fit any mason jar, regardless of make. So, by purchasing these two-piece tops alone, you can "modernize" and continue to use the glass jars you already have.

RULES AND REGULATIONS: Guesswork is out where home canning is concerned since mistakes are costly and waste is unpatriotic. Don't follow part of the instructions of one jar manufacturer, use a recipe provided by your next-door neighbor (with a couple of important steps left out, chances are!) and further increase the chances of failure by cheerily disregarding the need for following an accurate timetable. Instead use recipes, directions and time requirements given by the manufacturer of the jars and closures you intend using—to assure the desired, perfect, results!

SPECIAL OFFER

We are pleased to be able to offer you—ABSOLUTELY WITHOUT COST—a splendid 23-page illustrated booklet called THE MODERN HOMEMAKER. This will give you the information you need for easy, successful canning and processing. It contains pointers for your Victory Garden, a Canning Budget, a "fight talk" on "The Big Four in your canning program, peas, beans, corn and tomatoes," plus recipes that enable you to assure garden fresh goodness for the fruits and vegetables you put up this year at home. Fill in and mail this coupon, and we'll send your copy, post haste, in time to help you to cooperate in Canning Foods for Victory.

YOUR GOVERNMENT SAYS

EAT NUTRITIONAL FOOD

This is the first of a series of important messages to American home makers. By following the simple rules of good nutrition, your joy in eating should increase and the health of your family should improve.

In answer to the question, "What's the difference between eating properly and just eating?" a dietitian friend of mine answered, "It's simply the mighty big difference between feeling full of bounce and energy and feeling full of food."

Each month I shall tell you more about the importance to you and your families of the food groups mentioned in the list below.

Helen S. Mitchell

Principal Nutritionist,
Office of Defense Health and Welfare Services

Every day, eat this way

MILK and MILK PRODUCTS

. . . at least a pint for everyone—more for children—or cheese or evaporated or dried milk.

ORANGES, TOMATOES, GRAPEFRUIT

. . . or raw cabbage or salad greens—at least one of these.

GREEN or YELLOW VEGETABLES

. . . one big helping or more—some raw, some cooked.

OTHER VEGETABLES, FRUIT

. . . potatoes, other vegetables or fruits in season.

BREAD and CEREAL

. . . whole grain products or enriched white bread and flour.

MEAT, POULTRY or FISH

. . . dried beans, peas or nuts occasionally.

EGGS

. . . at least 3 or 4 a week, cooked any way you choose—or in "made" dishes.

BUTTER and OTHER SPREADS

. . . vitamin-rich fats, peanut butter, and similar spreads.

Then eat other foods you also like

Make your summer vacation pay dividends—financially, romantically! You name it, we've got it!

BY JEAN KINKEAD

LAST year all you had to show for your gorgeous three months' vacation was a sunburn and a tired tennis racket. This year why not really accomplish something? Earn the money for your fall clothes, say, or for part of college; see a bit of the surrounding country; do something definite for "our boys"; chalk up a new conquest or two. Anything can happen in twelve weeks, chums—so name your objective, and bing, you've got it!

Filthy lucre: There are a dozen ways to get rich quick—well, relatively—right in your very own town. F'rinstance, why not get five or six gals together and call yourselves Service, Inc. Your services will include practically everything from boarding gold fish and plants for people who are going away, to darning socks and sewing on buttons for stuck-at-home summer bachelors. You'll walk dogs and wash them; you'll mind children; you'll mow lawns and weed gardens. In fact, for an honest nickel there's just about nothing you won't do. Write yourselves a clever ad, including your rates and phone number, take it to the local newspaper office, and they'll run off a couple of hundred copies for you for almost nothing. Then you whip from likely doorstep to likely doorstep distributing them. After that let nature take its course, and we guarantee more jobs than you can handle.

Another suggestion—Try to sell the editor of your town newspaper on a column devoted to news of local draftees. Contract to do one every week or every two weeks at $10 per. Then proceed to ferret out items like mad. Pump parents, employ spies, build up your correspondence with home-town chaps in the service. Bet you'll up the paper's circulation, and who knows you might be kept on the payroll permanently under classification "indispensable"!

What with everyone vegetables-for-victory-minded, here's a thought. Plant a garden and supply your neighbors with fresh vegetables all summer long. Put in some good-sized tomato plants, radishes, string beans, carrots and beets, weed and water 'em faithfully—and you'll be a vitamin-vendor like crazy by the middle of July.

If it isn't just odd jobs and pin-money you're after, but a career and a fat check every two weeks, try for a defense job. Write or go in person to the defense factory nearest you. State your qualifications, such as typing, filing, etc. If you can't do a thing, tell them frankly, but say you're very anxious to learn. They're taking inexperienced people by the dozen and paying them a minimum wage of fifty cents an hour. Your state employment bureau will put you in touch with other jobs, and it won't charge the usual fee of a week's salary. In writing to the bureau, state your age, education, qualifications, past experience (even if it's as meager as typing manuscripts or private secretarying for your father). If you live in a city, your best bet is to apply directly to the personnel department of the company or store where you'd like to work.

Remember that first impression is terrifically important. No red nail polish, burlesque queen make-up or femme fatale outfit. Wear a trim suit or a simple dress—immaculately clean and pressed. Sober up your hair, look out for ornery stocking seams—and wear a hat! Tell the person interviewing you exactly what you can do or what you'd like to learn, but don't jabber. Don't smoke, don't jitter your hands or feet and don't eye the papers on the interviewer's desk. Vital point: When the session appears finished, don't linger. Smile, thank the person for giving you so much of his time and bow out. (Continued on page 76)

"This Above All"

By ERIC KNIGHT

Produced by DARRYL F. ZANUCK

Directed by ANATOLE LITVAK

Charles Boyer's interest in Rita Hayworth is the opening gun that fires T.C.F.'s "Tales of Manhattan" into the starlit sky, and we mean starlit! Because when names like Boyer, Hayworth, Fonda, Laughton, Romero, Ginger Rogers, Edward G. Robinson, George Sanders, Paul Robeson, Ethel Waters, "Rochester," Roland Young and a raft of others all line up in one picture—ladeez and gentlemen, that is star lighting! Almost blinding! Took ten of Hollywood's best writers to do the story up brown, four costume creators and who knows how many nerve specialists to turn out this O. Henry-type opus in smooth fashion, swift pace and with complete harmony among the assembled celebrities. Promises to be the talk of the year!

Henry Fonda would rather you called him Hank! He's that kind of a guy . . . would trade a gala Hollywood premiere any night in the week for a brisk game of poker and beer in the backroom. No fuss or furbelow about Hank! When wife Frances Brokaw had a son in '40, he flew around the studio shouting, "Boy, I got a fullback!" pleased as Punch! Hates make-up like poison and has to be practically strait-jacketed before they can do him up for the lenses. Six feet two inches, 170 pounds of solid brawn, he takes an icy shower every a.m. of his life. Fusses and fumes from 5 to 10 pounds off during every picture, even tho' they're all gold-starrers (but none so golden as his new T.C.F.'s "The Magnificent Dope").

Ginger Rogers is making her debut as the all-'roundest girl around. She used to be known as her own toughest slave driver, but with her newly acquired Oregon ranch and long trail of loyal hearts—Jean Gabin the most persistent—it looks like she's fast learning how to make merry as well. In season she'll ride with the hounds, having spent over two hundred smackeroos on hunting and hiking boots when she came spreeing to New York recently. That was just before starting on her T.C.F. "Tales of Manhattan" role. Ginger's one lass who's not interested in cutting out calories—unstintingly "giving her all" to Hollywood, it's taken her six years to climb back to the 115 pounds she netted when she made her first picture!

Ernest A. Bachrach

James Craig puts a big NIX on all glamour-boy labels, preferring the easier "out" of being just James Craig. Comfortable only when he's acting natural, Jim shies away from night clubbery, concentrates on home, pipe, fireside. He's happily married, in fact has a Junior James, age three. But get him to talk about the little missus? Not a chance! She's strictly his own. So's the star role in RKO's "Valley of the Sun." In 1912 Jim was born James H. Meador, but ditched the family name because it sounded like a bad Spanish word. He's never broken the ties with his old Tennessee home—practically melts at the mere thought of southern fried chicken and hot biscuits! Dubbed his Boston Bull pup, Killer"!

Irene Dunne has an "edge" on the rest of the girls because she refuses to go gaga over glamour! Just a simple gal with a gorgeousness rated at $500,000 per film. Her southern accent that you never noticed dissolved after she left home burg, Louisville, Ky., when she was six. She and her mom gallumphed around the Middle West a bit until one day Irene found herself first prize winner in a doughnut-making contest at an Indiana county fair. That settled it! Off she trouped, and it's been a muggin' life for her ever since—opera, tragedy comedy, come what may, the Dunne dame does it. Her Universal latest, "Lady In A Jam," shows you what we mean. Irene made it in between Ambulance Corps duties.

Pat Dane was sporting long curls when she took her first nibble at dramatics! Born Patricia Byrnes, in Jacksonville, Fla., she heroined in weekly plays in her folks' garage, amassed enough two-bit admissions to buy a shiny red and chrome bike . . . went on to deck out her dollhouse with a piano! After briefly co-eding at the U. of Ala., she made a dent in Gotham designing and modeling circles. Airlined to the West Coast for a holiday and landed plumb in the heart of Hollywood. Solos in a fabulous Sunset Blvd. apartment, religiously snoozes 8 hours per p.m., never rests from dawn to dusk—what with emoting in M-G-M's "Grand Central Murder," designing her own togs and poetry-penning to keep her busy!

Deanna and Vaughn Paul "never interfere with each other's careers. We'd never have a happy marriage if we did that!" Last April 18th they chalked aff happy anniversary number ane.

By IDA ZEITLIN

Smart girl!

Marriage may be a private affair to some people—but Deanna Durbin's is public property from here on!

There was general rejoicing when Deanna and her studio kissed and made up. Deanna was happy without reservation. Universal's happiness was shot through by a nostalgic pang. In effect they were saying: "The child is gone, long live the woman." While putting plenty of fervor into the second phrase, they couldn't keep a dash of rue out of the first.

Deanna's twenty. She's been married for over a year. Her being grown up should be taken for granted, but the heart doesn't always accept what the head knows. Since they captivated us six years ago, we've all felt a peculiar tenderness for Deanna and her dewy youth. We'd all like to hang on to the peachbloom of spring as long as possible.

The studio felt the same way, and not only because the peachbloom had made money for them. Penny, they continued to call her, after the girl in her first picture—or Shnoops or Candy or Charley or Punky or anything appropriate to a kid you love. Answering amiably to all these names, she still insisted on growing up.

That's where the rub came. Not over money, as both Deanna and the studio will testify. "You know how it is with parents?" she explains. "How they feel they still have a child when they haven't, till the child revolts and then something's done about it? They'd had me at the studio since I was a little girl, and I still seemed a little girl to them. You don't consult children. You decide what's good for them and do it. With grown-ups, you ask (Continued on following page)

Knitting for the Red Cross, Deanna's last sweater took her three months to complete because she was working under a hectic schedule at the time.

Universal's wedding gift to the Pauls was this fine organ which holds the center of attention in the playroom.

what they think, and if they think it's okay, then you do it. There's a little difference there. We didn't see eye to eye about that difference, and now we do. It's not that I intend to go poking my nose where it doesn't belong. They wouldn't put up with that, and I wouldn't try it. I just wanted to be consulted, talked to. What I really wanted, I guess, was for them to realize that I'd grown up."

As a child, Deanna was shy, and the studio protected her shyness, giving rise to a Durbin legend in Hollywood. You came to think of her as remote, withdrawn, hedged in like the sleeping beauty, a flower too delicate for contact with this rude world. And since Hollywood nurtures more cynics than poets in her breast, this in turn created another legend—that Deanna was prickly, difficult, hostile to strangers, resentful of public interest,- a kind of baby Garbo.

Five minutes with her explodes the myth. She's a poised, lovely young woman who talks with ease, humor and refreshing good sense. You get no feeling of orchids from her. If there's anything rare and remarkable about her, she doesn't know it. She's friendly, frank and matter-of-fact. Yes, she used to be self-conscious, both about her acting and with people. When, for instance, she'd have to come twirling into a scene deliriously gay, or sit down before a mirror and stick her tongue out at herself, she'd be petrified with embarrassment. All she could think was how silly she looked. Now she's learned to let herself go. She knows that the more freely she throws herself into a scene, the less silly she's likely to look. It's just part of acting. As for people, you meet so many in the movies that you're bound to lose your shyness in the end. That's part of the process of growing up.

After her tour of Army camps, Deanna's letter-answering problem become acute. She said the soldiers treated her like a grownup.

Now that Deanna and Universal are all smiles, she's doing "The Divine Young Lady," Jean Renoir directing. It's about a newsgal.

The state of being grown up suits Deanna fine. She for one casts no lingering glances backward. Nor wondering glances ahead. Like millions of others in a world at war, she clings to the moment. Vaughn has just been called to the Navy for active duty. Living with him in the house they built together is ended for now.

They bought the lot a year before they were married, after a six months' hunt. Sunday after Sunday they'd drive around, beautifully unanimous about what they wanted—something fairly large on a hill with a view. Vaughn spied it first—an acre of perfection in Brentwood Heights—high but fairly level—between a canyon and the blue Pacific. They phoned and found it cost more than they'd planned to spend. Maybe they'd better not—but it was so heavenly—but shouldn't they stick to their budget?—well, anyhow, let's think it over—but somebody else might grab it under our noses—oh, people don't grab up lots that quick—

Several Sundays later she was on the Screen Guild program. Vaughn called her at the studio just before her broadcast. "Sing well," he said, "because I've got something wonderful to tell you." She sang well, but thought her own thoughts about people who left you dangling in mid air. At home he was waiting, waved her into the car, lectured her on the virtues of patience, drove her out to the lot and said: "It's ours."

Deonno can moke teo ond bail o poir of eggs, but hubby Voughn's 6 feet, 185 paunds need on expert coak ta keep him up to por.

On an acre-ond-a-quarter, Deanno and Vaughn built their home that overlaoks the city an one side, the acean an another.

They were married in April and, one lovely morning in May, stood hand in hand, thrilling to the sight of a monster machine as it started breaking ground for their home. By means of two dodges, they escaped the customary housebuilding headaches. First, they found a sympathetic architect, and second, they agreed on everything.

Both wanted a one-story English farmhouse, shakes and red brick outside, chintz and old beams and mellow comfort within—the kind of place that would look lived in from the start, so they needn't worry about watching where the ashes fell. (Their guests' ashes. Deanna doesn't smoke, chiefly because of her voice. Vaughn doesn't smoke, chiefly because he doesn't like to.) The driveway would be gravel instead of cement, bordered with flowers, to give it the look of a country road. Moss between the flagstones, grass round the pool, a few shade trees—planted before the house went up—because they wouldn't be able to get trees that size through the drive. And the pet idea they cooked up together—a refrigerator built cosily into Vaughn's dressing room, so they wouldn't have to trek clear out to the kitchen for a midnight snack.

They moved in just before Christmas. The place was a mess. Newspaper in the bathtubs, excelsior in the rugs, dust in the new dishes, confusion everywhere. But Deanna wouldn't have delegated that job for love or money. Dudi and Julius, their couple, weren't due for another few days, so she and Vaughn, with the help of a lady-by-the-day, spent four filthy, happy days scrubbing and sweeping, reducing chaos to order, taking time out to gloat over their treasures. The highboy, for instance. Deanna didn't think she wanted a highboy —most of them were so stiff—till her eye and heart were caught by this one with its adorable scalloped edge and tiny painted nosegay inside each scallop.

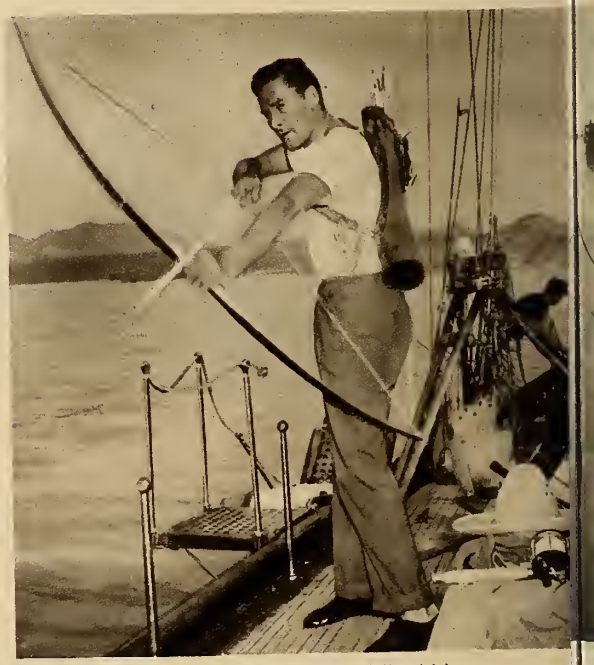
Then there was the dining room set, which they'd almost despaired of. Tables were all round or rectangular, and Deanna wanted an oval, because the dining room was sort of shaped that way. Busy by day, they did most of their shopping between eight and midnight. The watchman would let them in, and they'd wander round the silent store with the decorator, picking this and that. One night they spied the perfect dining room set, oval table and all, the last of its kind in the shop, sold to somebody else at six that evening. If you've ever furnished a home, you know how Deanna felt. Luck was with them, though. The line had been discontinued, but the manufacturer had one set left. That's the one they got. Deanna likes formal dining rooms, so that's the only room in the house which looks at all stiff. Even there, however, they didn't go too far.

They had breakfast in the distinctly informal playroom—its huge window overlooking garden and ocean —its drapes of red and beige matched by the cushions of the long window seat—its hooked rug woven in the same colors. They sit on two green chairs at a small table in front of the Dutch-tiled fireplace, under beams so old they have cracks in them and a rusty old nail sticking out every once in a while. They eat from breakfast dishes Deanna's mother picked up and gave them for Christmas, because they're (Continued on page 73)

STRICTLY DYNAMITE

He blows the lid off all formalities—this Flynn fellow.

Flynn recorded his entire hunting trip in three one-reel pictures.



Errol used a bomboo Jovelino bow to kill wild boor and big game fish alike. Powerful, pulls 100 lbs.

Hunting was good on Catolina Island when Errol nabbed this wild boar three years back. His pop, visiting from Ireland, agreed.

By JOHN FRANCHEY

Errol Flynn, Prince Charming on a celluloid sound track, is a man with his sights trained on the pursuit of pleasure. His marksmanship (which is no military secret) is deadly.

Flynn, himself, puts it like this:

"Yesterday was beautiful, today is lovely. . . ."

You will notice there is no mention of tomorrow.

Flynn is not to be confused with the genus playboy who lives for the moment, doesn't know what time it is, and has nothing to show for his pains but circles under his eyes and a basketful of unsavory press clippings. The Flynn pursuit of pleasure is down-to-earth, harmless and adult. Above all, it observes a healthy respect for the law of cause and effect which respect, nevertheless, has not prevented him from going a-cropper on occasions.

His passion is the unexpected, doling it out or receiving. He has planted ski poles in the beds of his house guests after they've gone to bed and has waited for hours for them to roll over onto the poles, jump up with a start, and cut loose with all the profanity at their command. On the other hand, he has been roused from his own slumber to discover that he was sleeping with a 15-pound mackerel and has laughed louder than the retaliating prankster.

The acme of the unexpected is, of course, adventure. The personification of adventure is Errol Flynn. These troublous times, what with submarines a-prowl in the seven seas, are, naturally, a bit confining to Hollywood's ablest mariner. Eighteen months ago he offered his sailing vessel, the illustrious "Sirocco," to the government. Since then he has been pursuing his pleasures on land and finding them numerous.

For a pleasure hunter he has his paradoxes.

Clothes, except when they're adorning a beautiful woman, do not interest him. He has only a modest wardrobe. Three months ago it was virtually threadbare.

"I have suddenly become clothes-conscious to the horror of all my friends," he says, pointing to his six new suits, a brace of them quite on the gay side—plaid items with huge checks. (Continued on page 80)

Mr. and Mrs. "Fun"

BY KAAREN PIECK

TO JUDY AND DAVE THERE'S MAGIC IN THAT

The Rosebushes. That's what Judy's niece calls them. Davy Rosebush and Judy Rosebush. She's four, and she thinks it's the funniest joke in the world. The Rosebushes think it's a pretty good nifty themselves, for four.

To Judy, her husband is still Mr. Fun. His first gift to her—a gold locket for Easter two years ago—was inscribed "From Mr. Fun." Long before they were married, when Dave was just one of her friends, Judy decided that life was finished. Sixteen takes its crushes hard, and hers had eloped with another girl. -She might as well die. Only she had a Bob Hope show to do first.

Dave was at the studio. He couldn't stand the look in those woebegone brown eyes. Casting about for balm to heal a wounded heart, he dashed out and returned with a hunk of apple pie. When she got through laughing, Judy began to wonder. Here she'd been planning never to laugh again, and listen to her! . Maybe she'd better live for a while yet. It was then that she dubbed Mr. Rose Mr. Fun. "Because," she explained to her mother later, "that's what it is to be with him. Fun."

She considers him an astonishing mortal. The way he breads chicken. The way he can talk and write little notes at the same time. By the end of the evening, he has thirty-five pages scored, and it's all finished. The hat he bought her mother for Christmas. Imagine (Continued on page 82)

MARRIED LIFE OF THEIRS—FROM CHOCOLATE FLOATS TO B-FLATS!

"YANKEE DOODLE DANDY"

JERRY COHAN: "What—is it, Doc?"
DOCTOR (drily): "Well—all signs point to its being a boy."

DIETZ: "It didn't appeal to me either."
GEORGE: "Didn't like it! It's evident you gentlemen have no ear for music!"

GEORGE: "Listen, darling—How would you like to make it a life-time job? Leading lady—no options."
MARY (starry-eyed): "I think I might like it, Mr. Cohan."

SCHWAB (angrily): "Why is Dietz's wife's money any better than my wife's money? . . . Must you give it to Dietz and Goff?"

By Jean Francis Webb

With a roar of eager applause, the soldiers vaices join Templeton's in a surging choral effect. Clearly George's song is on instantoneous hit. Templetan's ond soldiers singing, "Over there, Over there."

GEORGE (Quietly, tasting the words): ". . . over there . . ."

MARY (looking at George steadily): "Haven't had time. The minute I saw you without your beard, I knew here was a little boy who would need a lot of looking after . . ."

Story

A man's supposed to have the gift of gab, if he's Irish. Feet to tap out a fast dance rhythm aren't out of character, either. Nor a song in his throat. Jerry Cohan's (Walter Huston) boy had all of these.

But he had more besides. Perhaps being born on the Fourth of July, with bands blaring and his father rushing home from the theater to bring a small flag as his first gift, could account for the love of America that blazed in George Michael Cohan's (James Cagney) heart from his earliest remembered day. Certainly that love was there!

He was a talented boy, was Georgie. He was only seven when he joined the vaudeville act his trouping parents had made famous.

It was a grand act. Sister Josie (Jeanne Cagney) was the youngest skirt dancer in the business. Jerry and Nellie (Rosemary De Camp) Cohan had been tops for years. Georgie fitted in with violin and dance novelties. Black face or white face, you couldn't beat the Four Cohans for entertainment on any circuit. (Continued on page 86)

Production

Close-mouthed Cagney was tickled to death with his role as Cohan, actually broke down and confessed that he considered "Yankee" about the finest thing he's ever done on the screen. . . . His sister, Jeanne, plays the part of Cohan's sister in the movie. This, their premiere performance together on the screen, is the first brother and sister combination to be so featured since the days of Mary and Jack Pickford. Jimmy adores her, says she's really gifted, wishes to heaven he had half her ability to remember steps and routines. She was the darling of the set and received half a dozen moonstones from wardrobe women, set workers and players, after casually mentioning she liked 'em. . . . Another member of the Cagney clan, brother William, was associate producer for J. L. Warner. Before production started, he gave sister Jeanne a good luck gift—a folding armchair with her name printed across the back in giant red letters, JEANNE CAGNEY. All principals rated a chair by studio routine, but none could hold a candle (Continued on page 87)

Sisters— AND HOW!

Squabble? Squawk? Of course they do! Else you'd never suspect that Joan and Olivia were really devoted sisters!

Small wonder there's all this feud talk about Joan and Olivia. They see eye to eye on practically nothing —except maybe that Brian Aherne is the only man for a girl to marry. They've been tiffing for years and years, beginning with trivialities like which toys were whose, and working up to such momentous issues as whether Jimmie Lunceford's "Blues in the Night" isn't better than Glenn Miller's "Moonlight Cocktail." You know—real knock-down-drag-out stuff! With it all, however, they're wonderful friends. each other's clothes, exchanging doodads to suit outfits.

This clothes business is something new. As kids in Tokyo, where their dad was teaching English in the University, they were sort of an Abbott and Costello for size, hence no wardrobe pilfering. Joan, who whipped from one children's disease to the next without even time out for a quick inoculation, was excruciatingly thin. Olivia was apple-cheeked and double-chinned. And they couldn't have had less in common. While Olivia was Tarzaning it from tree to tree in a middy blouse and an old baggy pair of bloomers, Joan was either languishing in bed or convalescing in the garden, dressed to kill. The winter Livvie was captain of the second speed ball team, Joan's activities were limited to following the Japanese gardener around while he did his chores. The summer Livvie learned how to swim, Joan was up to her ears in rheumatic fever.

It didn't make for much close companionship, but they do remember one elegant spree together after they'd moved to Saratoga, Cal., with their mother. They ran away from home—Olivia prompted by sheer devilment; Joan by a romantic desire to see the world.

LOVE THUMBED A RIDE

By ROSEMARY LAYNG

Spring came to Hollywood early this year. It hit the old town smack in the face with a load of orange blossoms when the engagement of Hedy Lamarr to George Montgomery was announced. This romance with its headlong air, its windswept suddenness, can be reduced to three sentences. Boy meets girl. Boy loves girl. Girl loves boy.

The story of how they met seems to have several different versions. Every time you pick up a fresh paper, you find a different story. As George tells it in short, jerky sentences punctuated by a rare grin, it went like this: "Well, it was one Sunday in January. Some time ago I met Fred MacMurray and his wife, Lili, through Watson Webb, a cutter here on the lot. Watson and I went over to the MacMurrays this particular Sunday and just as we were arriving, Hedy and some friends of hers—well, they were leaving. We were introduced all around and stood there in the door talking. That's how it was."

Did he like her instantly? "Gosh, what do you think?" drawls Montgomery of Montana.

What was the first thing he noticed about her? "Well . . . it's kind of funny. You get an idea of her from pictures. The sleepy, slow sort of thing. She isn't like that at all. She's . . . well, you know . . . full of spirit, ready for laughs. You notice first how alive she is."

After that first meeting, George telephoned several times. Frequently Hedy wasn't at home; but when she did answer, and George asked for a date, she let him know by tone that she'd like him to call again even though, as she explained, she was busy that night. George is one of those lads who likes to ask for a date about five hours in advance—absolute maximum.

The next thing that happened—and you may lay it to the Los Angeles Bureau of Public Works, but Hollywood insists that Fate was to blame—was due to the torn-up condition of the street in front of the studio.

Hedy, in trying to negotiate red lanterns, wooden semaphores indicating excavations ahead, and piles of blasted cement and soil, had driven into a spot from which she could go no farther. Just then George lunged around the corner, recognized her and came to the rescue—streamlined version of the knights of old. He got into the car and manoeuvered it away from the tractors and asphalt carts. Down the street a bit he parked.

As he tells it, he said, "If you aren't doing anything tonight, let's go somewhere." She said she'd love to, so they went to the Mocambo. And thereby hangs one of George's favorite stories about Hedy.

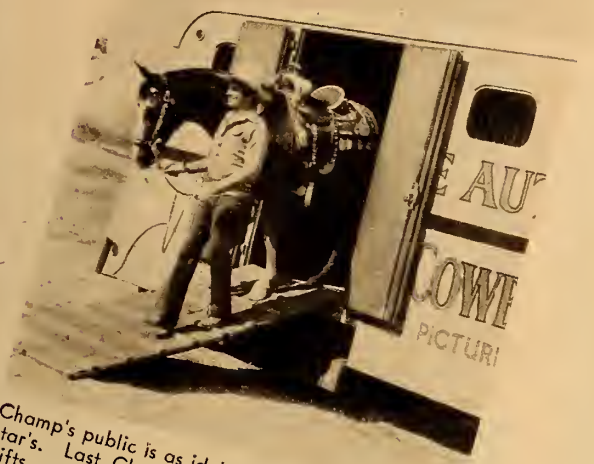
Despite TCF.'s investing a fabulous sum to build him up to leading roles, George's still a homebody. Prefers Mom's cookin' to smart spots. His next pic's "Ten Gentlemen From West Point."

meet the CHAMP

Of all Gene's hosses (16 in Cal. and 178 at his Gene Autry, Okla., ranch) Champ's by far the favorite. He's a Tenn. Walker, 15 hands high, sturdy, fast and fussy. Eats a bale of hay per week, prefers carrots and sugar for dessert, is ridden by Gene, trainer Agee and Mrs. A. (the only woman rider he's ever endured). Adores attention and whinnies till he gets it!

cross-country plane treks, 500 fan letters a month, $25,000 insurance policies— it's all stale oats to this sophisticated 12-year-old! Ask the 1050-pound wonder for his autograph, and he'll give you a hoofprint!

Gene bought Champ from his present trainer, Cherokee Indian John Agee, in '34. Experienced after 30 years with Ringling Bros. Circus and 14 years with Tom Mix, Johnny works out Champ an hour a day, took two months to teach him to jump through a hoop of fire. That 50-foot arena cost $20,000 (half price of entire house), opens off living room.



Champ's public is as idolatrous as any Hollywood star's. Last Christmas he was flooded with 300 gifts ranging from curry combs and miniature saddles to sugar and carrots (50 boxes each)!

His best friend in the world is Mrs. Autry's cocker spaniel, Dinky, who was too camera-shy to pose above with Gene, Von and Champ. Closest equine chum is a Palomina parade horse, Pal, his constant companion and fellow worker. Next pic's "Stardust on the Sage."

His nibs enjoys the height of luxury in a trailer with hot and cold running water, padded walls, specially sprung floor to take the bumps, bed for Gene, grain bin and a de luxe stall!

Choicest articles in his wardrobe are 50 Navajo blankets and a hand-tooled, silver-mounted $165 saddle! Three hours a day are spent in pasture, one in grooming. He has a repertoire of 25 tricks, is the only horse who can do a head stand and end-of-the-trail stunt!

Hollywood Heartbreak

Insiders call him the unhappiest man in Hollywood. He is a top-flight star, known and admired the world over. His career has been long and successful, and he can look forward to many, many more years of great fame and fortune. Yet his life is a tragedy. He is no longer in love with his wife, nor she with him. Both would like their freedom, but for various reasons divorce is impossible.

During the making of his last picture he fell desperately in love with his leading lady. He was gloriously happy when he learned she loved him, too. One night he talked to her of marriage, and she promised to wed him if he left his wife. The star was deeply moved. He left her immediately and went home, determined to discuss a divorce. Resolutely, he stepped through the door, but when he faced his family he realized the situation was hopeless. He would never be free.

Returning to his sweetheart, he told her their romance was ended. She was a wise girl. She left town the next day, refusing to accept other picture offers. But for him there has been no running away. Intimates disclose he is morbid and restless and beyond consolation. He would like to follow the girl, but friends are restraining him. They hope the actress will remain in the East, and that in time, the star will forget her.

Poll Cats

Swing fans! If you could invite an "All-American" dance band to make with the hot licks at your school dance, which music makers would you ask? A national magazine recently distributed 10,000,000 ballots throughout the nation, requesting band lovers to nominate the fourteen musicians they would most like to hear in a composite orchestra. Here are the results:

Gene Krupa, drums; Joe Venuti, violin; Benny Goodman, clarinet; Harry James, trumpet; Charlie Barnett, Jimmy Dorsey and Tex Benecke, saxophones; Alvino Rey, guitar; Tommy Dorsey, Glenn Miller, Jack Teagarden, Jack Jenny, trombones; Bobby Haggert, bass; and Eddie Duchin at the piano.

Terrific line-up, isn't it? But the magazine forgot a very important thing. What about a girl to sing with the band? Do we hear any suggestions?

Supporting Players

Big, strong, able-bodied film actors who have been temporarily exempt from military service, are in a ticklish spot these days. They're finding themselves fighting a war of their own against a vicious, trouble-making whispering campaign, designed to make them look like draft dodgers.

What the whisperers may or may not realize is that every star who is not in the service has been deferred for a legitimate reason. Men like Cesar Romero, Bob Sterling and Glenn Ford all have parents dependent upon them. And a dependent is a dependent, even in Hollywood. Deprived of support, a movie star's family can suffer just as miserably as anyone else's.

Take the case of George Montgomery. Eleven people share his income. Most are full dependents. George hasn't been in the "big" money class very long. And when you're supporting eleven relatives you don't get much chance to save. If George were called away, his parents, both in their middle seventies, would be left almost destitute. True, they're living in an attractive little home. But George is buying it on the installment plan, and there are still plenty of payments to go.

When George and the others are summoned, they'll be happy to join up. Right now it is the government's wish, not their own, that they remain on their jobs until such time as provision can be made for their dependents.

Gable in the Service

Clark Gable is another whom some have dared to criticize for remaining in civilian life. If Clark is aware of the cruel, ill-considered remarks that have been aimed at him, he has given no sign. In the past months, he has gone quietly about his work, attempting to restore some meaning to his life, and, we hope, in some small measure, succeeding.

What few people know is that Clark's war work has already been cut out for him—and by no one less than the President of the United States! It has just been revealed that Clark wrote to President Roosevelt immediately after Pearl Harbor. He offered his services to the Army and asked to be sent into active combat, preferably in the Philippines. The President, who was among the first to tender condolences when Carole Lombard died, again sent a personal message to Clark. This time he urged him to remain in Hollywood and continue making pictures. His presence on the screen, according to Roosevelt, will be great for public morale.

There's no doubt about it. Few stars are as well-equipped as Clark to hypo our spirits. So thank you, Mr. President, for your thoughtfulness!

Untarnished Lady

Strange as it seems, one of the pet pastimes in this town is the business of taking raps at Linda Darnell. At cocktail bars and knitting bees, the guys and gals tear Linda apart, laugh at her shyness, sneer at her sweetness. Anything for a good laugh, the winking nudgers explain.

"What that kid needs," the jaded sophisticates tell each other, "is a big romance, something to shake her emotionally, something to take the stars out of her eyes."

"Just wait," they always say. "One day she'll bust away from her family, and we'll really see some goings-on!"

Well, Linda has "busted away." She's left home and moved into her own apartment. But the wise guys will do some tall waiting before they see any goings-on! Or else some tall, purely fictitious story-telling!

"I know people are gossiping," Linda confides. "They can be pretty heartless in what they think and say. And they can be wrong, too. I'm living alone, yes. But with the full approval of my parents. We agree that the demands made by my work should not be imposed on the rest of the family. When I'm making a picture, I set my alarm for 5:30 A.M. It isn't fair to have the others blasted out of their sleep at that hour. In the evening I study and go to bed early. It's hard to do either if the house is noisy. I have a younger brother and sister. It would be wrong to ask them to mouse around just because I don't want to be disturbed.

"I'm aware of how people talk. I couldn't help hearing about the stories. I can't say it doesn't upset me. It does. But I'd be weak and foolish to alter my plans in order to quiet them."

Heartsapoppin'

You gals who go to bed with a photo of Stirling Hayden crushed to your bosoms, sit up and take note. We have news for you. You can dry your tears and save your sympathies. Your Stirling is not out on a cold unfriendly sea, nursing a broken heart dealt him by a hussy named Madeleine Carroll. Quite the contrary. According to reports reaching us, Stirling is doing all right! Our Washington agents advise us the Blonde Apollo is at present in the nation's capital—and Madeleine is with him!

This communique, arriving on the heels of one from New York informing us that the pair had visited there, had us puzzled at first. We were a bit skeptical, but now, after thinking it over, we're inclined to believe the rumor sweeping the East—the rumor that Stirling and Madeleine are married . . . and have been for many months!

The Forgotten Man

Don't be surprised if you hear that Bonita Granville's new beau, Jack Briggs, has upped and left her. Briggs knows Bonita is a marvelous girl. He loves being with her. But there's a limit to what a man can endure!

Briggs' complaint is Jackie Cooper. He has never spent an evening with Bonita without being reminded of her ex-steady. Bonita probably doesn't realize it, but the trouble all arises from her passion for walking. She is the greatest walker in Hollywood. When less energetic friends are ready to drop in their tracks, Bonita is just warming up. And no date is safe when she gets that "let's march" look in her eyes.

However, it isn't the foot work that bothers Jack Briggs. It's the incidents resulting from their jaunts that upset him. Like the one the other evening.

Bonita and Briggs dined at the Hollywood Brown Derby and then set out for a turn or two around the block. They'd gone only a few yards when they were stopped by a soldier who asked for Bonita's autograph. Bonita smiled, accepted the slip of paper the soldier handed her and, turning to Briggs, said: "Here, Jack. Will you hold my purse?" Briggs took the purse, but a second later almost dropped it when the soldier exclaimed: "Jack? Why you must be Jackie Cooper! Boy, this surely is my lucky day! Say, will you sign next, Mr. Cooper!"

Sophisticated sixteen-year-old Jane Withers weors two silver onklets—one inscribed with Buddy Pepper's first name, the other from boy friend Freddie Bartholomew. Despite the soda fountain, kitchen and dance floor in her own soundproof playroom at home, Jonie enjoys sporting about town for variety.

"I didn't mind the first time," Briggs later admitted to a friend. "But it happened a half dozen times before we finished our walk! I'm beginning to feel like Joan Fontaine, haunted by the ghost of Rebecca!"

Good News About Ruth Hussey

Ruth Hussey is in love. The lady makes no bones about it, no giggling apologies, no rapturous expositions. It's the first time. They'll be married if he's not called into military service immediately, and some day they'll have two kids, they hope. Any advice for the would-be Mr., we asked her? "Stay as sweet as you are," she smiled. Any advice for a would-be Mrs.? "Do stay in love. Don't fall out," the Hussey voice of experience admonishes. As for sisterly advice on how to get Butch to propose, Ruth, denying that her own method was a ruse, says, "I just sat still so he could talk"; P.S. It worked. She met him for the first time ages ago, when he was Link Fogarty, pride of Brown University's football eleven . . . and she was Ruth Hussey, editor of Pembroke College's Senior Year Book . . . all she remembers was that the orch was tooting "Please Give Me Something To Remember You By" . . . and he gave her a hunk of gum culled from the depths of his soup 'n' fish pockets . . . They met again years later on the West Coast, and you know the rest. She's told him all about her two worst sins . . . being late and being unable to remember names. The last seems incurable. But train-missing? "I'm really correcting it," she says coyly. "The studio has put me on a time budget and lately they say I'm so much better!" Rehearsal stuff is done under the dryer when she's having the make-up dept. do her hair in the a.m. . . . hair that was long before Hollywood chopped it, her buckets of tears unavailing. From out of the sacks full of mail that come each day, Ruth remembers the fan letter that amused her most . . . a note from a man in South Carolina who wrote that he was adopting her as his hobby . . . nice trick. Also recalls with more amusement now than she did then, the time when the fellas in charge of her publicity and press agentry took it upon themselves to announce her engagement to another guy just as she was getting ready to tell the world about Link . . . but she took it from whence it came and smiled . . . probably because her Pembroke degree declares her to be a Bachelor of Philosophy . . . which reminds us of her interesting philosophy of life . . . quoted just as she puts it . . . that her way is to "Sit at the foot of the table so you will be asked to sit at the head." Philosophy of life? Just call it the Ruth Hussey Success Technique.

TO HAVE

DAZZLING BLACK AND WHITE. The better to complement the brunette beauty of Inez Cooper, M-G-M starlet, next to be seen in "Once Upan a Thursday." Look for this elasticized velour Jantzen, with its flattering flared skirt, when you vacation-shop. Pack it in your week-end suitcase, smugly knowing you will not go unnoticed.

RED, WHITE AND BLUE. That unbeatable combinotion reads in left-to-right panels. For the very slim, like petite M-G-M starlet, Dorothy Morris, soon to be seen in "Tulip Time" with Van Heflin.

● You'll swim this summer as always, but with the present emphasis on physical fitness, you will be more aware of what swimming does to tone up your body. Those of you who really swim, you waterbabies, know from your own lithe figures, what the scissor kick does for your thighs, and the breaststroke for your bosom, and the backstroke for your tummy. Swimming pools, outdoor or indoor, are just as much fun as the beaches, even more of a challenge. How many lengths can you do without getting winded? Don't feel sorry for yourself if you are stuck inland or in the city. Search for the nearest pool and budget enough for two, even three new bathing suits. Not just to avoid the clammy, wet-suit feeling, or to rotate for longer wear, but to please yourself and friends.

A multicolored play shoe to wear with slacks or shorts or a dirndl. Step-in sandol, broad strap, $1.95.

For anything you want to cart beachwards, including knitting, take this rope-handled cotton bag; $1.00.

CASUAL AND CAREFREE. Answering your pleas for more printed cotton suits. Happily priced and nationally distributed like all Jontzens, it will team, as Inez Cooper shows, with good ol' Sol.

You'll be a Yankee Doodle dondy with this yellow and blue denim set. Beach bag, $1.25; hat, $.79.

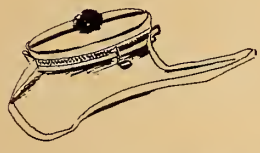
ND TO KEEP

by Elizabeth Willguss

AFTER THE SWIM. Rinse your cap in fresh water, dry, line with tissue paper. Remember swimming pool chemicals ore just as destructive as ocean spray for rubber-rotting!

AFTER THE GAME. Last year you may have thrown your Keds in the closet, but now you look them over, and if they're soiled, you wash them carefully in warm, sudsy water.

● Things being as they are, you won't need much prodding to take good care of every new piece of beachwear you buy, to say nothing of last year's stuff which, on going over, you've found to look almost like new. Here is crossing our fingers that you put away even your second-best bathing caps with loving care last fall, long before you were aware the counters in the five-and-dime would not, like other years, overflow with bright colored caps. If you should find some, they are last year's crop, so treat them with the respect that any 14-karat article deserves. Waterproofed beach bags are not to be tossed lightly aside when you come back from the beach, either. Wipe the lining with a cloth wrung out in fresh water, turn the bag inside out to dry. Whether your bathing suit is cotton or velour, rinse it immediately after wearing. Invest in some rubber cement to mend any tiny rip in rubber that is still fresh. Below are some rules from U. S. Rubber Co. Cut them out and paste them up!



A bag like a squashy beret, even to red pompon. With waterproof lining and shoulder strap. $1.95.

DON'T'S

1. Don't place rubber articles near heat.
2. Don't allow them to get near oil, grease, or gasoline.
3. Don't let them stand in sunlight.
4. Don't hang them over sharp objects or in any manner that will cause permanent strain.
5. Don't store carelessly in a wrinkled or creased condition.

DO'S

1. Dry all rubber goods slowly at room temperature.
2. Always clean rubber articles before putting away.
3. Provide a convenient, dry closet away from heat and light for storing your most commonly used rubber goods.
4. Inspect regularly all rubber articles not in use. The government needs useless items to supply the nation with reclaimed rubber.

SEERSUCKER SUBSTITUTE. Naturolly you don't begrudge the 35-to-96 pounds of rubber that goes into each airplane tire, but wasn't it smart of the designers to dreom up a novel substitute for the rubber bathing cap? Save your pennies for this new "air lite" turban. It is adjustable and waterproofed. Put on the loose cap, then tightly wind the long band with its spaghetti-fringe bow and your locks are safe and dry. Worth the $1.95.

It's Jane's war now. It had been just The War, till one day she got home from the studio, and there was this funny expression on Ronnie's face— Now it's Jane's war.

She'd read about it. She'd worked for the Red Cross and been wakened by anti-aircraft fire and entertained the boys at army camps. She'd seen Ronnie's sick face bent over a picture of the small swollen bodies of children starved to death in Poland. "This," said the war-hating Reagan between set lips, "would make it a pleasure to kill." That night he'd stood a little longer beside the crib of Button-nose the Second, who'd inherited both the nose and the name from her mother.

She'd known Ronnie would go, that he'd probably have enlisted after Pearl Harbor if he hadn't been a member of the Cavalry Reserve. Five years ago, as a sports announcer in Des Moines, he'd grown friendly with some of the boys at the Fort and joined their outfit, mostly for the fun of riding a horse. After war broke out, they both knew it was only a question of time. Exams came from Washington, Ronnie toted books to and from the studio and boned up between shots. His papers were returned by the War Office, marked excellent.

"Yes, I suppose he's going," Jane told herself and didn't believe it. He was there every day. She couldn't imagine him not there. Till one day at the beginning of April she came home (Continued on following page) from Twentieth Century-Fox where she was making "Footlight Serenade" on loan-out from Warners—

She came home mad. It had been one of those days when everything went wrong. She stormed upstairs to spill it to Ronnie, her safety valve. He generally laughed. For some reason, he thought her tantrums funny. Let him laugh. She'd get it off her chest anyway—

Ronnie was lying down. He'd had one of his rare days off from "Desperate Journey," his current picture. The letter had arrived after Jane left. He'd spent the hours waiting, fighting a sense of oppression, hoping something would happen to give him an idea how best to break the news—

She burst in and slammed her hat on the bed. "Has this been a day! So help me, Ronnie, nothing can happen to touch what's happened to me today—"

He didn't laugh. He looked at her, and there was this funny expression on his face. Before he said it, she knew what he was going to say. "Sorry, honey, because here's something else—"

He gave her the notice, calling Second Lieutenant Ronald Reagan of the United States Cavalry Reserve to active duty on April 20th at Fort Mason, California. A piece of white paper that changed their lives. You can expect and expect a thing to happen but, till it hits you, it's as if you'd never expected it at all. Now it's real, she thought. Now it's Ronnie's war and mine.

Neither ate much that night. They avoided direct reference to what lay ahead. There were business details to discuss—nothing of any consequence, since they own everything jointly—what's Ronnie's is Jane's, and the other way 'round, including their salaries. But Ronnie had always kept the books. Now Jane would have to. That was all right. She understood his bookkeeping system. She'd made the entries when he was busy, and she wasn't. Some night he could go over the whole thing with her. He'd always said she'd make a good business woman. Here was her chance to show him.

Ronnie's last picture before induction was Warners' "Desperate Journey" with Erral Flynn and Arthur Kennedy. Janie's making "Footlight Serenade" for TCF, plans to continue with her career.

Ronnie used to tease Janie by calling Maureen "Nutsie" and "Monkeypuss." Broke all nursery rules babying her and violated THE cardinal principle by picking her up whenever she wept!

They were both working and, as it happened, Ronnie worked nights through most of those two weeks. That was tough luck, but they wasted no time bewailing it. Both have stamina and balance. Neither is the kind to indulge in emotionalism. After the first day or two of avoidance, the subject of their coming separation slipped into the open, and they found it a relief. The weight rested less heavy inside. "Like ten million others," said Ronnie, "I'm sorry that such a thing has to come to the world. Also like ten million others, I wish that twenty years ago when they had a chance to finish it, they'd finished it. Now it's a job that has to be done—the job of ten million others and yours truly."

They kidded about it. "Turned out all right, your love affair with horses," said Jane. "Second looeys get prettier uniforms than buck privates."

"Listen, hon. When they find out Reagan's in the army, those damn Japs'll crawl right back into the hole they came out of! What do they call it? Tokyo?"

He laid out a schedule for her. The bills rolled in from the twentieth of one month to the tenth of the next. She figured that by giving it (Continued on page 84)

Laird - my boy -

I've said it to the Marquess, and there is no possible reason why I shouldn't repeat it to you - I may jest about the absurdities of life, but - Acting is a sacred subject to me and I say this in deadly earnestness:

You are one of the truly great young actors our stage has produced in the last ten years.

I have watched with vast enjoyment your work in "Oscar Wilde" and "The Man who came to Dinner" and saw with delight and humility - the quality - that makes great actors.

Believe me
most Sincerely -

BY DOROTHY SPENSLEY

A raid on Hollywood letter files shows that film kids are prodigious letter writers, scratching out notes at the drop of a yo-yo, saving them, too; that their elders are more lax in writing, preferring to wait until they meet each other (could it be caution?) to say their say.

Long known as wire-pullers, the filmsters are great wire-senders, too, briskly dispatching to each other telegrams of congratulation, tender sentiment and just plain old fun. Cagney is a card at the latter sort of thing. Ask Pat O'Brien, Frank McHugh, Lynne Overman and the other boys who dine together regularly at Chasen's on Friday nights. Fight night.

Love letters and letters of artistic appreciation vie for first place, with artistic appreciation winning in the photo-finish. The stars like a bit of flattery, as much as you do. They're human, too. So let's take a look at what their personal, very private files disclose. . . .

Hedy Lamarr to Ann Sothern: A hurriedly scribbled note, but sincere, from an A-1 Glamour Girl, Hedy Lamarr, who knows the anguish of such moments, to "Pluto," otherwise Ann Sothern ("she has such big eyes, like Pluto the pup," explains Hedy) at a needed time in Ann's life—the time of her separation from Roger Pryor:

Dear Pluto:

This alone business is no good for the first little while. So I plant myself on you for dinner tonight, then you go home with me for a few days. We will chitter together all night like in boarding school. Or we won't chitter. Only come.

My love to you,
HEDY

Louis Hayward to Ida Lupino Hayward: Comes now Love, the runner-up in the letter handicap, with a husbandly note from (Continued on following page)

June Havoc

Dearest Gypola:

Whaddya mean "It must be nice to sit in the California sun all day?" I want you to tussle your bussle into a chair and really take a double gander at these lines. Listen Gypsie: I get up at 5 a.m. ... I stagger to my car after falling through an orange ... I drive blindly thru the dawn with my radio blaring "Scrub Me Mamma With a Boogie Beat," but loud (otherwise I would slump gracefully on the floor and give up). When I get to the studio, I am grasped firmly by the pathetic top-knot left on my noggin and given a triple-threat shampoo, then placed before the mirror where I can disconsolately gaze at my weary, worn features, and "done". That means my hair is put up and then I am thrust under a dryer and forgotten for twenty minutes - twenty LOVELY minutes - at the end of which I am scraped from under the dryer and carried to the make-up room. They hopefully massage my face with Brillo - place lovingly two pounds of grease-paint on it - then they look at each other and shrug and I am on my own. Ah yes, the California sun is lovely - I wonder what shade it is these days?

I have lost ten pounds out here and now they are considering me for the title role in "Frankenstein's Debutante Daughter." I'll make it yet.

Love and all that silly sister stuff,

June

JANE WITHERS

Dear Freddie:

I've racked my brains (at least I hope they're brains!) for something that would fit into that book of yours, and it seems to me that the best advice I ever received was from Will Rogers, years ago.

Believe it or not, I had been asked to coach Mr. Rogers in a few impersonations -- imagine me doing that! But I did, and when we finished he said something to me that I shall always remember.

"Jane" he said, "never forget this . . . it's great to be great but it's greater to be human".

And I've never forgotten it.

Will this do?

Good-bye until Friday -

Jane Withers

Jane Withers and Freddie Bartholomew

Louis Hayward to Ida Lupino ("Loopy") Hayward. Outwardly it may sound completely Mr.-and-Mrs., but to Ida it marks the felling of an evil rumor, current last autumn, that the Haywards had "pffft."

Dearest Loopy Woman:

Why do I call you that?

What am I doing here when you're there?

I've seen a lot of people and read a lot of plays and hoped a lot of hopes, and the rest is uncertainty. Read the topper last night—God, how I'd love to do it!—a part like nothing I've ever done before. Which sounds like John Barrymore playing a ham, so let's leave it till I get home. Starting at the crack of dawn, four in the morning by the southern route, and no stopovers. Object: to see your silly beautiful face again as soon as possible. Don't worry. I'll eat, I'll keep my feet dry, I won't pass on a hill or slaughter so much as one dear little cottontail.

Don't wait up for me, and if you hear footsteps in the dead of night, make sure they're not mine before calling the cops. The password is you-know-what.

I hope you're taking things easy on the set. Sure. And I hope Hitler died yesterday.

Do you still love me, my lovely?

Your
LOUIS

William Holden to Glenn Ford

Dear Gwyllyn:

So you're going to Quebec. Personal appearances, huh? Well, you're the shy type, and the folks'll love you. Don't push it too far though. Scrub behind the ears and keep your fingers out of your mouth.

Mind if I talk to you like a mother, Gwyll? After all, you've spent most of your life among the hillbillies of Santa Monica while I've had the big-town advantages of Pasadena. So for handy reference, just stick this in that farmer's pocketbook you call a wallet. To city slickers you may be just another setup, but to me you're human.

Memo for New York: Brooklyn Bridge, Central Park and the Bronx Zoo are nailed down. Don't make a down payment on them. Even the monkeys are not for sale, and besides, why bring another monkey to Hollywood? Where it says keep off the grass, keep off. If a cop gets you, and you tell the judge you're a movie actor, he'll pop you into jail without asking for a second crime.

Don't wait for a streetcar on Broadway. Take a taxi, and don't talk back to the chauffeur. He knows more than you do about practically anything. The guy at the hotel door isn't a general, no matter how he's dressed, so don't try to get by with a salute. Tip him and tip him good; or next time he'll jam your finger in the taxi door.

Memo for Quebec: Leave your tommyhawk home. The Indians don't live there any more. Don't try to talk French. If they don't understand English, use signs. That way, you won't be lynched for lynching their language. Don't try to impress them in the restaurants by asking for frogs' legs. Frogs' legs to them are ham and eggs to you. If you have to be different, ask for a nutburger and see what you get.

General: You may get a few requests for autographs. Don't mention "The Adventures of Martin Eden" in the first breath. Mention "Texas" instead. I was in that, remember? You might even say, Bill Holden was in that, remember? This will give you a reputation for modesty. You can then sign my name in their books, and before you know it, they'll be swarming, pulling buttons off your coat and hairs off your head.

Oh, that's all right, Gwyllyn. I know you'd do the same for me.

Sincerely your friend,
BILL

Vic Mature to Vic Mature

Listen, jerk, this town's a fight ring. Today you're the champ, tomorrow you're a bum. Now they're glad-handing you, pretty soon they'll be tying a can to your tail. You asked for it, brother. Lap it up while it's good. If it goes sour tomorrow, you've still had a run for your money.

And don't kid yourself, bo. The world's full of better actors who never got a break. Believe your publicity. You're just a lucky hunk of ham.

Katharine Hepburn to Lucille Ball

A real prize, and one treasured by Lucille Ball . . . a note from Katharine Hepburn, angular script on chaste white card, thanking Lucy for the imported English cashmere scarves she sent following their work together in "Stage Door."

Lucille, now that's what I call terrifically angelic. How could you bear to part with them? I couldn't have. But then I'm a pig from way back.

They couldn't have come timelier. Up at Pathé they're trying to freeze me out. Shiver, and they say: "Huh! Temperamental." Since I've been wearing your scarves, they think I'm wonderful. Cooperative they call it. I call it warm.

Warms my heart too, your thinking of me.

Affectionately,
KATE

And, golly, how they match my suits!

Ann Sothern to Ann Sheridan Brent

Annie Poo:

Does the lucky stiff know what a lucky stiff he is? (As between us girls, I think you're doing okay too, toots. Good thing you saw José first—)

Incidentally, what do you need that looks good with a monogram?

And nifties aside, I'm happy as a grig for you both. That's from the heart.

BEAUTY and the BATH

Using refreshing, fragrant bath aids, Martha makes her bath and shower a delightful luxury rather than a chore.

By CAROL CARTER

Lavely Martha O'Driscall, Paramaunt player appearing in "Yaung and Willing."

Here's how Hollywood lovelies keep cool and well groomed despite klieg lights and summer sun!

She uses cooling skin fresheners, toners and colognes for further invigoration and fragrant loveliness.

After her bath, a light dusting of fragrant bath powder or talcum keeps her skin satiny smooth and petal soft.

Frequent pedicures and applying lotions and creams keep feet smooth and help ward off foot discomfort.

Creamy gardenias wait expectantly on your dressing table. (They just arrived!) Your gayest party dress is carefully spread on the bed and delicious trills of excitement tingle in your spine. For there's no doubt about it; tonight is going to be something special in dates. And, of course, you're going to insure your beauty with a bath, using all the glamour tips of the Hollywood stars.

And aren't you glad you have already laid such an excellent beauty foundation when you learned long ago that everyday cleanliness, well-brushed and shampooed hair, clean teeth, sparkling eyes were the beginnings of all good looks. Then, on important date nights like this when you want, above all, to look dainty and unflurried, you have all your preparations made. Good grooming will proceed like clockwork. No rummaging through crowded drawers for toilet articles. No sudden realization that you haven't a single clean slip to your name. Your lingerie is always petal fresh. For everyday use, you've kept a box of snowy soap flakes or a bar of easy lathering, floating soap with your beauty aids so that while running your nightly bath you can whisk your stockings and undies through a foaming basin of suds. Here's an extra glamour hint: pour a generous splash of your favorite toilet water or cologne into the final rinsing water. You'll always be surrounded with a faint but delicious cloud of fine scent that lingers on refreshingly.

Before you step into your bath is the time to examine your nails. Polish a bit cracked or chipped? Well, get out your lacquer remover and prepare the way for a fresh, gleaming coat of polish to be applied after the bath is finished. Remember to match it with the color of lipstick and dress you intend to wear. If your sandals are revealing, plan to give toe nails a coat of polish, also.

Polish off? Then plunge your hand into a jar of cleansing cream and smooth rich gobs of it all over your face, your neck and arms. Remember, your complexion does not end with your jawline. It's important —especially with evening clothes—that the skin of your arms and neck be smooth and soft as cream. If you've been a girl with foresight and budgeted your time carefully, you can relax in the tub with cream on your face. This is an effective home treatment for softening and toning the skin, as delightful in its results as a luxurious salon facial. The warmth from your tub will not only smooth your complexion, it will also set your hair if you cooperate by pinning it in curls before your bath. Protect your head with a net and splash all you want. The warm, moist air will set your hair neatly.

You'll feel like a pampered darling, if now, before stepping into the tub, you (Continued on page 70)

FOOTNOTES ON BEAUTY

by CAROL CARTER

Lona Turner, oppearing in "Johnny Eoger," is beautiful from head to toe.

What with the tire shortage and your increased interest in sports and defense work, you're going to be going more places than ever on your own two legs this summer. And though you may have the face of an angel, you won't be any man's conception of a dream walking unless your footwork is perfect. That requires trim, comfortable feet, lovely-to-look-at legs and a graceful way of carrying yourself.

You may not have thought of it before but it's patriotic, as well as to your advantage, to take care of those underpinnings. The listless girl whose feet are forever hurting her slows down whatever activity she enters. And while she's suffering needlessly, she's destroying the good impression she hopes to create—by an edgy disposition or strained facial expression.

If you want to have pep that makes for popularity and efficiency, too, be smart and wear shoes that fit your feet—not your idea how small they should be. Men tell us they seldom notice the size of a girl's shoes, but it's easy to spot the girl who wedges her feet into shoes that are too short or too narrow. Her feet just plain hurt, and she can't relax and enjoy herself—whether dancing, walking or just sitting and chatting. If you want graceful, comfortable feet, be sure also to select stockings that are long enough, for undersized hose cause almost as much discomfort as shoes that are incorrectly fitted.

These summery days when even the most normal feet seem to swell and become too big for shoes, make it a point to give your feet a little extra care. After your daily bath, massage with a soothing foot cream or lotion. Then, sprinkle a little powder over them and into each shoe to keep feet dry, cool and comfortable. If yours is the kind of job that keeps you standing all day long, don't stop with these small attentions. Relieve your tired feet nightly with a thorough foot bath, using all the antiseptic, soothing preparations made specially to draw out soreness and aching. You'll feel like someone gave you a new pair. Here's how you do it:

Dip your feet into warm water and let them soak for at least 10 minutes.

Then, with a stiff brush and sudsy soap

You'll go places this summer if you keep your two feet comfortable and well groomed and your legs trim, shapely and lovely to look at!

or a special foot soap, go over your feet briskly, concentrating mostly on the soles and around the toes and cuticles. Then, rinse your feet in alternate baths of warm and cold water until your feet feel soothed and relaxed, and dry them thoroughly. (This bath and successive rinsing are particularly effective, if your feet are inclined to perspire too freely in summer weather. Also use special foot salts in your water to help correct this condition and be lavish with powder before slipping into your pumps.)

Next comes a stimulating, yet soothing, massage with foot cream or lotion. Grasp your foot firmly with both hands near the toes and with a firm pressure smooth upward from toe to heel and up your ankle. When both feet have been eased, dust them with powder.

Even if your job doesn't require a lot of leg work, give your feet the above treat once a week. It will keep your step lively and graceful and improve the appearance of your feet. And the latter is something you ought to be concerned about always—but particularly this time of year when you wear revealing sandals for dancing or spend holidays at the beach. If you have any ugly foot disfigurements, get rid of them. They're often caused by improperly fitted shoes, so first correct your footwear, then give those blemishes proper treatment.

For instance, if you have a corn, apply a specially medicated pad or special lotion after bathing your feet. In a few days, the corn will soften sufficiently so that it can be easily pressed out with a blunt instrument, such as your orange stick wrapped in cotton. If it's a callous that detracts from foot beauty and comfort, get rid of it by applying a special callous pad or lotion. Generally, this heavy tissue can be peeled away within several days. However, if a callous is particularly tough and resistant, visit a good chiropodist.

Always be wary of blisters; they not only put a damper on your fun temporarily, but may cause you serious trouble, if neglected. First, try to prevent them by discarding shoes which rub or by inserting specially designed devices into your shoes which make them fit better. If, however, you do get a blister, keep it clean and protect it with antiseptic gauze or a special gauze pad applied with adhesive. Never apply adhesive tape directly over an injury.

Film stars, dancers and aqua belles everywhere whose figures are part of their fortunes, never miss giving their feet as much care and grooming as their hands, so why not follow their lead and give yourself a pedicure at least once a week? You want to be proud of your feet when you go swimming with the crowd. Every thorough pedicure, of course, begins with a foot bath and massage. Then take off old polish with special remover and cleansing tissue, and file or clip your nails straight across to avoid ingrowing at the corners. With a cotton-wound orange stick, go around the bases and under the tips with cuticle softener to remove dull, ugly tissue. Scrub your toes briskly with a firm-bristled brush and dry them with a thick, fluffy towel. Then, apply a bit of nail white under the tips and rinse again.

Last, highlight your nails with a polish shade to match your fingertips. Even if you don't intend to expose your feet to public view, you'll find them fascinating to watch when you walk about in your own room and you'll have the inner satisfaction of knowing you're flawlessly groomed from top to toe. Separate your toes with tufts of cotton or cleansing tissue so polish won't smear, then apply your lacquer evenly, stroking downward.

Let's consider legs, too. They come in for their share of attention always—whether you're in a swim suit, shorts or just swinging along the street in a smart summer frock. So don't let an ugly growth of excess hair detract from their shapely beauty when defuzzing takes just a few minutes. Whether you use a modern cream, liquid or wax depilatory or one of those handy little abrasive mitts, you'll find any of them effective.

If you go stockingless this summer, you'll want those legs of yours to be smooth as satin, so massage them regularly with a rich emollient cream or lotion. And don't forget to use special make-up on your legs to give them a lovely dull finish that's as flattering as the most expensive hose.

Is your walk lithe and graceful, expressing poise and youthful buoyancy? Why not watch yourself as you pass a shop window or a long mirror? If you find that you mince, wobble from side to side, toe in or out or have any other ungraceful mannerism, set about to correct your walk. For allover loveliness, it's as important to use your feet and legs gracefully as it is to keep them well groomed. An attractive carriage, of course, begins with good posture, so remember to hold yourself tall with shoulders back, tummy tucked in so that an imaginary straight line might run from your ears, through your shoulder to your ankle bone. Then, walk, swinging your legs rhythmically forward from your hips, keeping your knees straight but not stiff. Be sure that you toe directly forward, placing your weight briefly first on the ball of your foot then on your heel. If you find it hard to maintain good posture while walking, practice moving about with a book balanced on your head.

This will be a summer of dancing, walking and cycling for you—and your legs are always in the limelight. To be 1-A in the glamour classification, you need to keep your feet comfortable and healthy and your legs shapely and well groomed.

Summertime, particularly this summer, 1942, when more walking than ever is in order, is an excellent season to start catering to your feet and to avail yourself of all those aids that help keep your walkers cool, healthy and happy. Every week should be foot comfort week to you, but to bring the how's and why's of foot care to the attention of the public, Dr. Scholl inaugurated a National Foot Comfort Week twenty-six years ago. This year it's June 20 to 27, and stores everywhere selling foot aids will cooperate through trained personnel, counter and window displays and informative literature to help solve your foot problems.

smooth a sweet-smelling bath oil over your body. Then for extra bathing spice, swish a generous handful of bath crystals or water softener into the water. The really fastidious gal never steps into a tub without using some form of water softener or crystals. After they're used there is never any unsightly ring to mark the tub and, incidentally, the skin is left soft and smooth. For a bracing, tonic effect, try cologne or toilet water in your bath, also.

Now that you are in the tub relax completely. Stretch luxuriously in the scented water and work up a good lather with a fragrant soap to harmonize with your bath aids or, if you prefer, use a clean-smelling, floating bar soap. In any case, remember that a mild free-lathering one is your surest beauty aid. Then, to work with the bath brush! Scrub vigorously, paying special attention to elbows, heels and the section of your back between the shoulder blades. Feet in particular respond to this scrubbing. The massage sends the blood tingling, makes your step lighter and more buoyant. Smooth off foot callouses, tough cuticle and rough skin with a piece of pumice or one of those clever new files made expressly for the purpose. You'll be dancing more radiantly later on because of this short interval of foot care.

Finish your bath with a flesh-tingling, exhilarating shower. Reach for a clean, soft towel and dry yourself briskly. Be particularly careful about drying your feet. Don't neglect one of your ten precious toes. Dry them carefully and then, to be certain that your feet remain bath-fresh all evening, dust them with a special foot powder.

Perhaps the nicest thing about the bath ritual is the after-bath routine. For now is the time when you apply a cool, tangy body lotion, after-bath rub, cologne or toilet water. The universal method of applying them is to swish the lotion of your choice on in generous handfuls. Or you might prefer to use it in an atomizer and to bathe yourself in a cloud of fine scent. Allow it to dry. Then gently sift a fine talcum or dusting powder all over yourself.

Now, spanking clean and freshly perfumed from your bath, is the proper time to use a deodorant. For you want to preserve your brand new daintiness all through the evening. Your bath alone is no protection against perspiration that will form during an evening of active rhumba-ing to your favorite orchestra. Also, if necessary with your deodorant, use any effective, authorized perspiration check in either liquid, cream or powder form. And remember, the underarm is not the only area to be safe-guarded. Use your favorite anti-perspirant freely on your back and wherever skin touches skin. As a matter of habit you should, of course, be using a good anti-perspirant every two or three days. If you perspire freely it would certainly be a good idea to tuck a miniature size of your deodorant into your purse for the proverbial ounce of prevention. You'll realize that the question of complete personal daintiness is pretty important when you hear these surprising statistics: Fully 50% of women suffer a heavy annual loss in dresses through perspiration stains. Why, one woman alone who uses no anti-perspiration measures will ruin $39.50 worth of dresses in a year! And there's no counting the number of lost romances. Your legs, arms and underarms are, of course, smooth and free of unsightly hair. A necessary part of beauty, this, achieved by regular use of your favorite depilatory whether it's cream, wax or liquid, or a convenient abrasive mitt.

You are now completely fresh, cool and dainty from your bath. This ritual has heightened all your natural beauty and now art is coming to the aid of nature! You turn to your make-up table confident that you are thoroughly and immaculately feminine. Your face has been lubricated and revived by the earlier creaming while in the tub. Now to close the pores and strengthen the muscles, pat on a crystal-cool freshener.

Now, your face powder. A fresh puff goes without saying, of course. But before you fluff the lightest dab of powder on your cheek, make certain that you have smoothed a fine complexion base on face and neck. Work it in well, don't be too stingy with it. Then over this satin-smooth foundation, carefully and generously pat your favorite face powder. The technique used in Hollywood studios is to put as much powder on the puff as it will hold and then gently press it against the skin. Never slap your face with the puff to get the last grain of powder. Your skin is too delicate for such rough treatment. Brush off excess powder with a fine complexion brush that also does a good job of blending. Then, a glow of rouge to brighten your eyes. Brush out your hair, flicking a bit of brilliantine through it with your comb to bring out all its sheen.

Here is where you can make use of all the coquettish perfume tricks that beautiful women have been bewitching mere males with for centuries. Spray on a whiff of good scent. Lightly trace the outline of your brows with it. Or mark the part of your hair with a faint touch of perfume; sheer enchantment for a night of dancing.

You want your lips to be soft, dewy and lushly feminine-looking, so avoid ugly smears by using a lipstick pencil. You'll be surprised at what a neat job you can do with this handy aid. For longwearing lips, try this Hollywood trick: After the first application of lipstick dust your lips with powder, whisk off the excess with a soft utility brush and then apply a second coat of lipstick and blot away the excess with cleansing tissue. The first layer of lipstick makes an impregnable base.

But don't let your lips steal compliments from your eyes. Highlight them with cream, cake form or liquid mascara, brushed on in a filmy coat to accentuate the natural warmth and color of your eyes. Darken your brows with brisk strokes of your eyebrow pencil and subtly apply shadow.

To retain that delightfully invigorated, fresh feeling you have after bathing, dust yourself all over with a soothing, cooling bath powder. If you're looking for one that will spread as smooth as satin, why not try Cashmere Bouquet Talcum. It has the same fine quality of face powder and the delicate fragrance that men love. Be cool, be dainty this summer. Let Cashmere Bouquet Talcum give you charm.

If you want to do your bit for Uncle Sam, conserve your hair pins and use them over and over again. They're made of valuable steel, you know, that can be converted into war uses. Why not get off to a right start now and equip yourself with a Victory Hair Pin Kit which contains sufficient pins for a complete hair-do. It's smaller than your compact and as light as your powder puff, so take it with you to your hairdresser's or keep it handy on your dressing table for setting your own locks with ease.

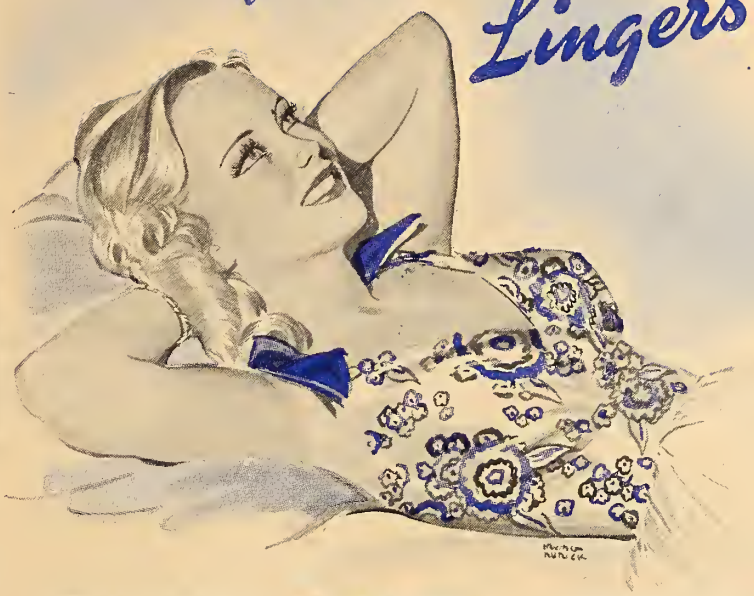
The Memory Lingers On



This was it . . . the real thing . . . the night you dreamed about ever since freckles and pigtails.

And now you re-live every precious minute . . .

That look in his eyes when you floated down the staircase.

The way he held you close as you danced. And how he sulked, when the stag line caught up with you!

Then like the climax to a great play . . . he suggested a stroll in the moonlight. You felt like a leading lady, walking with him on the terrace . . .

And to think you almost didn't go tonight . . . almost called it off!

If it hadn't been for Jane, you'd have let trying days of the month rule your life! But remember how she laughed at your worries . . . made you promise to switch to Kotex sanitary napkins?

As she put it—it's comfort you want most, and most everyone knows Kotex is more comfortable!

Because Kotex is made in soft folds, it's naturally less bulky . . . more comfortable . . . made to stay soft while wearing. A lot different from pads that only "feel" soft at first touch.

Then, too, Kotex has flat, pressed ends that do away with bumps and bulges. And a new moisture-resistant "safety shield" for added protection. No wonder your lingering doubts and fears vanished completely!

So you've decided that from now on Kotex is "a must". Now you know why it's more popular than all other brands of pads put together!

Be confident . . . comfortable . . . carefree —with Kotex*!

her what she wanted, and, from the sheet-music menu, she selected a beverage with an exotic name. George said he'd have the same. "I was brought up to think you should always do that when you take a lady out," he explains this most charming of Western mannerisms.

When the order arrived, it was a triumph. Cracked ice in a bowl almost big enough for a family of fish; inside that was a tall, thin, iced glass. George felt that he had done the right thing—for etiquette's sake and the photographers—so he said to the waiter, "Could I have a glass of milk, please?"

Hedy looked up at George and smiled. "Could I have one, too, please?"

So, on their first date, George and Hedy hid two glasses of milk behind a pair of elaborate bar concoctions and thoroughly enjoyed themselves. They danced. They didn't talk very much; sometimes words aren't necessary when eyes meet and cling.

hamburger heaven . . .

After Mocambo closed they drove down to the beach and watched the furious pounding of winter surf. Then they went to a drive-in to have hamburgers. "How do you feel about onions?" he asked Hedy.

"I love them," she confessed.

"What a girl!" To the carhop he said, "Two hamburgers with everything."

George is a hamburger connoisseur. During the one year he attended the University of Montana, he worked his way through by serving as a cook in a hamburger stand. He insists that he is a 4-star chef; he learned this knack from an old sheepherder when the two of them used to be isolated for weeks at a time out on the range. "I can make the best biscuits you ever flapped a lip over," he says. "Flannel cakes, corn bread, potato pancakes with sliced onion . . . I can really turn 'em out."

Lucky Hedy—because she doesn't cook. She says that she's lazy. The only thing she makes—and does it in larrapin' style—is what she calls her "million" island dressing.

George gets a huge kick out of Hedy's occasional struggles with English. The other day as they were hiking along a country lane, she looked up at him and said eagerly, "Some time we'll go back to Amorocco again, won't we?"

George says that whatever Hedy wants, he'll get for her—forever—but this request had to be cleared up. "Where?" he asked. After all, Hedy has traveled a great deal, but she and George haven't yet had time to discuss many of the places she knows well.

"The Amorocco," she repeated. "You know, where we went for our first date—the night we fell in love."

Dawn. "Oh, the MOCAMBO!"

They clung to each other and laughed. From that moment to this they call the Mocambo the Amorocco.

Almost immediately after they met, both George and Hedy went into pictures. Hedy was working days in "Tortilla Flat" and George was working nights in "Ten Gentlemen From West Point." But they couldn't bear to let a day go by without seeing one another. Somehow they managed it—George would spend an hour or so in the morning on the M-G-M set where Hedy was working and Hedy, the instant she was through work, would rush over to the 20th lot to spend an hour or so with George. Only when he was on location at distant Idylwild (which Hedy calls Isle Wyle) did they miss that daily visit.

By the way, to illustrate George's rapid-fire sense of humor, when he was asked if "Ten Gentlemen From West Point" was a "period" picture, he grinned. "Well, considering the circumstances at the time, for me it was a 'coma' picture."

No matter what happened during the week, George and Hedy managed to have their Sundays together—long, golden days filled with the magic of early California spring. They drove into the country where the fields were green with young grain. George explained how oats looked. Then he explained the difference between oats and barley. Beans and cabbage and cauliflower.

Imagine Hedy, in the eyes of the world the super-sophisticate who knew Vienna, Paris, Budapest and Biarritz, learning about farm products! Hedy of "Ecstasy" riding along with a sun-browned cowboy from Montana! Hedy of "Algiers" trying to tell barley from oats in a windblown seaside field!

George says he wasn't able to cross her up very often; she studied her grains seriously. "What's that?" he asked one morning, pointing to a field filled with feathery leaved plants.

"That is falfala," she said quickly.

George didn't have the heart to correct her. "She was so earnest."

When he tells stories like that about Hedy, George's voice goes deep with tenderness. For him, this is first love; he had told interviewers only a few months ago that he had no intention of marrying for years. He had been pretty sure of his bomb-proof heart. He didn't dream that his slim, dark-haired girl would change his life completely.

As for Hedy, her two previous marriages seem to have made no deeper impression upon her personality than do the light-hearted romances of an American high-school girl. Sometimes, when with George, she must have marveled at the world of joy and laughter he was opening to her, because he says she would become silent for long miles.

"Penny for your thoughts," he would say. And, after this had happened several hundred times he shortened the query to "Penny?"

That became their password. George gave her a hand-tooled Western belt mounted with silver. Along the silver clasp that holds the tail of the belt in place is engraved the word "Penny." For Easter, George sent over to the stage at M-G-M where Hedy was working, a blue and white canvas set chair. On the back in large letters is printed "Penny."

Hedy gave George a money clip—the type that holds currency in place—and mounted on the top arm of the clip was a shining new penny.

There were other gifts, too. On the little finger of his left hand, George wears the ring Hedy gave him. It consists of three narrow gold bands: one band is white gold, one yellow gold, and the third rose gold. The top surface is engraved to give the bands a rope-like design, and the three bands are so linked together that, on George's finger, sort of red and beige plaid, like the room.

Vaughn breakfasts with her even on her working days, when it means getting up at six. Those are the days when she doesn't bother with make-up, since all that will be done at the studio—just showers, dresses and combs her hair, never the same way twice. If Vaughn had his way, she'd never wear make-up off the lot. She likes it, he doesn't, so they compromise. When she's going out, she takes the works—lipstick, rouge, eyebrow pencil, mascara—just a little of each for color. At home she pleases the lord and master by wearing no make-up at all.

"Take it easy," says Vaughn, like males the world over, as she hops into her gold-brown Cadillac. It was he who taught her to drive, and they went through the same routine we all go through when our husbands or brothers or sweethearts thus condescend, the general theme being that he's impatient, and she's stupid. Deanna's chief trouble was forgetting to put the clutch in and stalling the car. "Throw in the clutch," he'd yell, and she'd jam on the brakes, and end by moving out from under the wheel with a frosty, "You drive." He thinks she's a swell driver now. The "Take it easy" is just extra insurance. Ironically, the car she finally bought was a clutchless Hydromatic.

She loves that early morning drive to the studio. With the car top down, weather permitting, and the radio on, there's something wonderful about driving all alone down the twisting canyon road. It gives you the feeling of ice-skating, says Deanna—sort of like jumping from foot to foot as you take the curves. Besides, she can tune the radio on as loud as she likes, which is louder than anyone else likes. What the program is doesn't matter, as long as it's music, and that includes jive. Driving home is less fun. She's tired, and the traffic's heavy, and she just wants to get there and get cleaned up for dinner, which isn't till seven-thirty or eight, because it takes so long to get her make-up off. Pancake make-up won't stay on her skin, so she has to use grease.

She's no sluggard, even on her days off, and unless she's been out very late the night before, gets up at eight, slips into a housecoat, and prepares for a busy day, doing nothing much. She thinks housecoats are fun, changes to a dress for lunch and wears slacks only when she feels particularly lazy. Vaughn doesn't care for them, but that's not why she avoids them, she's just not crazy about them herself.

With reading, knitting, answering mail, a dip in the pool or just sitting somewhere and looking, the morning goes. Puttering is the best thing she does. Her mind's eye retains an accurate picture of the decorative scheme of each room. If a rug's been moved or an ashtray shoved out of place, that's simply dandy, she has such a fine time pushing them straight again. She won't trust her precious linens to the laundry. They're done in the washing-machine on the back porch and left on her fourposter, so she can put them back on the shelves herself. She's a tidy housekeeper. "But not like my mother," she says firmly. "Mother has to have the house spring-cleaned every day, so of course she has

When is a Tampon right for you?

Now more than ever—when days are so busy and hectic—the wonderful freedom of internal sanitary protection makes sense! But there are tampons and tampons. What are the things to look for—when is a tampon right for you?

Protection the right way

For real security a tampon must absorb quickly, surely! Meds absorb faster because of their exclusive "safety center" feature! Meds are made of finest, pure cotton . . . hold more than 300% of their weight in moisture!

Is it right for comfort?

Meds were scientifically designed by a woman's doctor. So comfortable you hardly know you're wearing them. Meds eliminate bulges—chafing—pins—odor. Easier to use, too, for each Meds comes in an individual one-time-use applicator!

* * *

Meds cost less than any other tampons in individual applicators. No more than leading napkins. Get Meds—the right tampon—for protection, comfort, and value!

lots of trouble with maids and things."

Bills and checkbooks are her bête noire, but she thinks she ought to wrestle with them. She wrestles in the den with a fire for company. When she gets them balled up, Vaughn comes to the rescue. Vaughn can make figures jump through hoops. She takes a voice lesson every day, because lessons are more fun than vocalizing by yourself, and you've got to do one or the other—as in any game requiring practise—or you'll soon find you're not as good as you were. She enjoys fixing flowers, though she's rather a dub at it. Since their garden's new, most of the flowers have to be bought. But the vegetable garden Vaughn planted three months ago is paying dividends. There was never a lettuce like the first they had out of the garden. So tender. Such a pure green. No brown spots like in the store.

They're both hearty eaters and razz each other about weight. What Deanna likes best is everything fattening—spaghetti, pie à la mode, water with meals instead of between. "Of course my husband gains right and left," she notes, "while he's telling me not to." She's always loathed vegetables. Her mother tried to force them on her for a while, but it took so much out of them both that she gave up. Now Deanna's stern with herself. "You're a married woman, you'd better grow up about eating." When Dudi asks, "Will such-and-such a vegetable be all right?" she writhes, says yes and tries it. The most she can say for them is that they go down a little more easily than they used to. Last month, however, eating an artichoke for the first time, she found to her mingled chagrin and glee that she loved it—chagrin at what she'd been missing all these years. She's perverse about artichokes, too—prefers the tough leaves to the tender heart, and trades her heart for Vaughn's leaves. As for calories, she doesn't really have to worry. Excess poundage melts when she starts working, and working's lots easier than saying no to a dish of spaghetti.

They fix their own dinner on maid's night out—steak or stew or tamales. Vaughn's the better cook. She doesn't know where he learned—Boy Scouts or something—just all of a sudden he stood there and knew how to cook. She washes the dishes, because she won't trust him to stick to her system—glasses first, then silver, then china, then pans. "Why?" asks Vaughn.

"Because that's how it's supposed to be done."

"Why?"

"I heard so five years ago."

night life . . .

They go dancing occasionally—to Ciro's or the Cocoanut Grove—but not nearly so often as before they were married. They go to the movies, which they're nuts about, and hold hands. Mostly, though, they just talk about going and wind up in front of the playroom fire, listening to the Capehart. There's something about a new home, they've learned, that makes you a homebody.

Or they'll head for the couch—which is long enough to hold one at each end, with their feet up—and read. Deanna's just finished "Ivory Mischief." Vaughn goes in more for current affairs. Each freely interrupts the other with a passage that has to be read aloud. Or they'll just gab. Gabbing, says Deanna, is what she'd miss most out of marriage—having someone you can talk like mad to about anything—music, the war or Swedish massage. To get one of these big discussions started, she'll blithely call black what she knows is pure white.

Friends may drop in—Anne Shirley who lives across the road, or Laraine Day or kids they know in the technical end of the business whose names mean nothing to the movie-goer. Then it's records or games or they roll up the rug and dance. I was curious to know if Deanna ever sang for them. "Not to stand up and sing. I might break out, but they pay no attention. I have wonderful friends. They ignore me."

Vaughn calls her Edna, as do most of her intimates. Deanna would sound as strange from them as Edna would sound at the studio. If she sticks a y on your name, that means she likes you. Clarency she calls her brother-in-law. But she doesn't say Vaughny, it's generally darling. He brings her gardenias, her favorite flower, as he did before they were married. When they're going out, he'll ask if she wouldn't rather have something else. She never would. He comes home with new records, which she's not allowed to look at. He's got to put them on the machine and surprise her.

She bought him a pair of gray fuzzy slippers for Easter, rigged them up with eyes and ears to look like bunnies and stuck them in a basket, faces peeking over the top. Not being too handy with her fingers, it took her all afternoon. Once in a while she'll bring him a new photo she thinks he might like, with an inscription he likes still better. These are strictly for his dressing room, where Deanna in her wedding gown holds the place of honor. They don't have photos stuck all over the house, think it looks conceited.

Affectation in any form is a red rag to Vaughn. Telling him the story of a picture she was to make, Deanna kept referring to the girl as she.

"You're going to play it. Why don't you say I?"

"What's the difference?"

"Sounds phony. How'd you like me saying, 'She goes coy on him and he bangs her over the head'?"

So, for the pleasure of having her ears slapped down, Deanna feeds him bait. Separated for the first time on her recent camp tour, they phoned each other often. One night she talked her head off, the bill was terrific, and she got bawled out by mail. "Can I help it," she wrote back sweetly, "if I'm so fascinating that you can't tear yourself away?" The answer to that one was a honey, but private.

She slaps him down, too. For not standing up straight. Ever since she's known the guy, she's been after him to stand up straight. They even made a deal. If she'd quit biting her nails, he'd quit slumping. She did, but he didn't. Also he leaves the door of the cedar closet open, and she has to keep slamming it shut. She's of two minds about that. It makes her mad because it's bad for the cedar. On the other hand, she wouldn't care for an over-orderly man and gets a kick out of picking up after him.

Badminton is the only sport they share. Vaughn goes in for squash which is too fast for Deanna—tennis which she's not much good at—and golf which she doesn't like. She loves a horse. Vaughn's only attempt at riding brought on severe pains in the side. "Because you don't do it right," his bride assured him. "I'll show you." But she hasn't got around to it yet.

For Christmas of '38 he gave her an exquisite wristwatch, set with rubies, her favorite stone. She was so mad about it that he had her engagement ring designed to match. Her wedding ring is the old-fashioned gold band. With her hair back, she wears earrings, mostly costume stuff—likes the real thing, too, but doesn't own much of it—a gold bracelet with rubies from her mother and two lovely clips which were wedding gifts, one of amethyst, one of topaz, ruby and diamonds from Joe Pasternak.

Her taste in clothes is conservative. She likes them fluffy and tailored, red and yellow and green, but thinks she looks best in blue. Vaughn wouldn't be caught dead shopping with her and doesn't comment too lavishly on what she wears. Just says, "Pretty—" if he thinks so. If not, there's a certain kind of face he makes. She's more articulate on the subject of his clothes, feels that dark suits—especially navy—bring out the best in him and wore him down about a flat-crowned hat he'd fancied. He got so sick of hearing that men with round faces shouldn't wear flat crowns that this particular number became a rain-hat.

She hates phoning and soap when it's down to a sliver. She has a weakness for bargain-hunting, buying doo-dads for the house and Richard Hickman. The last is an understatement. She adores the ground her only beloved nephew walks on.

He's a little over a year. When he tries to say auntie, it sounds like ahwah and like heaven to Deanna. He has an ear for music. Only when Ahwah's around, does he ask to be sung to sleep. "Boo!" he says, and she sits beside his crib and sings "Boola Boola Boola Byebye"—the lullaby she's always loved best. He was at the station when she got back from her camp tour. "And remembered me," lilts Deanna. "He held his arms out."

Her camp tour had nothing to do with the criticism unfairly heaped on her head in connection with a projected trip to England. Some time before we went to war, she was approached about entertaining the soldiers abroad. While she and Vaughn were considering the possibility, Pearl Harbor put an end to it. Meantime some overzealous or misinformed official had broken the story prematurely, and folks started clacking, how about our own soldiers? Deanna needed no reminder that our own came first.

Like most of Hollywood's stars, she signed up with the Victory Committee to do whatever she could. They mapped out a tour which included Camp Edwards and Ft. Devens in Massachusetts, Forts Monmouth and Dix in New Jersey, Indian Town Gap in Pennsylvania, Belvoir in Virginia, and the Aberdeen Proving Grounds in Maryland. She joined a regular vaudeville unit, giving two shows a night and says the boys did infinitely more for her than she could ever do for them.

They stuck "Welcome, Deanna" posters on the mess hall walls. They had cakes baked, decorated with the regimental colors and her name. They presented her with their insignia, which meant they had to go out and buy others for themselves.

"Anything they do becomes so big," she fairly wails, "because you know all the trouble they have to go to, to do it. Just the fact that so many came to the show. They had to walk three or four miles from barracks. They had to stand on line. They had to pay twenty cents—which they don't any more, thank goodness." She'll never forget the two boys who sent her two gardenias. "At twenty-one dollars a month, two gardenias cost a fortune!" Nor the boy who played the piano at Camp Edwards. He asked her to sign a valentine he'd bought for his bride-to-be.

"But I wouldn't want my husband to send me a valentine with another girl's name on it," she protested.

"My girl would," grinned the soldier.

Some of the boys were shy at first. To break barriers down, she'd spend afternoons in the service clubs, eat with them in the mess halls, serve them their food. They got a bang out of that. To keep the show informal, she wore prints instead of evening gowns, announced her own songs, talked to them from the stage as she'd talk to a roomful of friends, which indeed they were. She sang ten songs every night and kept them light. Nothing classical. Nothing patriotic. The fact that they were there proved how they felt. They didn't have to be sold on anything or reminded. As a matter af fact, she didn't want to remind them. They were there to have fun. That's what she tried to give them.

They'd stamp and yell when she announced "Amapola" or "Embraceable You." They'd hum along when she sang "Taps 'Til Reveille." "Rose O'Day" got a terrific hand. Till she proved it, they seemed doubtful that she could manage the double talk. While she was singing, you could have heard the proverbial pin drop. Afterwards, she bawled.

"They seemed so happy, and I felt just the opposite. You do so little and they think it's wonderful, and the whole thing's out of proportion." Some of the letters they wrote her she swears she'll keep as long as she lives. With the two gardenias.

She returned to prepare for "The Divine Young Lady." She misses Joe Pasternak who guided her course for six years, but Bruce Manning, her present producer, reminds her of Pasternak. He's not just the man who runs things. He's someone you can talk to, and he understands.

Her contract has two more years to run. Beyond that, she's making no plans. Whatever comes, comes. She's never been a dyed-in-the-wool career girl. She loves her work, but she loves her husband better.

Right now their lives are shadowed only by the shadow that darkens the lives of all young people today. Vaughn has been called into service. He hated leaving her as much as she hated being left. But like most men, he wanted to go. Deanna can't be happy about it. The most she can find is comfort in the knowledge that she's sharing the lot of millions of women. And that Vaughn is doing what he has to do, for the sake of something bigger and more enduring than themselves.

"You can't help being comforted by that," says Deanna, grown up.

LAST MINUTE NEWS

As we went to press, word reached us that due to Vaughn's recent induction into the Navy, Deanna Durbin was putting her honeymoon home on the market and moving nearer to her studio. Good luck, Ensign Paul and Deanna!

Adventure: Lucky you if your family's remained solvent so far and your allowance is still rolling in. A job isn't your ticket, but how would you like to try a walking tour or a bicycle expedition? Get two or three of your pals together, pack a minimum of clothes in one of those knapsack arrangements and depart. If you live in the city, proceed by train to some walkable or bikeable territory. Set some real point of interest about 75 miles distant as your destination. (You can do about fifteen or twenty miles comfortably in a day.) Stop over night at Y. W. C. A.'s or at one of the places the town's chamber of commerce will recommend. It's smart to map out your trip and write for this information in advance. Take along your camera and immortalize the most exciting summer you've ever had.

Girl Scout stuff: Ever stop to think that here you are in your nice safe house sleeping like an angel till all hours every morning and stuffing in Good Humors most of the day while thousands of boys —some of them no older than you—are fighting and dying so you can continue this super-okay American way of life? They make us all feel pretty humble, and we want like the very devil to deserve them. There isn't very much we can do to help the chaps overseas except buy defense stamps and more defense stamps, but there's lots to do for those future MacArthurs—our camped cronies. Fudge and brownies fill one void, but there's another great big one. They're starved for news from home. See that your local boys get the hometown newspaper, send them snapshots of the gang. Write often and breezily and don't be a dope about who owes whom a letter. Give them parties when they're home on leave. Make much of them—they're the swellest bunch of guys you'll ever really want to know.

Romance dep't: And of course you can't live without love—but it's no cinch to snag a stag come summer. Their standards seem to go up with the thermometer. To rate a bid to the local cinema palace, you've got to be an Alice Marble with a tennis racket, a Veronica Lake with a bathing suit and a Dottie Parker with the small talk. Haven't you noticed? Badger one of your female cronies to help you with your tennis. Go at it faithfully every day till you're really good—then watch the Almost-A-Tilden who brushed you off in chemistry class come around.

For that Veronica Lake figure: No more than nine hours sleep! It's that blissful tenth hour that pads the old waistline. Not too much ice cream. A little daily exercise rather than a frightful workout once in a blue moon. As for the small talk, read the newspapers, listen to the radio and read at least one good book a week. That should supply you with adequate conversation pieces in the line of news, comic strips, current swing and good literature.

Now you're on your own. Take summer in your stride and happy hunting!

they can be slid one over the other in an endless design. But when the ring is removed, the three bands remain interlocked. There is a legend engraved within the three bands, but George refuses to show it to anyone. There are only three persons in the world who know what the fine, secret writing says, and those three are George, Hedy and the jeweller who did the work.

Hedy's engagement ring is a huge, square-cut diamond. One Hollywood columnist mistakenly announced that George had purchased the ring in a pawn shop. Of course, this was a ridiculous statement. A few doors away from the M-G-M administrative building there is a small shop run by a man who has long been known among studio personnel as an expert on fine stones. Mickey Rooney ordered the magnificent engagement ring he gave Ava Gardner from this man. Hedy's ring was ordered in the same way. Not that it really matters. Hedy would cherish it in a ten-cent box of crackerjacks.

When did he give Hedy her ring? "Oh, round about lambin' time," says the guy from Great Falls to indicate the early part of March. George's parents may be Russian, right enough, and he may speak Russian fluently with them at home, but he's one hundred per cent western American in idiom, action and idea.

Hedy speaks German and French in addition to English, yet she had no common language with which to discuss George when she met Mrs. Letz. Afterward, George's mother told him, "That's a nice, sweet girl. Pretty, too."

The reaction of Hedy's mother to George was the one usually voiced by women. "My, isn't he a big man!" Jimmy, Hedy's three-year-old adopted son, simply adores George and George feels the same way about Jimmy. "He's the cutest, smartest little kid I've seen in a long time," he says. "I'm nuts about him." George likes all children and hopes that he and Hedy will have "about three, and I'll teach 'em to ride as soon as they can walk."

angel on horseback . . .

George's first motion picture appearance was on horseback when he rode up a flight of stairs in "Conquest," and his first big part was doubling for the "Lone Ranger." "Nothing quite like a good horse," he says, so it is to be expected that he would start at once to teach Hedy to ride.

She had never been on a horse in her life until George drove her out to a small riding academy and selected a mount for her. Was she frightened?

"Say, she's not afraid of anything," George answers with pride.

She's learning to ride a western saddle —not English. "When you ride the ranges in Montana, you've got to have the right support," George explains. "Hedy got the general knack right away. Of course there were things she had to learn."

So George began to explain the important points of managing a horse. Let him know who was boss right away. Don't be simply a passenger—be in command. Keep your head up and your heels down. Sit straight in the saddle, but not stiff—be relaxed. That's right. Now, hold your reins in your left hand. Never hold them in your right hand—you might need that right hand for something else.

of holding the reins in the left hand. One rein could slide through here, and one through here—the thing was to keep the tension equal. . . .

"Say, George, honey," Hedy burst out, "don't you tell me so many things all at once. You tell me one thing at a time. And slowly."

At that, George leaned down from his saddle and told her one more thing—with a kiss—while the horses obligingly stood still.

Nowadays, whenever picture schedules will allow it, they ride every day for several hours.

Not only do they like the same things, they are burned up by the same woes. Neither of them relishes the amount of free advice handed out in Hollywood. Since the instant they knew they were in love—the night of their first date—they have been the center of attention. One group tried to get them to elope at once; the other faction drew long faces and said the marriage should be postponed indefinitely. They muttered darkly the word "Career."

George ignored them. He says, and means it to the soles of his 12-D shoes, that he can always go back to Montana "to the harvest." Around Hollywood his most frequently worn outfit is a pair of blue denims and a red plaid shirt, open at the throat. He makes no secret of the fact that he wants to get enough money to buy himself a good, big ranch near Great Falls. And when he goes back, Hedy will go with him.

Of course, that's probably far in the future. By the time you read this, George and Hedy will probably be married. They hadn't—late in April—decided whether the wedding would be large or small, in Los Angeles or across the state line. "We've never had enough time together to settle down to such little details," George says sincerely.

When you're in love, when every moment together is bliss, when you walk on air and breathe stardust, how can you be practical? George would like to know.

This much they have decided—in a burst of down-to-earth-ness. They will rent a "place"—George didn't know whether it would be a house, apartment, flat or what—halfway between M-G-M and 20th. "Then we can decide what we want to do next."

Meanwhile there's always today. "Please excuse me," George says. "I have to make a telephone call." His calls are brief—never more than five minutes. He uses the telephone strictly to make arrangements. Anything else he has to say is better spoken eye to eye.

When he is away from Hedy, what does he call her in his mind? Does he have a secret, special pet name for her? "Well, yes," he says seriously. "I call her mya adushatska. I'll try to translate it for you. It means a lot of things. It means everything. It means 'my love, my life, my heart, my soul.' "

That is what Hedy Lamarr means to love of her life George Montgomery.

Gracie Allen to George Burns

Dear George:

I got into a big discussion with the family last night about whether you suit me in husbands. Like that blue suit you bought, George, remember? That didn't fit you, because they put a hot pastrami sandwich in the pocket with coleslaw and two pairs of pants? You don't like hot pastrami, so they think I might not like you.

The family has to be very careful about you, George, because my aunt Mamie eloped with a two-headed glamour boy from the circus, but you only have one head, George, which makes you twice as dangerous, unless you keep the other one in the icebox, but I said, how could you with the Pepsi-Cola and all, you certainly can't drink a head. You see, I trust you, George.

Mother likes you very much, George, but the idea of my falling in love gets her so nervous, we had to have all her teeth pulled to keep her from biting her nails.

George, I love you very much, but the next letter you write, please put enough postage on it. There was two cents due on the last, but we sold the postman a cup of coffee for a dime, and made a nice profit on the deal.

Am sending you kisses by the next mail, as I could not get them all into this envelope.

Walter Brennan to Gary Cooper

And then we have the pal-to-pal note from Oscar-winning Walter Brennan to Oscar-winning Gary Cooper:

Dear Coop:

I was never one to heckle a friend. So this isn't a heckle, it's just a nudge. You owe me ten bucks, Coop.

Remember one day last year, we were sitting outside stage 7 at Warners, trying to grab a little sun. You were whittling one of those doodads for the kid. I was just sittin'. They'd had a tough time talking you into "Sergeant York." I asked you why. "People won't believe me," you said. "He's a big man. He's alive. People remember what he did. They'll say, that's just Gary Cooper, the jerk."

Well, I'm one of the people. At the time, I'd never laid eyes on the Sergeant, but I remember what he'd done and from what I knew about you, I thought you could play him. "Ten bucks says you get the Academy Award with 'Sergeant York'," says I.

"Easy money for me," says you and we shook on it.

Well, I was there last night, Coop. I saw them hand the Oscar over. So hand the ten over, bud. I need it for another bet I'm laying on this guy that's playing Lou Gehrig for Goldwyn. Want any part of it?

Your pal,
WALTER

Penny Singleton to Robert Sparks

Domestic love, with official embellishments. Just to be different, Penny Singleton Sparks, whose husband, Robert Sparks, produces her "Blondie" series, jots down a memento. Sweet and silly, isn't it? Love's like that.

Dear Mr. Sparks:
They tell me you're to produce our next picture. Oh, Mr. Sparks! I've long admired you from a distance and to think I'm going to get to see you real close. Oh, Mr. Sparks, is your hair really hair, do your eyes open and shut, can you squeak when you're squeezed, Mr. Sparks? Dear Mr. Sparks, may I have your autograph. Scrawled any old way will do, at the bottom of a check. The name is
PENNY SINGLETON SPARKS
P.S.—Mr. Sparks, honey, Ah loves you. Here's to a smash hit!

Gene Raymond to Jeanette MacDonald

There was plenty of humor mixed into the Jeanette MacDonald-Gene Raymond courtship. For instance, in the case of the Lovely Egg-Plant. (Gene abhors them!) This billet-doux came from Florida B.M. (Before Matrimony).

Dear Miss MacDonald:

I smelled an eggplant on my doorstep this morning with your card attached. I don't quite know how to thank you, though I'm getting an idea or two. They have lovely scorpions here, guaranteed to bite. Or would you prefer something in tarantulas as a house pet? I esteem you so highly that on second thought I'd be willing to stretch a point and send you both. Don't thank me. It's nothing really. Just varmints to a varmint.

I'll keep the eggplant always—in the garbage can. As to what I think of you, remind me to tell you some time.

I'll be back next week. Will you keep Friday night for me?

As always,
GENE

Joan Crawford to Edward Arnold

Dear Eddie:

Mind if I write you a fan letter? So I'm a sentimental sap, so what? It's not just that I loved working with you and didn't mind how many scenes you stole—there's an admission from an actress!—because stole is the wrong word, Eddie, you took what was yours by right of a great performance. But never mind all that. It's you I'll miss—talking to you, hearing that laugh of yours, knowing you're around. You could make a fortune renting yourself out, Eddie—just charge a small fee for walking into a room, because the minute you walk in, people's spirits lift.

I hate endings and I love beginnings. So I'm going to forget this ending and look forward to beginning another picture with you—the sooner, the better.

With gratitude and affection,
JOAN

Donald Crisp and Walter Pidgeon to Roddy McDowall

Master Roddy McDowall, 12-year-old English actor at 20th Century-Fox, regretted that he had to miss the New York showing of his first American hit "How Green Was My Valley." The sacrifice was compensated, though. His father, the doughty Tom, sailing with the British Merchant Marine, swooped down on the family, unannounced. Then, the morning after the Manhattan opening, came these wires. (Reverend Gruffydd was Pidgeon's name in "How Green—")

There's a grand actor you are Roddy my boy. Imagine how good you wanted to be, then multiply by three and that's how good you were. It would have done your mother's heart good to hear them cheer you. My love to you all.

DONALD CRISP

It was your night, Roddy. The fans were polite to the rest of us but kept looking under our arms for Huw. They loved you Roddy with capital letters that won't go into a wire. So do I.

REVEREND GRUFFYDD

Regis Toomey to Edward G. Robinson

Dear Eddie:

I've been sitting here, listening to your show. That's what got me started. Big Town's never been just a radio program to me. I don't want to slop over, God forbid, but I know what this country means to you. So many of us take it for granted till we're jolted to our senses. You've never done that. I've always felt your intense love for America behind this program of yours. Call yourself Steve Wilson, it's still Eddie Robinson fighting to make America a better place for Americans to live in. That's why you show us how kids going wrong can be straightened out, and the horrors brought about by reckless driving, that's why you keep pounding at us about the war—because you can't stand the thought of Americans losing what America's always stood for.

As another American, I want to say thanks. I've had an urge to get this off for a long time, but you know how it is where deep feelings are involved.

REG TOOMEY

Edmund Goulding to Sig Rumann

For over ten years big Sig Rumann, the "So-they-call-me-Concentration-Camp-Erhardt" Gestapo Colonel in "To Be Or Not to Be," has been hoarding a honey from Director Edmund Goulding:

Dear Mr. Rumann:

Owen Davis happened to be with me when your note came. I said: "This is from Sig Rumann." He said: "Did you see him in 'Grand Hotel'? Then you missed the finest piece of acting done hereabouts in fifteen years." If a man failed to pass on to me such a tribute from such a source, I'd send my ghost to haunt him. To escape similar treatment from yours, I'm passing this on.

I'll be glad to send you a copy of your test, and please don't mention payment. The company's richer than you are, and owes you thanks besides for having made the test. It convinces me, for one, that when you're ready to go into films, the films will be ready to take you.

With best wishes,

EDMUND GOULDING

Ruth Hussey to Kathryn Grayson

New England-born Ruth Carol Hussey, not given to extravagant praise or unwarranted enthusiasms, writes to Kathryn Grayson, very new to the Hollywood scene, after Ruth pinch-hits at the Lynchburg opening of Kathryn's best film to date, "The Vanishing Virginian."

Dear Kathryn:

Here I sit in Lynchburg, feeling like a base intruder, butting in on what should have been your party, talking to people who want to talk to you, hearing compliments they'd give their eyeteeth to pour straight into your ears. Oh, Kathryn, it makes me sick that you couldn't come. But where's the sense in piling it on? I'll tell you all about it when I see you, only I always did hate warmed-over meals.

Of course they've been very nice to me. They're much too courteous and hospitable to say or even to hint, what in thunder did they send you for instead of the girl who played our darling Becky? But I see it in their cheated eyes and hear it in the million questions they ask me. You know who asked the most questions? Rebecca Yancey Williams, the author herself, whom I met after the premiere. "You can't imagine the thrill," she said, "of seeing your humdrum self played by a lovely creature like that. Tell me all about her." Naturally I told her you were a hag in disguise, and the whole thing was done with mirrors. I won't make you blush by repeating what I really said.

Anyway, they were mad about the picture and you, and you'll just have to come here some day, because they'll feel abused, and I'll feel guilty till you do. Guilty or not, though, I've had a swell time as your scrub team, and at this moment am being paged for a ride. The horse champs at the gate, so I've got to fly. Never mind, dear. If the chance ever comes, I'll get you to sub for me. Then you can feel guilty—thinking how I should be in your shoes!

Affectionately,

They are made by De Gez, the New York tailor. His staple is the dark blue suit.

As for the bow ties which he is credited with restoring to popular favor, he began wearing them for a gag, discovered that they nettled his boss (and good friend), Jack Warner, and settled down to wearing nothing but bow ties.

He goes to night clubs by spurts, gets surfeited and swears he's through with them. He'll avoid them for as long as a month, after which it's the old routine all over again.

Most Hollywood stars would almost prefer to be caught chiselling on their income tax return rather than admit that classical music bores them. Flynn is very straightforward about it. Heavy music tends to make him heavy, which is a condition he'd just as soon skip. He's the nonchalant, light-hearted one, he is. No jive fancier, he likes his jazz "subdued and conservative."

He loves to watch good dancers, but only when they're not annoyingly aware that they're good. His specialty is the rumba. "I definitely like to be flattered," is how he answers the question: "Who are your favorite dancing partners?"

He is quite a connoisseur of foods, heavy on the garlic. At home his kitchen reeks with garlic at dinner time.

"I have it in everything but my strawberry short cake," he says.

Pressed duck, all kinds of game and sea food, Hawaiian style, are his favorite dishes. He gets by with a minimum breakfast, a light lunch, and makes quite a ritual out of dinner which he generally has at Dave Chasen's establishment on Beverly Drive. He likes Chasen's for two reasons: the good food and the Finnish baths which Chasen's friends are allowed to use as a house courtesy. Those baths do double duty. They keep the Flynn figure, recently picked by the experts as Hollywood's finest, at the desired 178 pounds, and they serve as backdrop for his daily reading. High up on the top tier, reserved for none but the brave, Flynn sits reading newspapers and magazines while steam swirls around his head.

He hates exercise as exercise. He's bad at golf, excellent at tennis. He has never finished out of the money in the movie colony tennis tournaments. He's a better rider than Gene Autry, but except for the times when he is leading the charge of the light brigade on his favorite mount, Onyx, he stays on terra firma.

This past winter he discovered skiing, plunged into the sport with typical Flynn enthusiasm, spent 12 hours daily climbing up and down mountains in the environs of Sugar Bowl Lodge (above Reno), and came home nights so tired that he would fall asleep over the dessert at dinner.

No important man in Hollywood sets less store by other important men, as such, than does Errol Flynn. His close friends are few, include no star except Bruce Cabot, whose home he occupied during Cabot's absence last winter and with whom he has perpetrated many a wassail. His buddy is a soft-spoken, stunt man from Dixie with the demeanor of a football coach and the left-hook of a professional leather-pusher. Other friends are Mr. and Mrs. Bud Ernst (formerly Gwynne Pickford, Mary's niece); Charles K. Feldman, his agent; "Big Boy" Williams, the character actor; and Johnny Meyer, the Warner press agent.

John Barrymore he regards with a sort of hero worship, mostly because Barrymore, like Flynn, regards laughter as the best defense against life. He is Barrymore's best audience, roars when John lifts that eloquent finger.

When he roisters, he roisters wholeheartedly. The Flynn roistering is neither weakness nor obsession. It is an impulse, easily checked, always in hand. He is not fond of hard liquor, tolerates chiefly Scotch. He is a fancier of wines—burgundy and port.

Fond of horseplay, he cannot abide rudeness.

"I set as great store by the little politenesses as I do by a soft bed to sleep in and a good lamp to read by," he said on one occasion.

well manor-ed . . .

He loathes all card games but gin rummy, plays poker rarely and disastrously, detests (but doesn't know) bridge and has "an adamant attitude against learning the game." He shoots dice every now and then, but his heart is never in the game. He calls crap-shooting "gruelling."

He likes to fly, is an excellent pilot. He doesn't fly because he has no license. He just didn't bother to log all his solo hours aloft. He drives a very fast green Cadillac roadster, a custom-built, $6,000 item with seats that fold back into beds.

Despite the fact that he himself has said in a light-hearted moment that "there is no justification whatsoever for labor," he is one of the most hard-working men on the Warner lot.

"Acting doesn't come naturally to me, so I have to work hard," he explains.

Always wary of meeting strangers, on the set he is inclined to be especially tense, prefers to do his turns without the benefit of spectators, finishes a scene and heads for his dressing room rather than horse around with the boys. His favorite director is Michael Curtiz who once told him:

"As an actor, you are a bum. I know why you get such a big salary. Your profile is disgustingly beautiful."

Flynn laughed so loud that Curtiz felt self-conscious. He blushed when Flynn called around at noon and took him to lunch.

Once more a bachelor after being married six years to Lili Damita, Flynn lives in a brand new manor house on a hill sloping toward the San Fernando Valley and overlooking the studio for whom he is eternally rescuing Olivia de Havilland (he married her in four pictures) at $250,000 per annum minus tax. In the distance are the Sierra Nevada Mountains which doubtless delight nature-loving Flynn who is an authority on Irish birds. Mulholland Farms, as the manor is called, is rimmed by a white rail fence, comprises a modest five acres, over which there rambles a brace of peacocks. The house (California colonial) is neither large nor lordly. The porch, a covered terrace the floor of which is lined with flagstones, looks out over the oval swimming pool. From the living room, a solid row of French doors leading to the terrace, Squire Flynn can squint at the great Vega and Lockheed aircraft plants busy turning out planes that will crush Hitler.

The motif is simplicity, and the tone modest. Flynn hates show, even as he hates show-offs.

Number One Boy at Mulholland Farms is Max Carmel, an Austrian, who served 12 years in the United States army. Max has long since given up trying to instill in Flynn a military man's instinct for order. There was a time when Max worried himself sick wondering whether Flynn would get up in time for his 7 o'clock calls at the studio. Flynn, miraculously enough, has never overslept. Flynn would like to change the sentence around so it will read: "he has never slept." Four or five hours of fitful sleeping is enough for Flynn who rebels at the very thought of snoozing the proverbial eight hours.

"What! Sleep away one-third of my life with Death lurking around the corner! Ridiculous!"

No gadabout, he spends three nights of every week at home, devotes two of these to writing, one to reading. He's writing a commentary on Hollywood which, despite his inscription that it's been written with malice toward none and amusement for all, will blister the hide off many good Hollywoodians.

Toward money he exhibits what he calls a "mal-inspired attitude," whatever that means.

"I find it a completely unembraceable medium, as far as I'm concerned personally," he says. "I am the worst business man in the world although I must confess that it took years to convince me of this. With me saving begins methodically and ends in chaos."

Every week Flynn's business manager sends his client a weekly statement which his client religiously avoids examining. As of now, Flynn, who is addicted to what he refers to as a "very airy habit of making broad gestures," is on an allowance of $50 weekly.

He hates hats, pillows, dowagers and overbearing people. He loves people who've never heard of Hollywood (and consequently Errol Flynn), ballerinas, New York and practical jokes which he plays even on his boss Jack Warner. His great ambition is to write a book that stenographers would enjoy reading. He would like for an epitaph on a tombstone "They read my stuff."

He has no fondness for evening clothes, jewels or perfume—on Errol Flynn. He spells badly, is eternally tardy and forgets names instantly. He dotes on caviar, detests crêpes suzettes.

He says, speaking of the bachelor life:

"It's truly marvelous to have arrived at a state of mental equilibrium."

He most emphatically does not plan to get married—not in a hurry, anyway!

a man going out and picking a hat for his mother-in-law! The way he found room for his trains at the new house.

Dave didn't care what kind of house they bought. As long as the backyard was big enough for his railroad. Next to people and music, he loves trains. His first and only locomotive ride was to Dave what Christmas is to a kid, with the circus thrown in. It happened in the spring, when Judy made her tour of the army camps, and Dave's bosses at Mutual-Don Lee gave him time off to go with her—a kind of belated honeymoon.

In Texas they got permission to travel a hundred and twenty miles with the engineer. After twenty miles of rattling, swaying and fire-roaring, Judy yelled: "Let me out of here." A hundred miles later her husband joined her. She recognized him by the teeth, gleaming in a grin of pure bliss. The rest of him was black.

Dave's house in the valley, where he'd lived before marriage, was fine for the trains but not so good for Judy, as the single bedroom boasted a single closet. Since both were working, they could snatch only minutes for house-hunting and must have looked at a hundred and fifty. When the house was nice, there was no room for the trains. When there was room for the trains, the house was horrible.

At last, tired out, they compromised on an old place in Brentwood. They could do it over. There was a gully behind. They could fill it in. At a somewhat exaggerated estimate, all this would take ten years and cost eighty million dollars. The real estate agent came over with the papers. "By the way," she said as Judy, pen in hand, was about to sign, "there's a house that just came on the market this morning—"

The bride turned white. "If I never have a pretty house in my life, I won't look at another."

"Come on," Dave coaxed. "It'll only take fifteen minutes—"

They walked in, and that was it. So entranced was Judy that she forgot the trains. Not till the deal was sewed up that night did it dawn on her that she'd been a bad wife. "Look, Davy—that cliff behind the house—. Oh, Davy, where will you put the trains?"

"I'll move the cliff."

"You'll what?"

"Move the cliff back six feet. That'll just give me room."

He did, too. Or rather, four colored men did. They arrived at six every morning, looking like the Hall-Johnson choir and sounding like anything but. For four weeks the Roses were blasted from slumber by the din of riveting machines. But the trains got in.

Judy never knew you could get to love a house as you do a person—every beam and corner. It's a modern house, full of light and color—chintz-hung walls, blue-carpeted floors, the living room gay in coral and silver and canary yellow. She always wanted a bedroom with a fireplace and a big bay window, and that's what she's got. Dave always wanted a workroom where he could spill ink and ashes uninhibited—maybe even grind cigarettes out and still keep his good name. So Judy had one bedroom laid with black linoleum—then to surprise him and for an extra fillip, had a music staff painted in red across the floor.

She's learning to cook. It used to be that when Mrs. Gilmore heard her daughter's plaintive "What you doing today, Mom?" over the phone, she'd realize it was maid's day off and pick up her cue.

"Nothing special. Want to come up for dinner?" Even the best breaded chicken grows monotonous, and Judy's sole culinary accomplishment was fudge.

Now the picture's changing. It started at the Blackstone Hotel in Chicago, where they made the revolutionary discovery that eggs can be scrambled without butter. It's done, not with mirrors, but a double boiler. Since butter in any form is poison to Dave, Judy cajoled the chef out of the recipe and tried it when they got home. Her eyes followed Dave's first forkful into his mouth. "Does it taste like the Blackstone?"

"Better."

That started her on a program of expansion. Her mother's phone rings at half hour intervals. "I've got it in the oven, and it's this color. What happens next?"

One night she phoned at nine thirty. "Mom, how do you fix steak and French fries?"

"Haven't you had any dinner?"

"No, we weren't hungry."

"Where's Louise?" (She's the cook of the moment.)

"In her room, reading."

"Have you steak in the house?"

"Dave's going down. What kind shall he get?"

She told them to get a New York cut. Even if they ate it raw, it couldn't hurt them much.

icebox orgies . . .

Dave's eating habits are strange and wonderful. He'll have a hamburger at six, no dinner and pie à la mode at nine, topped by a chocolate float. Chocolate floats are his passion. To milk, ice cream and Hershey's chocolate, he adds Pepsi-Cola, then goes back to his room, starts writing small notes and gets nervous indigestion. Judy comes running with the Alka Seltzer. She hates to protest, thinks she hasn't been married long enough. Anyway, it's no use. No chocolate float tonight, he promises. Fifteen minutes later he's mixing one in the kitchen. So it's better if she goes down and mixes it. At least she doesn't put so much stuff in.

There's also a concoction known as the Rose Special. Mrs. Gilmore was invited to partake one night. After watching them spread smoked salmon on a slice of rye, chopped onions on the salmon, tomato on the onions and cheese on the tomato, she said thanks just the same, but she'd have some hot chocolate.

Neither has a grain of sense about money. Judy gauges her bank account by the number of checks in her book, and there are always more books where that came from. Her mother finally took over and calmed her down. Dave's brother Harry handled his business affairs till he was called into service, leaving Dave helpless. He cast longing glances in Mrs. Gilmore's direction but wouldn't impose. She had equally admirable qualms about butting in.

"Dave's in an awful jam with his accounts," hinted Judy one day.

"Why don't you tell him to do thus-and-so?"

"Mom, would you tell him?"

"I'm not going to be one of those mother-in-laws—"

"Well, of course! We wouldn't want to unload his headaches on you, too—"

Mrs. Gilmore's supervising all the accounts now. The years, she trusts, will bring their own cure.

Her good offices were also enlisted in the help problem. To a succession of maids, Judy was a little girl they'd seen in the movies, and they walked all over her. Her own self-consciousness about giving orders didn't help. Neither did Dave. Dave would hire a gardener without the formality of finding out whether he could garden and pay whatever he asked because the poor guy doubtless needed the dough. He'd amble into the kitchen to consult the chauffeur about his evening's plans and change his own if they interfered with the chauffeur's. Which was nice but led to complications.

So Mrs. Gilmore found Rose and Manley—"the most wonderful couple," says Judy with fervor, "anybody ever had." They refer to her as the Mrs., which delights her soul. Gentle, kindly colored folk, they combine a protective tenderness for her nineteen years with proper regard for her dignity as a married woman. They don't consider it unreasonable that she should ask to have her hats stuffed with tissue, or wood laid ready to burn in the fireplaces. Nor does she mind being babied by Rose and Manley. If Rose lets slip an occasional "darlin'," that's fine, as long as she throws in "the Mrs." once in a while. And when they fixed her a bowl of colored eggs for Easter, she wanted to hug them.

They're off on Sundays, so Judy drives down to Beverly for the kind of coffee cake Dave likes, comes home and gets breakfast—orange juice, toast and coffee, eggs à la Blackstone or waffles, which she's just mastered. Conversation lags while she buries herself in the funnies and Dave in the rest of the paper. Then she washes the dishes—the Mr. will have no part of them—and cleans house. Making her own beds, running the vacuum over her own carpets is Judy's idea of a whale of a good time.

Maybe the family comes over in the afternoon. The Rosebushes are lucky in their in-laws. Mrs. Gilmore's one in ten thousand. Dave's mother and wife form a mutual adoration society. Judy started by calling her Mom Rose, then changed to Eva at Eva's invitation. Till lately Dave didn't call Mrs. Gilmore much of anything, because he didn't know what to call her. The first time he said Mom, it made Judy feel good.

Jimmy and Sue, her sisters, their husbands, Mr. Gilmore and baby Judelein complete the circle. Judelein takes possession of Dave. They lie in the sun, coloring pictures with crayons. But not for long. The baby is Dave's most appreciative passenger. Pretty soon the bell's clanging, the whistle's blowing, the smoke's belching, the train goes careening round the edge of the cliff, Davy in front, Judelein behind with his cap on wrong side foremost, the dogs racing alongside and barking their heads off.

Judy got sore at Dave once because of the trains. The only time since they were married. When he decided that the ideal spot for his stationary steam engine—a birthday gift from her—was his bathroom, she let it pass. Even when the engine spurted oil all over the place. After all, it was his bathroom. But they gave a party one day, and though it was pouring rain, the men decided to go out and run the trains. Dave handed out overalls. He keeps seven pairs on tap for just such contingencies. Presently they trooped back, happy host and guests, across the hall, up the stairs, while Judy's stricken eyes watched each pair of feet trail mud over the beautiful blue carpets.

"I don't think you should've done that," she told Dave. It didn't sound very formidable, but he looked sort of scared and her heart smote her. "I wouldn't care," she wailed, "if you'd just wipe your feet off."

From the supper table she was called to the phone by a wire. "Dear Mrs. Rose," read the operator. "I'm having a lovely time at your party, and I'll never track mud on your carpets again." It was signed Duh-vode, the silly version of David she sometimes uses, and by feminine logic, it made her feel like a pig.

That was their only big party. They'd rather have a few intimates in to listen to recordings or play games—Indications and gin rummy and Star Reporter. Sometimes they go to Charlie Foy's and take the girls—the girls being their respective mothers. Dave isn't much for dancing. His limit is usually one. If there's another man in the party, Judy gets a few more in. Otherwise she's content to just sit by and hold hands with her husband and enjoy the music.

But most of their evenings are spent at home. When Dave works, Judy sits with him for company and reads. Often he'll play a passage for her reaction. He respects her instinctive musical taste. If she makes a suggestion he likes, he'll use it. If not, he'll explain why it's no good. He never gets too absorbed to watch her and the clock. "You look tired. Better go to bed." She hates going to bed, but trots up obediently, lies wide-eyed for a while, hears Dave in the kitchen and trots down again just in time to swipe half of his Rose Special.

His ways with music never cease to astonish her. One night he was reading a symphonic score. "Gosh, this is beautiful!"

"What do you mean this is beautiful? Can you hear it?"

She made him promise to teach her to read. That lasted about two weeks. Driving along, he'd quiz her. "What's the note on the third line of the G-clef?" Then she started "Me and My Gal," and the whole thing was off. She vows she's going to learn though—from one of those old men like David Warfield in "The Music Master," who charges fifty cents a lesson and knows his stuff. Dave says when you know what the orchestra's playing, when you hear a chord and can recognize it as a G-seventh diminished, it's like a whole great new world opening—mutual fans . . .

They steer clear of each other's workshops. He feels he doesn't belong on her set, and she feels the same way about his broadcasting studio. Like any layman, she tunes in to hear him, and he sees her pictures when they're released. She did go along, though, when he made his first Victor recordings two months ago. This was a goal she'd long set her heart on. Dave was pleased but contained. Judy was in a dither. The first record he made was a waltz he'd written for her and asked her to name. "Our Waltz" she named it, and it's sort of their theme song. The recordings were super. He's going to do an Academy Award Album for Victor, the winners of the last eight years. As for Judy's pictures, he doesn't say much. They're neither of them ravers. When he squeezes her hand, she knows he liked it—really an awful lot.

He's finicky about her clothes—a little harsh, she calls him. "You look all right, but the shoes are wrong—" or "I don't like the hairdress." Loud colors are taboo, he doesn't mind slacks if they're well tailored, on hats she can go overboard—the crazier, the better. Imagine a man like that!

About once a month he comes home with a huge box, which he dumps on her bed. They're both diffident about handing out gifts, feel silly watching the other open them, so they sort of sneak 'em in. Judy's big box holds a dozen little ones—a silly doll he's picked up, perfume, a lapel gadget, bath powder, a cute little lipstick. Once she found a bathtray all set up pretty as you please in her tub.

Before they were married, they'd hang on the phone for hours. Ten minutes after a long confab about nothing, Dave would call again. "Whom do you love?"

"You."

It's abbreviated now. Dave comes in and says, "Whom?"

"You," says Judy.

SO LONG, BUTTON-NOSE

half an hour each evening before going to bed, she could keep things under control. In front of the checkbook, methodical Reagan pasted their charity list—on the tenth a check to so-and-so, on the 15th to such-and-such. Ronnie remembers everything. Jane sometimes forgets. To remind herself, she promised she'd leave notes to herself all over the house. One thing she always forgets is to have the cars lubricated. He put a big sign up in the garage. "LUBRICATION AT SUCH AND SUCH A MILEAGE."

Each kept up a show of spirits for the other. Alone, Jane drove herself, so she wouldn't have time to think. Luckily, she had a goal to drive toward, something tangible to do for Ronnie.

Two weeks earlier they'd moved into their new house, with the bare essentials for living. The rest they'd planned to do at their leisure. Now Jane resolved that Ronnie should see it finished. The idea of his leaving a naked house seemed somehow pitiful and more than she could bear. If she and Connie Rennick, her decorator, could get the stuff in, then at least he could give it the once-over, and whatever he didn't like, they could change later. And he wouldn't have to wonder, poor lamb, what his home looked like.

To make it harder, this was all to be sprung on him at a surprise party the day before he left. She and Connie worked like mad. People with samples of this and that beat a path to her dressing room door at Twentieth. They all vowed to deliver the goods not before twelve-thirty nor after three on Saturday the 18th. They all kept their word.

Jane's picture wound up on Wednesday. Ronnie was still "Desperate Journeying" on Thursday—with Errol Flynn, Alan Hale and Arthur Kennedy. There was something calculated in Hale's joviality that day. After every crack, he'd throw a glance Ronnie's way to see if he was laughing. At lunch in the commissary he went around laying bets that the war would be over by Christmas. There was one point at which Ronnie quit grinning. When they told him his scenes might stretch into Friday. "I'm through stretching," he said with finality. "The last two days are for Mamma."

On Friday there were business things to take care of—papers to sign, a small checking account to open that would see him through till his officer's pay started. He and Jane spent the evening at home. Her hardest job was to tell him that Twentieth had called her back for retakes on Saturday afternoon. Button-nose the First blows up, she tells people off, her tongue can blister. This is largely because her nature craves open dealings, openly arrived at. By the same token, she hates a lie and all but foundered over the first she'd ever told her husband.

By pre-arrangement, Irving Kaplan phoned. He and Betty, his wife, are Jane's oldest and dearest friends and, with Bob Cobb, proved invaluable co-plotters. "I hear Jane's working tomorrow. Bob wants us to lunch at the Derby with him, and take in the ball game."

Ronnie said he might as well. Jane got him out of the house by twelve. At twelve-thirty the procession, headed by Connie, started. Drapes were hung, rugs laid, lamps connected, furniture placed. Tearing round, Jane breathed a prayer of thanksgiving for Bob and Irving.

After the game they lured Ronnie to Bob's house. "Look," he said, "I'd like to go see my wife and kid, do you mind?" Irving dashed to the phone and reported that Jane wasn't in yet. They started on war and politics, themes on which Ronnie is generally good for the night. That held him till six-thirty, when he headed for the phone.

"I just this minute got home," said Jane, and to ease her conscience, threw in a truth with the lie. "I'm dirty and tired and have to get dressed. You stay with the boys till I call you."

"I've seen you dirty and tired before," he said mildly, "but if that's how you want it—"

For once in their lives the guests were all on time. This party of Jane's for Ronnie had to be perfect—the first in their new home, the last she'd give till the war was over. She'd told them to dress informally, since Ronnie would be coming from a ball game. The boys drove him up at seven-thirty. Not till he saw the cars did he get an inkling.

"What's all this about?"

"Oh, I guess Rennick's with Jane."

"Rennick and sixteen Cadillacs, that's fine."

Pat O'Brien—the love of Ronnie's life, Jane calls him—pulled the door open and they all yelled surprise! and he stood taking them in—the Jack Bennys and Stanwyck and Taylor and Sheridan and Brent and Charlie Einfeld and all their good friends in a beautifully appointed room which had been little more than a barracks that morning, and Button-nose over on the sidelines, grinning tremulously.

The first hubbub over, he tracked her down to the kitchen. "I swear I could cry—"

"Don't do that, Ronnie. Just say you forgive me for the fib. It's the first and last, but I had to work things out somehow."

"What fib?" he asked against her hair.

They wound up at one in the den with an old-fashioned singing bee. Ann Sheridan gave Ronnie a St. Christopher. Kissing her forehead, he whispered: "Don't forget Janey while I'm away."

Sunday was awful. Like some baleful spirit, 9:46—the time of the train's departure from Glendale—peered at Jane from every corner. She was torn between wanting to hang on to Ronnie tight and wishing that the wrench of parting were over. After that minute, things couldn't get worse, so they'd have to get better. She might have gone up to San Francisco with him, but they'd voted against it. The military hadn't taken him into its confidence. He knew he'd be at Ft. Mason the first day, and that was all he knew.

They were alone only for breakfast. The families—Ronnie's mother, brother and sister-in-law, Jane's mother and sister—came to lunch and spent most of the afternoon. When they'd said their goodbys and gone, it was time to pack. That didn't take long. Boots and uniforms, socks, underwear and shaving kit. The leather brush-case Jane had given him. The case to match from his stand-in, with dictionary, address book and writing materials. The baby helped with the packing—an enchanting game invented by Dada for her amusement. He'd hand her a sock and she'd roam, dropping it where the fancy seized her.

graphs of Maureen. She also extracted from among his belongings an enormous print of one of their wedding pictures. "Where will you keep it?" she asked sweetly. "On the horse's tail?" and substituted a smaller one. For which he has since found cause to be grateful.

As usual, Maureen was bathed and fed at six. As usual, she stayed up till seven to play with her father. As usual, he hugged her, kissed the top-knot on which he's been known to tie a mean bow, and stuck her in the crib. If he departed from routine, it was only to stand there an extra moment, to plant an extra kiss on the soft cheek. "So long, Button-nose," he said and went.

Downstairs the farewells were damper. Goldie, the cook, wept. Fay, the maid, wept. Jane stood by dry-eyed, while Ronnie consoled them with pats. "Take care of Mrs. Reagan and the baby while I'm gone."

"Yes, sir," they wailed.

One long look at the house, to stamp it on his memory, before he drove off. They called for Lou and ate at the Brown Derby on Los Feliz, which is halfway to Glendale. Jane slipped her hand into Ronnie's and let the men do the talking. Later, at the station, she was glad that the train stopped for only four minues, limiting the agony. Lou had left them alone. "You two have things to say to each other—"

And suddenly there was nothing to say and they were clinging together and the guy was yelling "All aboard," and Ronnie was on the platform waving, and then he was gone.

Jane hasn't shed tears in five years but, driving home in the seat lately warmed by Ronnie, her eyes grew blind with them. The harder she mopped, the faster they came, so finding herself a menace to traffic, she turned down a side street, shut off the motor and cried her heart out as she hadn't dared cry while Ronnie was there.

Goldie, with a long face, was waiting up for her. "You feel bad, don't you, ma'am? Would you like me to fix you a drink?" Poor Goldie couldn't understand why Jane's only answer was a wild look after which her head went down on her knees and her shoulders shook.

Uneasily Goldie approached. "Are you laughin' or cryin', ma'am?"

"How," asked a strangled voice, "are you supposed to tell?"

She didn't sleep well that night, but was all right next morning. Though the house is lonely, she doesn't brood. She does heave a sigh of relief though, once the baby's asleep. Maureen misses her father. She thinks he's playing her favorite hiding game and goes hunting for him in all the corners he used to pop out of. Not finding him, she knocks at his dressing room door. "Dada?" she calls. Which doesn't make things easier for her mother. "But that's fine," says Jane. "I'd hate her not to miss him."

Ronnie needn't have worried about her social life. Their friends, if she'd let them, would keep her busy every night. The one thing she won't do is go out with men. Ronnie has bachelor friends who'd be glad to take her, and Ronnie would be glad to have her taken. But she knows her Hollywood. "Let me walk into a night club, and some guy on the press who doesn't like me—and there are many such," says Don't-Kid-Yourself Wyman—"is going to take a crack at me. Well, Ronnie has enough to handle without being bothered by that kind of truck."

They write each other every night. Once in a while Jane phones—not often—they feel it's a form of self-indulgence that shouldn't be overdone in times like these. "Want to say hello to your kid?" And hearing his voice, his kid will gurgle, clap hands, dance a jig, go straight through her bag of tricks, under the delusion that her dada can see her.

As this is written, he's still in San Francisco. If he's there when she gets her first week-end off, Jane will go up. Meantime, she works, keeps the books posted, the car lubricated, plays hide-and-seek with the kid and rejects sympathy.

"Naturally, if he went ten miles away, I'd miss him. But what business have I got to squawk? Every woman who's losing her guy feels the same way."

Then the jaw juts out in grim determination. "Besides, I'm betting with Alan Hale. Now that Ronnie's in the army, it's bound to be over by Christmas."

But there was a feeling among stage folk that you could find kids easier to work with than brash, cocky young George. He had the conceit of a king. He knew he was good and never hesitated to tell you so.

From the night he made his first smash hit, as "Peck's Bad Boy," there was no holding him. He acted and talked like a star. If only Jerry Cohan had been the kind to warm the lad's britches—

But Jerry wasn't, not quite. The Cohans were so close together that, in the eyes of one, none of the others really could do wrong. True, there were occasions when if Georgie had behaved a little better, big Broadway managers would have billed the act. True, their stage acquaintances kept muttering that Jerry and Nellie and Josie could go far if they cut the loudmouth adrift. Yet the Four Cohans never even considered becoming Three Cohans. The mere notion was sacrilege. Years sped away.

It was backstage in Buffalo, after a performance in which he'd played Nellie's father, that George—grown up, now—met Mary (Joan Leslie).

She was a pretty thing, young and shy and with a burning ambition to become an actress. She had a low sweet voice, and from the moment George heard it he believed in her. That was why, when the Cohans next tackled New York, on one of those campaigns for Broadway which George's boastfulness always managed to defeat, Mary came along.

He had a show of his own to peddle, this trip. Score, book and lyrics all by George M. Cohan! Of course he thought it was terrific.

One thing about Mary was that she thought so, too. Patient and brave and confident, she made the rounds of managerial offices with him. They started at the top. They ended at the bottom, which was Goff (Chester Clute) & Dietz (George Tobias).

And even there, George's masterpiece was cold-shouldered. All his spirited plugging of its numbers, all Mary's sweet-voiced rendering of its songs, couldn't put it over. Goff & Dietz weren't buying.

In bleak discouragement, George returned to the boarding house where the Cohan family was weeks behind in rent. Like a whispering chorus, now, everything everyone always had said kept taunting him. George was the sore thumb in the outfit! Plenty of jobs for the others, without George! Three Cohans could eat again, if the fourth Cohan——

Putting over the lie he had to sell them was one of the most brilliant bits of acting in George's versatile career. But they had faith in him. They, alone of all the world, could believe his show had sold and was to hit Broadway in a few months. They, alone, could be deceived into accepting his suggestion that the three of them take another whirl on the road as a trio while he stuck in town for rehearsals.

After he'd seen them off at the station, a lonely and dispirited George dropped into Rector's—where the theater's big shots congregated—for one last gesture before he faced facts. And there, disguised as a young man and an old man, Fame and Fortune were waiting.

They didn't know they were waiting for anyone. They thought they were holding a conference of their own, as to why the old man (whose name was not Fortune, but Lawrence Schwab) should back the new melodrama written by the young man (whose name was not Fame, but Sam Harris). Harris (Richard Whorf) had a good many reasons. Schwab (S. Z. Sakall) could see none of them. Schwab wanted girls. He wanted lights. He wanted music and laughter.

George, shamelessly listening, intruded himself upon the conversation like a bomb exploding. He had a musical, didn't he? If that was what was wanted, well—It didn't take Harris long to catch on. A partnership was formed with a mere handshake.

They didn't even stop to ask each other's names till afterward.

So the desperate lie became a dazzling truth. "Little Johnny Jones," turned down all over Broadway because it waved the stars and stripes so shamelessly, became the hit of the country. Schwab provided the gorgeous girls, a theater, the costumes. Harris provided the genius for staging.

George? George provided the songs, the script—and George M. Cohan to sing them to the world so the world sat up and begged for more!

Sam and he had names for themselves by next season, when it was time to do another show. And George had a dream. He wrote a song for Mary into the new score, and called it by her name. When they had the amazing luck to land the great Fay Templeton (Irene Manning) as their star, and she insisted on taking that hit number herself, his heart all but broke.

He took Mary the loveliest roses he could find, trying to make it up to her. But right in the middle of apologizing, he suddenly was telling her he loved her and asking her to marry him. . . .

Templeton was glorious. She had only to step into a spotlight, gown and jewels and smile all glittering, to bring an audience to its feet. And in "Forty-Five Minutes From Broadway," she was singing Cohan songs. America was wild for them. The dam of the lean years had burst.

Abe Erlanger (George Barbier), one of the shrewdest men in show business, described George M. as "the whole darn country squeezed into one pair of pants." His writing, his music, even the way he walked and talked, touched something deep in the hearts of people everywhere. He had found the mainspring in the Yankee clock and touched it every time a curtain rose.

George brought back the family from the road and starred the Four Cohans on Broadway at last. "George Washington, Junior," was as solid a smash as the earlier Cohan-Harris offerings. Upward and upward they spun.

Only once did they fail, and that was with George's one arty attempt to write a serious drama. He apologized in the papers, to the people he had let down with a play as bad as "Popularity."

But nothing on any stage in Creation could touch the drama which burst suddenly upon the world with a roll of cannon grimmer than any orchestra drums. The Lusitania had been torpedoed! The country was plunged into sudden, blasting war! George was one of the first in line at the recruiting office, to answer the appeal for volunteers.

They turned him down. They turned him down, the greatest dancer on the American stage, because he had flat feet.

Futility steeped in his heart as he stumbled out onto Broadway again—unwanted, still a civilian. A band was playing. A bugle note rose high, calling for soldiers "over there." George's lips puckered. He began to imitate the bugle's trill. "Over there—OVER THERE—"

It was the greatest song the war produced, his "Over There." Nora Bayes (Frances Langford), top vaudeville singer of the day, introduced it at Camp Merritt for the soldiers—with George to help her. It swept the country like a forest fire, igniting every heart it touched. It leapt across scarred fields of battle. It was a hymn of a fighting country, its pledge of high courage, its anthem of victory.

Then peace again. Peace, and more great successes.

But the whirlwind speed of the cyclone was slowing. It had to slow. George wasn't a boy, any longer. The years were flowing on, inexorably. Jerry and Nelly Cohan both were dead. Josie, too, after years of retirement and happy marriage. Things weren't the same without them.

After his hit in "Ah, Wilderness!" therefore, the last of the Four Cohans broke up his great partnership with Sam Harris. He and Mary had their fireside, their memories—and a lot to look forward to, as well. Things there hadn't been time for, on the wild upward rush. Quiet, gentle, peaceful hours to share.

He came back once, to play Franklin Roosevelt in "I'd Rather Be Right." But the rest was stillness and content and a slow savoring of those riches of living which had stored up inside his heart and Mary's. He hadn't thought he would live to see the world in flames again. He was getting old. If war must be, the fight was for the young and strong.

Yet only a few weeks ago, in a great Eastern city, a grey-haired man stood with the crowd beside a curb and watched long columns of the infantry of the United States swing by.

He was the only man in the throng who didn't burst into remembering song as the band blared near. But its martial strains had caught at his heart in a way no one else could understand. It wasn't a tired song! It wasn't an old song! Young men were singing it proudly, as they marched beneath their streaming flags of stars and stripes.

The song was "Over There."

to her de luxe model! Jimmy rehearsed the complicated Cohan dance routines for four solid months running before he attempted them before the kliegs . . . Dancing coach, Johnny Boyle, known as the greatest heel-and-toe perfectionist who ever tapped a toe, wore him down to a frazzle. Johnny's broken ankle didn't stop him—he beat out the rhythm with his fingers and palms on a table—and Cagney jounced on! Jimmy himself's a stickler for realism. Works in front of a gigantic plate glass reflector, 12 feet wide and 20 feet high, so he won't miss a trick. The mirror, which is shifted around the set with him, is an old one he used

"I was a Wife in name only"

A NEGLECTED WIFE REGAINS HER HAPPINESS BY OVERCOMING HER "ONE NEGLECT"

1. Our marriage started out like a story-book romance. We were so head-over-heels in love. But soon my romance faded. Jim's love turned to cold indifference. I suffered agonies.

2. Mrs. M. dropped in one morning and caught me crying. She dragged the whole sad story out of me. "My dear," she said, "don't mind my frankness—you see, I used to be a Registered Nurse, and I understand your trouble. So many wives lose their husbands' love because of carelessness about feminine hygiene.

3. "Our head physician set me straight," continued Mrs. M. "He advised his women patients to use Lysol for intimate personal care. Lysol, you see, is a powerful germicide; used according to easy directions, it kills all vaginal germ-life on instant contact . . . yet can't harm sensitive tissues. It cleanses and deodorizes, too."

4. I've used Lysol for feminine hygiene ever since—with never the slightest worry about its effectiveness. Lysol is so economical—it never dents my budget. And—oh, yes, Jim is once more "that way" about me—and am I happy!

Why you can depend on Lysol

GENTLE YET POWERFUL—Used as directed, Lysol is gentle to delicate tissues (not an acid—no free alkali), yet there is no germ-life in the vaginal tract that Lysol will not kill on instant contact. SPREADING—No other widely advertised douche preparation has the wide spreading power Lysol has—Lysol solution virtually searches out germ-life in tiny folds other liquids may never reach. ECONOMICAL—Small bottle makes almost 4-gallons solution. CLEANLY ODOR—Soon disappears. HOLDS STRENGTH to last drop—play safe with Lysol.

years ago . . . In his first appearance in the film, he's positively unrecognizable in his 70-year-old make-up. Bet you ardent devotees have to look twice to spot him!

The story itself is an accurate record of the life and times of Cohan, from his birth in Providence, R. I., on July 4, 1878, up to the present. Several studios had long been dickering with George M. for rights to use his story, and Warners' were jubilant when they clinched the sale! Cohan cannily reserved rights to pass judgment on casting and screen play presentation, thought Cagney was just the ticket for the part . . . Cohan's sidekick in several musicals, William Collier, Sr., was called in as special consultant and made the picture live with his vast store of anecdotes . . . During Cohan's remarkable career, he wrote and produced 35 to 40 plays, penned more than 500 songs and musical numbers and had a hand in more than 125 other theatrical attractions! Consequently, the studio had a tough time judging which scenes to include. Highlights they couldn't pass up include "Little Johnny Jones," his first Broadway effort, "Popularity," his first big flop, and "I'd Rather Be Right," which sent him back to Broadway after retirement, in 1940 . . . Song hits you'll gulp over are "Give My Regards to Broadway," "I'm a Yankee Doodle Boy," "So Long, Mary," "You Remind Me of My Mother," "Harrigan" and a batch of other heart-renders.

Make-up problems were a headache, what with the story starting in 1878 and running up to the 1940's. When Joan Leslie's 17th birthday rolled around, she had advanced to a 50-year-old in the script, celebrated the day in a white-wig and wrinkled puss! Fellow players gifted her with an heirloom bracelet at the impromptu birthday party they cooked up. Everyone heartily devoured four festive cakes, donated by cast, working crew, Curtiz and studio execs. She practically burst into tears when Western Union messenger girls trooped in on the scene and warbled "Happy Birthday." The W. U. gals are the first to be pressed into local messenger service and are quite a treat about town. Joan says she got her biggest bang out of her mom's gift—a sleek grown-up party gown by Orry-Kelly. It's her first bid to svelteness.

At least one defense bond per day was raffled off among cast and crew. On days of particularly big production numbers with huge choruses, two bonds were sold. By pic's end, thousands of dollars had gone into Uncle Sammy's coffers.

Flags needed for "You're A Grand Old Flag" number had to be specially ordered from a mill in San Francisco, cost Warner Bros. almost 4,000 smackers. Reason: supplies first available all bore the "Made in Japan" stamp . . . Two large theater stages were built on the sound stage to keep the cameras turning between scenes. All in all, 12 different theaters and a total of 285 sets were pictured, from the days of gaslights to chrome and colored "spots" . . . Last "silk and satin" chorus to be seen for the duration was filmed for "Little Johnny Jones" number. Studio searched far and wide for Hollywood's most gorgeous gals. Said Mike Curtiz, "We wanted to make it a typical Cohan line."

Twenty-two-month-old Patricia Lynn Martin plays Cohan on his first birthday. Her twin brother served as stand-in but didn't look quite enough like George.

Most dramatic spot of the picture is an introduction of "Over There" by Frances Langford. The scene's an exact reproduction of the original 1917 situation when it was presented at Camp Merritt, Long Island.

Eddie Foy, the most famous comedian of his time, is played by son Eddie, Jr. One of seven theatrical kids, he literally stepped into his pop's boots in this one—wore a pair of Sr.'s shoes in a dancing scene with Cagney. Said, "Comics have marshmallow hearts. Dad would have gotten a tremendous kick out of this."

"Yankee" did its part of Good-Neighboring, when members entertained Chilean ambassador to Colombia, Emilio Edwards Bello, on the set one day. He was impressed by Cagney.

Joan Leslie's drawn up a dream cast of 10 Irishmen she'd like to appear with in films. Cagney claims it was his influence that made her settle on the Irish! Anyway, here are Leslie's favored few: Cagney, Pat O'Brien, Thomas Mitchell, Errol Flynn, George Brent, Frank McHugh, Ronald Reagan, Regis Toomey, Edmund O'Brien and Pat Knowles.

to a lecture delivered by his older sister on the evils of weed wafting, its invariable result in stunting growth, and where was the kid's pride anyhow? . . . "So now I'm six feet three," he says. slapping the cheek of Science firmly. Just right for making good the Western Thriller way. Radio acting back in Arkansas was o.k. for Dick for a time, but who ever raved about a radio actor's looks? So it was Broadway for Our Boy and horse opreys to follow. All to groom him for biggers and betters, like his latest up-and-comer for Warners, "The Big Shot." Not bad for a fellow just turned twenty-five last April 17th. . . . No wonder the rumor mongers have him tangling up the heartstrings of any number of gals at once . . . not the least tangled of whom is Jimmy Cagney's sister Jeanne, so the gossips gossip . . . but Ritchie, point-blank faced with "How many times have you been in love?"—conducts a point-blank evasion, countering non-committally, "I call it madness." Still he wants to have nine kids some day, he says . . . five boys and four girls. Their some-day mother, he warns, will have to be a dame who's not at all subject to fits of fickleness . . . furthermore, he suggests that she be not "noisy in public" . . . adding, "Don't gush—shoot the sherbet." . . . too, she should realize before it's too late that Dick does nearly all his dialog rehearsing under the fierce trickle of a needle point shower. "I've had some complaints about my rehearsing," he admits. "Under the shower, naturally to hear myself I have to shout." . . . But the man has his moments of merriment, too. Funny, the way he relaxes. By talking shop. "I like to talk anyone's shop," he claims. "If he's a musician—music. A doctor, medicine. An author, writing. And it's especially interesting to talk shop when accompanied by a highball." Almost an extremist, Dick never does anything halfway . . . "Jezebel" was his favorite movie, "Jezebel" was a movie the like of which there was none such, "Jezebel" was GOOD . . . and so Dick went not once, not twice, not thrice, but six times to see "J-z-b-l." Travis, the artist, has sold poster art of his own when pinched . . . but prefers to spend his time collecting books and guns . . . Thinks Bette Davis is one of the swellest people in Hollywood because she made him feel so at home on "The Man Who Came To Dinner" sets . . . once had a crush on Barbara Stanwyck . . . chooses Katie Hepburn for his dream gal on a mythical desert island . . . often confesses there may be some truth in the cliché "There ain't no justice" . . . seems maybe there ain't—anymore—since William Justice changed his name to Richard Travis!

HOLLYWOOD DIARY

Mon., May 4th: Back at the grind after Universal-lunching with Deanna Durbin and Ida Zeitlin. Glad to see Deanna bright and cheerful. With Vaughn away she isn't always that way. Says she awoke yesterday feeling lonesome and miserable. Thought she had a long, dreary day ahead of her, till Judy Garland invited her to spend the afternoon and evening with herself and Dave. Judy knows what it's like to be separated from her husband. She's so cock-eyed in love she almost goes to pieces, herself, if anything parts her from her Davie.

Later. Hollywood, I love you! What other town offers service stations where you can get a rain check with every car wash! Had my little go-car shampooed at Marke C. Bloome, where they guarantee a re-wash if it rains within twenty-four hours. Talked to a couple of the boys about Bill Holden who was a steady customer at Bloome's before he enlisted. The boys are genuinely fond of Bill. They bought him a book for a going-away present.

I'm ready to bawl, too. Someone was just in with the news that my favorite actress lives on a hilltop not to enjoy the view, but because she's suffering from lung trouble.

Thurs., May 7th: Glenn Ford stopped by for a preview peek at the pictures Bob Beerman shot especially for Fredda Dudley's story (next issue). . . . While I had Glenn cornered, I pounded him with questions about Joan Crawford. But Glenn's a gallant lad. Says all statements should come from Joan. I asked if he bought her any presents when he returned from New York. He did, all right! A two pound box of caramels from Joan's favorite Fifth Avenue confectioner!

Tues., May 12th: Out to Metro's "Me and My Gal" set with Kaaren Pieck to interview Judy Garland. Found Judy lost to the world in "Bride of Glory," a new biography of Lady Hamilton. She was wearing an old-fashioned, long-bloomered bathing suit and a rubber-shirred bathing cap for the big "By

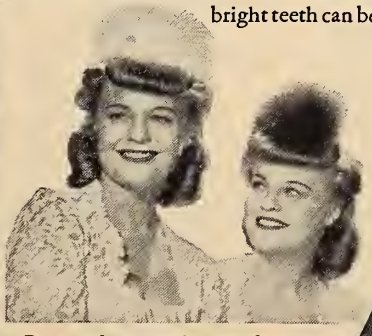
PEPSODENT POWDER makes teeth TWICE AS BRIGHT

Pretty Margaret and Marilyn Rick, Palatine, Illinois, Twins, chorus: "Pepsodent's really 'super'!"

"People always had a hard time telling us apart...in school, in the neighborhood, anywhere!

...But, say! After Margaret won the toss to see who'd use Pepsodent Powder, it was different! I chose another well-known brand, thinking there couldn't be very much difference."

"Did I learn about tooth powders! Our dentist was skeptical at first...then amazed ...when Pepsodent made Peg's teeth twice as bright as mine! He said he never saw anything like it! Neither did we! Pepsodent showed us how really bright teeth can be!"



...and the Rick Twins' Dentist says: "I was skeptical...Pepsodent's claims sounded too good. But, this test convinced me that Pepsodent's statement is accurate":

INDEPENDENT LABORATORY TESTS FOUND NO OTHER DENTIFRICE THAT COULD MATCH THE HIGH LUSTRE PRODUCED BY PEPSODENT. BY ACTUAL TEST, PEPSODENT PRODUCES A LUSTRE TWICE AS BRIGHT AS THE AVERAGE OF ALL OTHER LEADING BRANDS!

For the safety of your smile . . . use Pepsodent twice a day . . . see your dentist twice a year.

"Take a letter, Darling"

Jobless Tom Verney (Fred MacMurray) dubiously takes a job as combined secretary-escort to advt. magnate A. M. MacGregor (Rosalind Russell)—a gal, no less!

Mac warns at the outset that Tom's job is strictly business—to appease jealous wives while she plays up to would-be clients. In his artist's garret, Tom tries to convince pals it's on the level.

Against her will, Mac falls for Tom when he kisses her. Fast and furiously she delves into her world, a campaign for potential client Jonathan Caldwell (MacDonald Carey).

Mac faints when Caldwell (supporter of 4 ex-wives) cancels date because she's a gal. Later schemes to have Tom work on sister Caldwell, who has the final say on advertising.

Earning his $10,000 bonus, Tom clicks with Caldwell's sister Ethel (Constance Moore), drums up his own campaign with her in hopes of beating Mac at her own advertising-without-love game.

Caldwell, himself intrigued with Mac, encourages Tom's progress with Ethel as a jealousy come-on. Mac gets mad, instead declares she'll wed Caldwell. Tom blisters.

Tom leaves, telling Mac he'll collect his check for his work before he packs for Mexico. Following routine, Tom introduces Mac to maiden aunts as his no. 5. The aunts freeze up, cause a rift.

Mac quarrels with Caldwell when she finds she merely amuses him. Highway-ing home on foot, she hears a familiar voice proffering a lift to Mexico. It's Tom, and she accepts the hitch—for life!

the Sea" number she's been working in for the last few days. We talked till noon and then Judy slipped a dark-blue flannel robe over her costume, shook her hair free of the cap and led us to the commissary for lunch, Kaaren and I stowed thousands of calories away, but all Judy would have was a glass of milk. No wonder she's so thin!

After lunch drove out to see Jackie Cooper's new Sunset Towers apartment. It's a bedroom-living-room-dining-room affair. Not too opulent, but comfortable enough for any bachelor boy. While Jackie poured a Pepsi, I picked up a leather-bound autograph album lying on the table. Leafed through it but couldn't discover a single autograph! Jackie came back and chuckled. Said the album was a gift from his mother several years ago. When she gave it to him she told him to get the President's signature. Jackie lugged the book to Washington, recently, met Mr. Roosevelt, but forgot to ask for his autograph!

Fri., May 15th: Cynthia Miller's lunch-time interview with Jane Wyman at the Beverly Hills Brown Derby was the high spot on the calendar today. Jane breezed into the eatery wearing a tailored suit and sun glasses and clutching a handful of business letters. She'll personally handle the Reagans' finances while Ronnie's gone. Showed us a letter she had from Ronnie only this morning. It was full of the old Reagan pep and enthusiasm. There were long passages about Dr. Margaret Chung, the famous American-born Chinese woman surgeon he met in San Francisco. Dr. Chung, who is known as "Mother" to 475 leading American flyers, has "sons" winging over Germany, Australia, China and every far corner of the world. Ronnie can't be a "son," but he hopes she'll accept him into a separate unit she formed for friends of flyers. If he makes the grade, he'll be in the company of people like Helen Hayes, Bob Young and Cornelia Otis Skinner.

Wed., May 20th: There's no tonic like Ann Sheridan! Every time I feel low-down, I trot me out to see Annie, and come away feeling like a million. No wonder that guy Brent adores her! She's matchless! We got talking about Bryant Fleming, the young actor who's been re-christened Gig Young after the character he plays in "The Gay Sisters." We recalled that Anne Shirley took her name the same way, after appearing in "Anne of Green Gables." So much name talk reminded Ann of the time the "Oomph" title was slapped on her. As a publicity stunt, the studio went around asking famous people what they thought of Sheridan. When they came to Gypsy Rose Lee, The Gyp replied: "I think he was a great general!"

Left Annie and was surprised to see Jimmie Stewart appear from behind a sound stage. He's at the studio making service shorts. And just when Olivia's off the lot, under suspension!

Mon., May 25th: Spent the morning at Fox with Ann Rutherford, who's moved over from Metro. Ann's recovering from an attack of German measles and is keeping those big brown orbs behind dark glasses. She's a little embarrassed about having a kid's disease, but she needn't be. Brenda Marshall's in the same boat. Brenda caught them from her stand-in, Aloha Wray, and recuperated just in time to say good-by to Bill. If the boys at Fort MacArthur break out in a rash, I'll know why!

Ann was in fine fettle. She hired a new colored maid today, thereby settling a domestic problem. She doesn't know if the girl's any good or not. She didn't even check her references. But she couldn't resist her name—Cinderella Jones!

Wed., May 27th: To Universal where they're still talking about Priscilla Lane and the way she made enemies while working in the picture "Saboteur." Poor Priscilla! It really wasn't her fault. She has a habit of kidding dead-pan. Goes around saying shocking, insulting things without cracking a smile. People who don't know her think she's serious, and nothing she can do later will change their opinion of her.

Thurs., May 28th: Marie Wilson pranced in this A.M. Says she doesn't know why everyone is so unpleasant about Rita Hayward's ex, Eddie Judson. Town talk has it Judson married Rita just to make her a star and reap the benefits. Marie wishes someone would marry her that way and head her into a career like Rita's!

About Those Rumors . . .

'Tain't True: That the Bob Cummings will be heir-raided come Fall . . . That lovely Kaaren Verne was dropped by Warner Bros. because the studio wanted to give her a glamour buildup, and she preferred the company of a movie horror man . . . That Jeffrey Lynn had his film name legalized to keep it alive while he's in the Army. Real reason is Jeff always loathed his given tag, Ragnar; shuddered when folks called him "Rags" . . . That the Brent-Sheridan marriage is shattering. The pair are blissful.

'Tis True: That Humphrey Bogart will serve Coast Guard duty for a month, after he winds up "Across the Pacific" . . . That Orson Welles and Dolores Del Rio have called the whole thing off . . . That Betty Field is on the expecting list. Daddy-to-be is playwright Elmer Rice . . . That Howard Hughes is in millionaire's heaven since meeting Rita Hayworth.

Three Stars

Greer Garson, Joan Crawford and Ann Sothern may have been disappointed in marriage, but they certainly haven't been disillusioned by it. All three have visited the divorce courts at one time or another, but has that soured them on sweet romance? Indeed not!

Joan, who several months ago admitted to a reporter she "peered around corners looking for Mr. Right, same as any other girl," is currently enjoying nightly dinner dates with Glenn Ford. Queried about their friendship, Joan smiles vaguely and says nothing. However, we have it on good authority, she has already met Glenn's mother and, on Mrs. Ford's last birthday, sent her an exquisite bouquet of flowers. Not too long ago, such gestures held serious implications. Just what they mean today only time will tell.

Ann's another who's been "brought home to meet mother." She guffaws at any suggestion of a romance between herself and Bob Sterling, yet when Bob shopped for a new home for his parents, it was Ann who helped pick it out. And when Bob drives out to the Valley to visit his folks, it's Ann who's at his side.

Of Greer, it has been said: "Her idea of a good time is a romp through the dictionary." The remark, prompted by Greer's aloofness to things romantic, doesn't hold water any more. For the first time since coming to this country, Greer is revealing a serious interest in a young man. The lucky lad is Richard Ney, the 26-year-old actor who appeared with her in "Mrs. Miniver" and who's been appearing with her at theaters and restaurants ever since. Neither will confirm nor deny!

Whether any of these combinations will ever get to the altar, we couldn't say. But keep your eye on 'em anyway!

Disa and Data

In three hours of bond-selling, Olivia de Havilland made Uncle Sam $20,000 richer and herself $60 poorer. A bad mathematician, Olivia handed out too much change; had to make good the difference out of her own pocket . . . Alan Hale's taking bets the war will be over by Christmas . . . Brenda Marshall, who dropped to 93 pounds before Hubby Bill Holden left for the Army, is chubbying up on a ginger-ale-with-cream concoction . . . Charles Boyer will pour $125,000 into the construction and equipment of a French museum in Hollywood. It'll house the best work of French authors and artists . . . History repeats itself. Myrna Loy's Reno divorce from Arthur Hornblow will be secured by the same attorneys who divided the first Mrs. Hornblow from the producer!

Brenda Joyce will don eyeglasses for 17 sequences of "The Postman Didn't Ring." Producer wants to prove there's plenty of sex in gals who wear specks . . . Though the Army will not permit soldier boys to vote on their screen favorites, a check-up on theater attendance reveals the heroes in khaki go light on the drahma and heavy on Bob Hope, Abbott and Costello and feminine glamour . . . Joan Crawford is prepared to sink a small fortune into the founding of a day nursery for the children of war workers. Kids who had dads in the service and mothers in defense plants will be accepted free of charge and given the finest attention money can buy . . . Double-ring marriage ceremonies are old stuff, but Ruth Hussey established a new custom when she swapped engagement circlets with fiancé Lincoln Fogarty.

Sarah Churchill, Winston's child, will be seen for the first time on the American screen in "Three Smart Brides," a British production released by Monogram. Sarah is an Asst. Section Officer in the WAAF's . . . It's the Army Air Corps for Tim Holt. His wife and baby will go East to live with Mrs. Holt's family for the duration . . . Greta Garbo is angling for the role of Ling Sao, Hedy Lamarr's mother, in "Dragon Seed."

Quips That Pass In the Fight

Latest "character" to invade Hollywood is Ilka Chase, former movie actress and authoress of the recently published "Past Imperfect." Ilka is sort of a female Oscar Levant, sarcastic, razor-brained and too darned clever for those she chooses to impale on her wit. After devoting fat paragraphs in "Imperfect" to insulting the flicker village, Ilka was rewarded with a part in Bette Davis' "Now, Voyager," and is at present on the Warner lot, spitting venom at anyone unlucky enough to cross her path. One of her earliest victims was Humphrey Bogart.

Bogey met Ilka in the commissary, one day, and mentioned "Past Imperfect."

"I enjoyed your book very much," he said brightly. "Who wrote it?"

Ilka smiled modestly. "So glad you liked it," she stabbed. "Who read it to you?"

Slack Season

Bob Hope's pet peeve is slacks. Women in slacks. He says it was tough enough before, but now that comfortable sportswear has been officially okayed, he has to follow a trousered figure at least ten minutes before he can find out whether it's one of his writers or a gal on her way to work at Lockheed.

All studios issued bulletins to the effect that their women employees were welcome to wear slack suits around the offices, but to date the girls have refused. They've heard studio designers rave too often that the female figure was not constructed to appear at its best in trousers, and they're staying in skirts 'til their last pair of Nylons pop.

Slacks at home is something else again. Joan Bennett just bought a pair made of black moire that makes up one-half of a super-comfy hostess outfit. They're very tailored, with grosgrain tape running down the sides like a man's dinner trousers. The top of her outfit is an ultra-feminine chiffon blouse of pale blue and white dots, made with long sleeves and a pleated front.

. . . Dorothy Lamour's trick of changing a basic dress five different ways? Dottie couldn't take a large wardrobe with her on her bond selling tour, so she got together with Edith Head and worked out something a little different in the glamour-trimming department.

Instead of the usual collar-and-cuff dodge, Edith created "snap on" trimmings that outline the arm-holes of the dress. Dottie can make the dress formal by using gold braid or bands of bright red bugle beads. Or drop in some place without a hat with bands of white pique or plaid taffeta or peasant embroidery snapped on where the fancy stuff was just a few moments before.

Gadget Gab

Veronica Lake popped onto the set of "This Gun For Hire" the other day with a miniature head of herself clipped to her lapel! A national jewelry manufacturer has created a likeness of her out of hand-carved wood, with long yellow wool draped over one eye in perfect imitation of the Lake locks . . . In "Seven Sisters" Kathryn Grayson wears green crocheted earrings, sent to her by a fan. Now she's needling some herself.

Personal Note

Jeanette MacDonald wears her newest pin right above her heart. It's a grooved jet replica of a phonograph record, with tiny gold letters in the center of the disc spelling out "Let Me Always Sing." That's the song hubby Gene Raymond wrote and dedicated to her just before she left on her first concert tour.

The only other bit of costume jewelry Jeanette wears is a gold bar pin. The yellow metal is twisted to form the first five notes of the "Star Spangled Banner"!

Got A Headache?

Doris Dudley arrived on "The Moon and Sixpence" set directly from the airport, and went right to work. The strain of closing her apartment in New York on short notice and hopping into a plane began to tell on her in the form of a whopping headache, but she refused to hold up production. "Bring me a half-cupful of hot black coffee, with the juice of one lemon squeezed into it," she requested. Ten minutes later—no headache! Doris says it's a home remedy handed down to her from her mother. We took a sip, and we're warning you. It's like olives. You've got to acquire a taste for it.

Keyes For Smart Dressing

Columbia's fair-haired girl, Evelyn Keyes, has her wardrobe for the year all set. Last week she bought two 3-piece gabardine suits —one in blue, one in yellow. The suits consist of a skirt, jacket and slacks, and she mixes the color combinations any way she wants to. To top the outfits with something really gay, she broke down and bought a bright red coat that had been catching her eye in a certain shop window for months.

Sooner or later all big names, in all walks of life, succumb. Sinclair Lewis suffered from it, and Edna Ferber, and Bill Tilden and Max Baer. The symptoms are simple. You talk to yourself, drool Shakespeare and theater, and think other people want to pay to look at you. The disease is Footlight Fever, and those who get it whisper: "I wanna be an actor."

Latest victim is the well-known Rev. R. Anderson Jardine, who performed the most sensational and theatrical marriage of our time. Rev. Jardine was the vicar who got up enough courage to weld the Duke of Windsor to Wallis Simpson. For this act he was forced to leave his English parish and his lifelong position. At the time, all of Hollywood applauded him. Today, all of Hollywood may applaud him again. For, even as you read this, Rev. Jardine has turned actor! He is appearing in a three-act play called "Dakar Speaks," written by someone named Prince Modupe, of Nigeria.

The drama is all about Africa—and is full of voodoo and Nazis and Rev. Jardine, who plays the role he is well acquainted with, i.e., a clergyman.

Now making his home in Hollywood, the good vicar hopes to become another Donald Crisp or Walter Brennan. His director thinks he has a good chance.

Montgomery vs. Gable

Hedy Lamarr isn't the only one who tingles when George Montgomery looms into view. Executives at 20th Century-Fox, where George works, also breathe faster every time they rest their orbs on the broad shoulders and streamlined hips of the Man from Montana. For, to the executives, George represents the answer to a prayer, a dream come true. He is all they ask of an actor. He is a challenger to the money-making throne of Clark Gable.

In almost a decade, no one has seriously threatened Clark's position in the hearts of American women. He, and he alone, has been the incarnation, the symbol, of all that is virile and manly. Until the advent of Montgomery it seemed he would never have a rival.

When George first appeared at Fox, he was regarded as just another muscle man, fresh off the range. However, as time went on, producers noticed with a thrill that he bore an uncanny resemblance to the King of Stars.

The knowledge that he's to be groomed as another Gable has left George absolutely cold. Or, it did till the other day when he reported to the studio for a conference with one of his bosses.

The business of the day was progressing smoothly when suddenly the bigwig paused. Narrowing his eyes, he fixed them on George and circled the actor several times.

Finally he spoke. "Montgomery," he said. "One more thing and it will be perfect. When

Body Bountiful

Sixteen pounds of ordinary flesh have changed Rosemary Lane's entire life.

A year ago, in Hollywood, she was a shamefully neglected Fourth Daughter, wallowing in B pictures and mediocre roles. Today, in New York, she has to shake the fat contracts out of her hair. Overnight she finds herself in a position to get, from Hollywood, almost any price and any part. And, we repeat, all because of sixteen pounds.

Here's how come. George Abbott, the Broadway producer, has a play called "Best Foot Forward"—all about a fictional movie glamour gal who visits a boys' school and is stripped to her bra and step-ins by enthusiastic young admirers. Abbott offered Rosemary the role and she accepted. However, there was a big problem to meet. She knew she had to run through much of the play semi-nude, and she knew, too, that because she'd been sitting around Hollywood on her beam-end, waiting for parts, she had slowly, insidiously, grown sixteen pounds overweight.

Time was short. Rosemary had only two weeks before she was due in New York. So she hustled over to Terry Hunt, famous conditioner of stars. "It's a tough road ahead," she said. "I need curves, Terry, and the construction job has to be fast!"

Replied Hunt: "If you've got courage and character, you can do it, and I can help."

The play opened. Rosemary bounced about in her undies. The hard-boiled critics, tired of middle-aged, corseted Bernhardts, blinked their eyes and saw four stars. The play was a hit—Rosemary Lane sensational.

But Rosemary didn't forget the credit line. That night she sent a wire to Terry Hunt. It read: "THE CRITICS ARE SAYING THE PLAY IS SWELL AND I'M HITTING ON ALL CYLINDERS. BUT I'M REMINDING THEM TO CREDIT—BODY BY HUNT!"

I SAW IT HAPPEN

After the judges of the annual one-act play contest had made their decision here in the Todd School of Woodstock, Illinois, back in 1930, I approached them protestingly and heatedly. The leading man, I argued, far surpassed any other member of the cast in interpretation and acting ability. The chairman, after strong words had passed between us, finally discharged me with, "He is not the best actor. In fact, he's not even a good actor. I'll go even further than that. I'll tell you right here, this young man will never be heard of in any theater!"

Was he a bit wrong? That young "ham" was our obedient servant ORSON WELLES!

SISTERS—AND HOW!

started out early in the morning and hiked to the country home of a friend. By that time heat, dust and heel blisters decided them to stay the night and go on with their odyssey in the morning. They refused lodgings in the house. They were travelers, they explained, and nothing would do but they sleep in the hayloft.

Funny thing about hay. It looks so soft, and it bounces so nicely at first acquaintance; but get to know it intimately! It has crawling inhabitants; it is dusty and incites sneezing. It's no Simmons Beautyrest. Next morning the hollow-eyed team were preparing half-heartedly to resume the fiasco-ish excursion when their mother appeared on the scene. She'd gotten wind by telephone the previous afternoon of their progress, and had decided to let them get good and sick of their drama before intervening. Safely ensconced in their beds at home, the prostrated gypsies swore they'd never leave home again—but t'ain't so. They're still at it.

When congas at Ciro's pall on Joan, she and that gorgeous guy she married hop into their plane and beeline for Maine. The first time they flew there, they landed in a colossal meadow and hiked to a farm house to ask for dinner and a room for the night. "A room for the night, Miss Hepburn?" The round-faced farmer's wife who opened the door eyed Joan disapprovingly and flashed all kinds of horrified looks at poor Brian. Eventually she got on that it was all perfectly legal, and she fed them the most fabulous dinner they've ever seen. Since then, she's been the Ahernes' personal Santa Claus. "She sends us great boxes of maple sugar candy, holly, mistletoe, pine cones—everything that makes a real New England Christmas." And her farmhouse has become their favorite away-from-it-all haunt.

Olivia's idea of a rest is a whirl in New York. A few times a year she leaves California and bolts for the bright lights. "A couple of plays a day, a night spot or two—that's relaxation. But dee-vine. If some nice chap would buy me that town I think I could learn to love him." The only thing she can't stand about the place are the mile-a-minute elevators. She's even scared stiff of the poky self-operated variety. Why? A long time ago she read Axel Munthe's "The Story of San Michele" in which there is a tale about a man who had a dream of a creature with a frightful face. The dreamer awakened in cold sweat, only to see the apparition disappear across the moonlit lawn. Years passed, and one day as this man started to board an elevator in Paris, what was his horror to find the nightmare face leering at him from the elevator operator's body. The man quickly stepped off the elevator, which ascended several floors, then broke a cable and plunged to the bottom of the shaft. All the passengers were destroyed, but among the bodies, that of the hideous man was not found!

The whole time Livvie's gadding in the East there's not a postcard out of her. Not a line. Whereas Joan can't write often enough, all her letters dealing largely with requests that Livvie look after Nick. Nick, née Nicholas, is a cuddly miniature poodle that Brian gave her for Christmas. He's about seven inches high, with maybe a ten inch wheel base, not counting his tail which couldn't be held still long enough to measure. "See that poor Nick gets an occasional chop bone," Joan will write frantically. Once in a while Olivia will break down and drop her a terse note. "Nick is okay," being its general gist.

The one person Livvie's ever been able to keep up a good brisk correspondence with was a former page boy in the household of her grandfather, Reverend Charles de Havilland, in England. "The old boy fascinated me," she'll tell you. "We corresponded like mad for years." It all began when she was first getting her start in the movies. The obsolete page boy wrote her long, informative letters telling about boyhood escapades of the sons of the house, assuming her dad had been one of them. Eventually he wrote, asking Olivia which one had been her father.

Olivia, vastly intrigued, went down to the stationer's to buy a copy of Burke's "Landed Gentry." She quickly discovered that the boys to whom her fan referred, had been sons by the Reverend Charles' first marriage. Olivia and Joan's father was the child of the clergyman's second union.

So Livvy, genealogy in hand, sat down to write a detailed explanation to the page boy. "My grandmother," she explained, "was, before her marriage to the Reverend Charles, the Honorable Margaret Letitia Molesworth." She went on to say that she hoped to hear from him soon again, as she enjoyed his stories about her family. Back came a single line upon a large sheet of paper: "How odd that the Reverend Charles should have married the Honorable Miss Molesworth. Yours respectfully . . ."

She has never heard another word from him, and it's killing her. She'd give an eye to know what it was with her grandmother. "A gay kid, no doubt—and her with her holier-than-thou face in all the portraits."

The return of either of the gals from one of their expeditions is cause for much family reunion. After dinner they'll sit around chatting casually. Then eventually—"What have you been reading?" from Joan. "'The Ivory Mischief' and it's wonderful." "Livvie, you're fooling! I hated it." "How could you?" "How could you?" And they're off. (Incidentally, both the girls read a great deal. Olivia's favorite books to date are Dreiser's "Sister Carrie" and Bolitho's "Twelve Against the Gods." Joan's pets are Mildred Cram's "Forever" and Paul Gallico's "The Snow Goose.") They tiff along heatedly for a while, and then suddenly Olivia will say with a straight face, "It don't matter to me what you say, Joan. It really don't." Bad grammar is Joan's fetish, and "it don't" is her hate of hates. She'll look at Livvie aghast a minute, and then they'll both roar. Joan heckles her right back about her numerous swains. "They do say you and Buzz Meredith are secretly one—" More roaring.

Livvie's men have always been a source of amazement to Joan. "At seven," she'll tell you, "she had what amounted to an understanding with a boy. But she had another understanding with a second boy that, when she was free of Swain A for an evening, she would dally with Swain B. And there were always three or four hangers-on ready to pinch hit should Swain B be away or anything." Joan herself's a monogamist at heart.

When she was five she caught a glimpse of a hearty number, aged six, being chauffeured to school in an awesome black limousine. Having spent hours poring over books dealing with princes on coal black chargers, she streamlined the version and, zip, she was in love! She continued to adore from afar this glittering creature until she was fifteen and was sent back to Tokyo to complete her education at the American School. However, back in Japan, she forgot about Prince Charming and got herself engaged seven times in two years. It must have been the climate, however, because when she resettled in Shangri-La on the L. A. River, she devoted herself to Conrad Nagel, followed by the winnah, Brian Aherne.

Livvie is still playing the field, and if Joan is one of Hollywood's happiest matrons (which she vehemently is), then Livvie is one of its most successful and satisfied spinsters. A dozen colleges have voted her the ideal date. She dances beautifully, drinks beer and smokes anything anyone offers her. Her attitude toward men is "the more the merrier." When Joan was praying for a tall and handsome husband, Livvie longed only for a raft of beaux and a fur coat.

She believed in a fur coat as the outward symbol of an inner grace, so before the ink was dry on one of her early Warner Brothers checks, she went alone and unguided to a furrier's where she selected the most lavish garment she was shown—a luscious white, deep-napped item with a collar "as high as a picket fence," Livvie explains, rolling her eyes. "It was full length; it was voluminous. I didn't realize for years that it was pure rabbit."

Ermine urge . . .

Nowadays, her coat is a Russian ermine trifle whipped up by Hattie Carnegie. "But it's only waistline length, and it doesn't even have a collar," she explains, still loyal to that first sumptuous number. "It doesn't do one tenth for my ego what that first coat did."

The gals really do have a couple of things in common besides adoration of the Aherne man. ("I saw him first, you know," says Livvie, "and foolishly brought him home to dinner, thereby cutting my own telephone wires. That one gave him the eye.") There's golf, for one thing. Each plays a pretty sharp brand. Last summer Joan and Brian were golfing at Del Monte when she shot a hole in one. Three months later she returned and shot a birdie on the same hole. Both girls like flying, and they both love to fish. There's a 68-inch tuna, mounted, stored in the Aherne closet right now. Joan hasn't quite the nerve to hang it up, yet she doesn't want to completely dispose of it. Olivia is a splendid horseback rider, and she's dynamite behind a tennis racket.

Both took piano lessons for years, and each emerged with a single piece in her repertoire. Livvie's is "To A Wild Rose," and Joan's is "None But The Lonely Heart."

One terrific common interest is of course their acting. Each has been nominated for an Oscar twice, and when Joan won it this year, Olivia got one of the major thrills of her life.

Funny thing, though, in spite of footprints in cement and enormous bankrolls, Joan and Olivia have remained swell fellas. Neither takes herself a bit seriously, and they have a favorite story to tell when anyone raves over their cinematic success.

As everyone knows, before Joan emerged as a great dramatic actress in her own right, she was super-cautious about appearing to trade on the name of her sister. As far as possible, Joan kept the knowledge from Hollywood that she and Olivia belonged to the same family. Because Joan insisted fanatically upon it, Olivia half-heartedly played the game.

One of the rules was never, never to be seen together.

After months of this, Olivia got slightly fed with the whole business. "This is the craziest set-up I've ever seen," she told Joan. "What if someone does see us together and decide we're sisters? I'm dead with all this dodging and subterfuge. For the love of Pete, let's double date tonight."

So they went to dinner at one of Hollywood's swank spots. (Joan was with Conrad Nagel, and Olivia was with Billy Bakewell.) No one paid the slightest bit of attention to them. Not a soul even looked in their direction. At long last an autograph seeker sidled over from an adjacent booth.

"Excuse me, Mr. Nagel," she said, "but would you please sign my book?"

Mr. Nagel obliged, then decided to give the youngster an additional break. "Would you like the autographs of these two lovely ladies?" he asked.

"I suppose so," said the member of the youngest profession, but obviously her heart wasn't in it. She glanced at them. "Which one of you is Anne Shirley?"

THE BIG SHOT

"The Big Shot" spins the tale of Humphrey Bogart, once overlord of the underworld, fresh out of jail, and on the thin edge between a return to crime and the straight and narrow. Out of his past comes the lovely, intriguing figure of Irene Manning, and his love for her keeps him honest. But Irene, unfortunately, is married to a crooked lawyer, Stanley Ridges, who, seeing which way the wind blows, promptly frames Bogart and, for good measure, Richard Travis, an innocent automobile salesman.

There's the inevitable yen for revenge and the desperate jailbreak. But innocently involved in the break is our virtuous automobile salesman. Caught, he is held for the murder of a guard, aiding criminals to escape and a few other nasty crimes. Humphrey and Irene, meanwhile, have made good their escape and are planning to start life afresh in backwoods Canada. But the specter of the doomed automobile salesman haunts them. Humphrey gives up the life of love; he returns to clear the salesman, to shoot Ridges and to die himself, while a shaft of sunlight throws the shadow of prison bars across his face.

"The Big Shot" is loud, furious and fast. There's plenty of gunplay between kisses; and the script has a keen eye for fanciful gangster types. And while love is the theme, it's love on the run and plenty exciting. There's time enough for a holdup, a clever jail-break and a spine-tingling case or two before boy gets girl or anywhere near, as a matter of fact.—W. B.

Tired Kidneys Often Bring Sleepless Nights

Doctors say your kidneys contain 15 miles of tiny tubes or filters which help to purify the blood and keep you healthy. When they get tired and don't work right in the daytime, many people have to get up nights. Frequent or scanty passages with smarting and burning sometimes shows there is something wrong with your kidneys or bladder. Don't neglect this condition and lose valuable, restful sleep.

When disorder of kidney function permits poisonous matter to remain in your blood, it may also cause nagging backache, rheumatic pains, leg pains, loss of pep and energy, swelling, puffiness under the eyes, headaches and dizziness.

Don't wait! Ask your druggist for Doan's Pills, used successfully by millions for over 40 years. They give happy relief and will help the 15 miles of kidney tubes flush out poisonous waste from your blood. Get Doan's Pills.

TEN GENTLEMEN FROM WEST POINT

"Ten Gentlemen from West Point" unfolds life at the Point in the days of the eighteen hundreds. Quartered in drafty barracks, fed poorly, under harsh discipline, disdained by the regular army men, the cadets learned their military lessons under a few sympathetic instructors. It's commonplace now to suppose that our officers should know tactics and strategy, but in a pioneer country there was a mistrust of books. Fighting, it was thought, could best be learned on the field against the Indians hemming in the expanding frontiers.

The story isn't quite as harsh as that on the screen. It's the usual fable about two cadets and a beautiful girl. One of the cadets, Dawson (George Montgomery) is a Kentucky backwoodsman. The other, Shelton (John Sutton) is a Washington blueblood. The girl is stunning Maureen O'Hara. Shelton has the edge since he's already engaged to her. But backwoodsman Dawson, a little rough perhaps, knows a thing or two also; among which is the ability to know what a mule is thinking. That helps a bit on occasions, especially when a lady's carriage won't move because the stubborn mule has suddenly insisted on resting.

The picture weaves the tri-cornered romance of these three with the grim struggle of the cadets to stay at the Point. It all comes to a head when Tecumseh, the Indian Chief, goes on the warpath. All available troops are ordered to the frontier. In a climax of yawping Indians, the cadets apply a lesson learned at the Point, rescue the Major from imminent death, win his respect and save the Academy.

As for the romance, Kentucky tactics prove to be better than Washington strategy. So while Dawson and his bride hit out for the new West, Shelton returns to the Point. They don't let you marry at West Point, anyway, until you've been graduated.—TCF.

TALK OF THE TOWN

"Talk of the Town" sets up the thriving little community of Lochester, as pretty a place as you'd care to see, except that it's run by a crooked factory owner who controls the local judge, the local police, the local newspaper and all trains west not running express. When the local factory burns down, Holmes (the factory owner) pins the blame on Cary Grant, the local agitator; well, maybe agitator is a little harsh, but he does shoot off his mouth a lot about justice and rotten beams in the factory and lack of fire protection. But Cary has a shrewd idea that this case of arson was home-made by Holmes and thoughtfully breaks jail and escapes.

He escapes to, of all places, the summer home of Ronald Colman, who in a Van Dyke beard, is a law professor awaiting appointment to the Supreme Court. Ronald's temporary secretary for the summer is the local beauty, Jean Arthur, who discovers Cary on the premises and then has her hands full preventing the law professor from discovering that Cary is wanted by the police and preventing the police from laying their vulgar hands on Cary. Cary and Ronald become fast friends, playing chess and discussing the merits of borscht and justice. Borscht, Cary insists, must have an egg in it; Ronald graciously allows the point. Justice, Ronald insists, is a beautiful document, often between the finely tooled leather covers of a book; justice, says Cary, is what the police sometimes hit you on the head with during a strike.

Matters come to a point, both philosophical and practical, when Ronald discovers that Cary is wanted for arson and probable murder. The law books say that he must be turned over to the police. But our lovely town of Lochester is in a fury, whipped up by the evil Mr. Holmes, and Cary is more likely to be lynched than tried. But the law is the law, and Ronald is prepared to call the cops; regretfully Cary bops him on the head and escapes again. When Ronald comes to, Miss Arthur lets him have the sharp side of her tongue in a harangue about humanity, justice and loyalty. Whether it's the bop on the head, Miss Arthur's lecture or the fact that he's falling in love with her, is hard to say, but Ronald takes a drastic step.

He shaves off his beard.

This not only makes him look younger and more handsome, but it also acts as an almost foolproof disguise, since Mr. Colman has been wearing the beard almost since birth and is notoriously fond of it. Beardless, he sets out to prove Cary's innocence, aided by Miss Arthur and by Cary, too, who can find no better place to hide than behind the robes of an incipient Supreme Court justice.

Getting the proof calls for some fancy shenanigans on Ronald's part. He makes love to a beery damsel from the other side of the tracks; he goes to a baseball game with the local judge, handles a gun like a Western bad boy, plays Dick Tracy, has the time of his life and forgets his books.

In the end, he gets the proof. Cary gets his freedom. Ronald gets his Supreme Court nomination. But Cary gets the girl.

What's justice in that case?—Col.

THEY ALL KISSED THE BRIDE

Call me a sourpuss, but I'm getting tired of Hollywood's blithe comedies about labor, capital and assorted social ills that have Dan Cupid, without a sarong, settling everything by the flick of an arrow. Love may be wonderful, but I don't notice the WPB or the CIO settling disputes by an adroit marriage at the fade-out.

Not that it isn't a good thing for Hollywood to cast an occasional eye on the workaday world and its problems; more of that is certainly in order. But facts are facts and, offhand, I can't think of any strike that was settled because Joan Crawford and Melvyn Douglas kissed and made up.

Joan, in this picture, is the energetic, tyrannical head of the Drew Transportation Co., and Melvyn is a writer preparing a story about her father, depicting him as a piratical, unscrupulous stuffed shirt. Which, it seems, he was.

There are, as you can readily see, a few weeds in this Garden of Eden. Among other weeds, is Joan's high-handed manner with the employees. Men are fired for slight infractions of the rules; spotters, spies and stool pigeons make up the workaday world of the Drew Transportation Co. So Melvyn decides to open her eyes to conditions in the company by inviting her out to dinner. After all, she's only the president and couldn't be expected to know what's going on. What's more he takes her to a picnic of the company employees.

They dine, they dance, they drink, they kiss.

MY FAVORITE SPY

"My Favorite Spy," in title at least, may remind you of "My Favorite Blonde," and the screen character of Kay Kyser may seem cut from the same cloth as Bob Hope, with a touch of Red Skelton about the seams. But where Bob Hope has to depend on a penguin to stooge for him, Kay has Ish Kabibble and a tuneful brass section to back him up. In a pinch, Kay just rolls back the rugs and lets the "chillun dance."

No one has priority on this type of comedy. Long before Kay, Bob or Red found Hollywood, a certain Harold Lloyd was laying them in the aisles with this character of the unwilling hero. It's just poetic justice, therefore, that Mr. Lloyd should have produced "My Favorite Spy."

"My Favorite Spy" finds Kay due to be married and inducted into the army on the same day. Kay, the army decides, is ideal as a counter-espionage agent. He's assigned to track down spies believed to be making their headquarters at the swank Orchid Room, where Kay and his band play nightly. There are a few drawbacks to the assignment, however. Kay has to clam up. He can't even say a thing to the suspicious Mrs. Kyser (Ellen Drew), who's doomed to remain a kissless bride while Kay chases down back alleys. The other drawback is that operatives on this assignment have been shot down as rapidly and accurately as clay pigeons in a Times Square shooting gallery.

Kay has a tough time trying to prove to the Missus that he's not out prancing with gay blondes. That's not as simple as it sounds because Kay's co-agent in all this is Jane Wyman, who is not only blonde, but the kind of blonde that makes men leave home. Kay has his hands full juggling his domestic crisis, his army career and his band while bullets whip under his slightly startled nose.

It all winds up in a frenzy at a darkened and abandoned theater with Kay tracking the spies, the Missus tracking Kay and the spies befuddled. They shoot up the place half-heartedly, but they really haven't got a chance. The Missus keeps insisting that it's all a gag, and Kay in his innocent way finally gets them cornered under a collapsed curtain and busily tacks down the corners with a hammer and a handful of nails.

The band isn't idle through all this madness. There's time for a number or two; Harry Babbitt sings, Sully Mason clowns a bit and Ish Kabibble manages his quaint haircut with his accustomed grace. Helen Westley plays a shrewish maiden aunt who doesn't like people who say "chillun—let's dance." There's a fellow at the beginning who keeps saying, "Kay Kyser—you mean Kay Francis?" And there's a renting agent who thinks Kay is somehow connected to a Wilbur Kyser who once lived in 4A. You, of course, don't have to be told that we aren't talking about Sammy Kaye. Or do we mean Kaye Don? Kyser's the name. Kay Kyser.—RKO.

P. S.

Ellen Drew had no trouble making the crying scenes. Her husband, Cy Bartlett, was in Washington during production of the picture, and she missed him so, Tay Garnett had only to mention his name, and Mrs. B. would turn on the weeps . . . Kyser worked 47 out of 48 days the picture was in production . . . Ish Kabibble (real name Merwyn Bogue) gets a nifty chance to put over some of his special comedy because of the swell fan comments on his work in "Playmates" . . . Jane Wyman left her home studio, Warner Bros., to do "Connie" in this production, and another semi-serious role at 20th Century-Fox . . . Ellen went through the RKO glamour mill, came out with a completely new hair style and radically changed make-up . . . No Ginny Simms in this one. The two newcomers Kay signed to take her place are Trudy Erwin and Dorothy Dunn . . . Johnny Burke and Jimmy Van Heusen turned out two new numbers—"Just Plain Lonesome" sung by Harry Babbitt, and "I've Got the Moon in My Pocket" featuring Sassy Sully Mason and the quartette . . . Ellen Drew plays a couple of scenes with William Demarest, who discovered her when he was an actor's agent . . . Original prizes for winning on Kyser's "Kollege of Musical Knowledge" are now collectors' items. They're parchment scrolls, and most of them are in the possession of Northwestern or University of Chicago graduates who won them at the Black Hawk cafe during the Saturday Night quiz Kay conducted while playing there in 1937.

KLONDIKE FURY

Brain specialist Edmund Lowe does a floppo operation and the patient dies. Accused of letting the patient die because he is in love with the dead man's wife, Lowe is disbarred and goes off to the Klondike where he crashes while ferrying a war plane. There, after strange plot twists, he vindicates himself with the help of Lucile Fairbanks.—Mono.

THE MAGNIFICENT DOPE

Henry Fonda is a lucky backwoods jerk who enters any contest that comes his way in the hope that he may win enough money to buy his home town a badly needed fire engine. He finally wins a five-hundred dollar prize contest conducted by Don Ameche's Success Institute—looking for the man least likely to succeed. Collecting his prize and Ameche's gal, Lynn Bari, occupy the rest of the magnificent adventures.—TCF.

REMEMBER PEARL HARBOR

Because of Don Barry's heroism in dive-bombing himself and his plane into a Japanese battleship that is landing troop reinforcements on the Philippines, the American soldiers valiantly defending those islands are able to win the day and repel the first treacherous attack. Spies and women-folk all lend atmosphere to the to-do.—Rep.

STARDUST ON THE SAGE

Gene Autry's temporarily given up riding the plains to set aright mortgaged gold mines, especially when they're endorsed by pretty girls like Louise Currie. He does things just in the nick of time, too, with Smiley Burnette helping him out and leading the audience in the little white-ball-and-magic-wand singing.—Rep.

HALFWAY TO SHANGHAI

Everyone on the train en route from the Burma Road terminus to Rangoon, is a ss-sh—a spy. Everyone, that is, except Irene Hervey, who is just a beautiful White Russian leaving Shanghai to marry a rajah for his dough. Kent Taylor sees that she has possibilities and, after a series of map-swappings, murders, leaps and stabbings, he clears the road to bring her back to ray! ray! ray! the U. S. A.—Univ.

They used to call them Defense Bonds. Now they're War Bonds. Tomorrow—Victory Bonds? Maybe. Oh, yes—you can lose the war! And it is your war. 140,000,000 "you's" are in this thing together. So, are you letting the other fellow do the fighting? If that's your attitude, maybe it's the other fellow's, too. And then it's good-by high school dances, good-by movies, good-by liberty!!

Before the country can win the big war, each of us has to win the little war with our conscience. "But I'm doing my best," you say. Sister, the only way to know if you're doing your best is to ask yourself this question: "Could I do more?" If you could do more—then you aren't doing your best.

Whatever your effort so far, we want to know about it. How are you earning money? How are you saving money? What is your "war-plan" for buying more and more war stamps and bonds? Write us this minute! From today, this page is reserved for the best letter describing a reader's plan to buy stamps to buy planes to smash the Axis! Write. Romance fades when a girl is careless—Guard charm every day with Mum!

ROMANCE seems in the very air tonight! There's a moon to inspire unforgettable words, a lovely girl ready to listen. But there's no man to whisper them to Jane!

Too bad someone can't tell her that a girl must be more than pretty—more than smartly dressed to attract a man. Unless she stays nice to be near, how can she win his heart—how can a man stay in love?

The shocking thought that she's careless has never entered Jane's pretty head. She bathes each day, of course, before dates, too—shouldn't that be enough? She forgets that a bath's job is to remove past perspiration. To prevent risk of future odor, so many popular girls rely on dependable Mum.

With Mum your bath-freshness lasts for long hours. Mum keeps you a charming companion, helps your chances for romance! You will like Mum for its:

SPEED—30 seconds to use Mum! Even when you're late for business or a date, you still have time for Mum!

CERTAINTY—No guesswork about Mum—because without stopping perspiration it prevents odor all day or all evening.

SAFETY—You can use Mum even after underarm shaving, even after you're dressed. Mum won't irritate skin. Mum won't harm fabrics, says the American Institute of Laundering. Guard your charm with Mum!

MOVIE REVIEWS

By Zachary Gold

When George Cugat (Ray Milland) catches a mild case of snuffles, it assumes the proportions of a nervous breakdown to the tune of death rattles to devoted, highly imaginative spouse Liz (Betty Field).

At the town's biggest social event, George brings shame down on Liz's head by grand-entrancing as a pickled knight! Above, with Richard Haydn as Chuck and Charlotte Wynters as Mrs. Finley.

Mr. and Mrs. Cugat

A whiffle, according to the Cugats from the picture of the same name, is a "slight" exaggeration; like an earthquake is a "slight" disturbance. The highly successful whiffle is light, saucy, palatable, almost like an omelette except that it's a good deal funnier. "Mr. and Mrs. Cugat" is a whiffle of a picture.

Liz and George Cugat are a young couple, definitely on the upgrade. George is a second vice-president in the local bank and almost sure to become vice-president if he keeps his balances and his figures. Liz doesn't particularly have to worry about her figure, but she's slightly slap-happy when it comes to balance; it's Liz who goes around whiffling in the dark, or in broad daylight, too, for that matter. Liz not only can make a mountain out of a molehill, but given a molehill, she'll end up with something that puts Mt. Everest to shame.

There was, for instance, the matter of George's cold; well, it wasn't even a cold exactly. You know how a guy gets up some morning feeling a little stuffy in the head. Before Liz got through with that one, she was explaining very carefully to George's boss that it was a threatened nervous breakdown, due to the fact that poor George felt he wasn't getting anywhere at the bank. Like vice-president, or something. Didn't they need a good vice-president?

You can see that Liz was just the sort of girl to get you in solid with the boss. Or, as George carefully explained to her: woman's place is in the home, and if she had to whiffle, he'd get her a whiffle iron for Christmas and they could have them every Sunday for breakfast. That might have turned the trick, but just then, out of the past comes Myra Ponsonby, having just shedded her second husband and on the hunt for a third.

It turns out that in the days before Myra took up marriage as a career, she was a bosom pal of George's. And neither time nor Reno have affected her particularly; she's beautiful, handy with a catty line and has a pocketful of spare alimony which, she insists, George must invest for her. Investment calls for conferences and comfortable tête-à-têtes; you just don't throw money around.

Faced with Myra, Liz has to whiffle hard and fast to pull George out of her clutches. There are two things, Liz concludes, that can bring a man to his senses; a baby or his boss. Liz files to adopt a baby but that takes time, so in the meanwhile, she hides George under the protective wing of his boss.

That calls for a whiffle, of course, since George's boss isn't interested in his private life. By hook or crook, and mostly crook, Liz gets them invited out to the boss's for a big dinner party where a certain Mr. Bunker, important in banking circles, is to be entertained. Liz promptly wrecks the joint. She insults an operatic soprano; she wrecks the boss's prize trailer, a land yacht on wheels. She forces George into a fight with his boss. She fixes things fine.

Surprisingly enough, she does.

For Mr. Bunker, who has keen eyes and odd tastes, likes Liz and George, too, for that matter. And what Mr. Bunker likes, the boss usually likes even more; or at least says he does. It doesn't work out quite as simply as all that. Before George gets to be vice-president, he unfortunately gets drunk and manages to do a little wrecking on his own. He does it, believe it or not, in a suit of armor. The occasion is a masquerade ball, and before the night is over he manages to get himself on fire.

When George's post in the farm of twice-divarced, sirenish Myra Pansonby (Pat Marison) turns up and tries her talents an him, Liz has ta fall back an her reody stare of whiffles ta win the bottle!

She turns the hause upside dawn daing it, but Liz succeeds in engineering visiting bank scion Bunker (Eugene Pallette), inta promoting hubby George to vice-president af the local bank!

FACTS ABOUT A VITAL PROBLEM

every wife should understand

Safe new way in feminine hygiene gives continuous action for hours!

● Your happiness—your very health—can depend on whether or not you know the real facts about the vital problem of feminine hygiene!

Many women, who think they know, depend on out-dated or dangerous information . . . make the mistake of relying on weak, ineffective "home-made" mixtures . . . or risk using over-strong solutions of acids which can burn and injure delicate tissues.

Today modern, well-informed women everywhere have turned to Zonitors—the new, safe, convenient way in feminine hygiene.

Zonitors are dainty, snow-white suppositories which spread a greaseless, protective coating . . . and kill germs instantly at contact. Deodorize—not by temporarily masking—but by destroying odors. Cleanse antiseptically and give continuous medication for hours.

Yet Zonitors are safe for delicate tissues. Powerful—yet non-poisonous, non-caustic. Even help promote gentle healing. No apparatus; nothing to mix. At all druggists.

dinner party for the boss, his wife and Mr. Bunker, in the midst of which, men come to cart off the piano. This is due to Liz's bill-filing habits; each month she throws a certain percentage of the bills into the wastepaper basket, just on principle. It's necessary, Liz explains, in order to balance the budget; if she paid all the bills, she certainly couldn't. That does make sense, but it's not recommended by Better Business Bureaus.

Ray Milland and Betty Field are on hand for the roles of the slightly nutty Cugats. Statuesque Patricia Morison plays Myra; Eugene Pallette and Richard Haydn toss around a bit of comedy. Leif Erickson, Phil Terry, Charles Dingle, Elizabeth Risdon and Kathleen Lockhart fill out the country club atmosphere with ease and charm.

Were there a couple of loose ends? Oh, yes: Myra marries Mr. Bunker, George gets the job, the piano is due back shortly. The baby? Well, just when everything is all settled for adoption, the doctor drops in on Liz. Liz, bless her heart, is due to have one all by herself.

No whiffling.—Par.

P. S.

Toughest technical problem was getting Ray Milland's voice to sound as though it were coming from inside the steel helmet of his suit-of-armor costume. Experts huddled, then had Ray speak into a length of garden hose. No dice. Next they tried encasing poor Milland's head in the diving helmet (weight—80 lbs.) he'd worn in "Reap the Wild Wind." That didn't work, either. Mumbling dialogue into a cellophane bag almost turned the trick, but sound-effects expert Howard Joslin found an enormous copper candy kettle in the prop department that proved to be just the thing. Joslin hung the kettle from a scaffold, muffled the vibrations with an old bath towel and asked Ray to exercise his vocal chords while his head was hidden in the contraption. The effect was perfect . . . Betty Field didn't tell anyone she planned to marry Playwright Elmer Rice when she finished the picture, but she talked about Matrimony so much on the set, folks had a hunch what was on her mind . . . Pat Morison turned a soft shade of green after eight trips for as many takes in a swaying litter during the costume ball sequence. Strictly for laughs, she presented the litter-bearers who had to carry her the length of the set with bottles of vitamin-plus vegetable juice. They drank it gratefully.

BROADWAY

The nineteen twenties are dim enough in memory to be recalled with a nostalgic sigh as "the good old days." Recently "Roxie Hart" looked back with a fond grin at the Chicago of the Prohibition era; and now "Broadway" does the same for New York. It's the lusty, gusty white way of the Dempsey-Tunney fight, silk shirts, gangsters and speakeasies. Prohibition was a raw and romantic paragraph in the history books that ended with the startling exclamation point of the Depression; it was a culture that went with the wind as surely as the old South at the finish of the Civil War.

"Broadway" picks up the curious Hollywood habit of having actors play roles under their own names; George Raft, in the picture, plays a character by the name of George Raft. It's not so far-fetched, at that, for "Broadway" is the story of a hoofer in the New York speakeasies during the twenties, and that's where you would have found George Raft at that time. It's not an actual biography, perhaps, but it's not far off in atmosphere and background.

The Paradise Club in the picture was one of those long, dim cellars with enough food on hand to keep the customers thirsty and enough liquor to keep them broke. Out front some raucous-voiced girl was constantly at the piano shouting "I'm Just Wild About Harry" over the din of the talk. Every so often a couple of chorus girls would step out onto the postage stamp dance floor and imitate a chorus line. There was always a hoofer and the faster he could dance, the better; at the Paradise Club it was George Raft, a young guy who knew the answers and had his heart set on a specialty act to crack the big time.

But most of the show in the speak-easies went on backstage. The Paradise, like most, was owned or controlled by gangsters; Steve Crandall (Brod Crawford) made it his headquarters. There was a room in the back where the boys manufactured the "Imported" liquor. There was a private little night club upstairs where the boys could relax and entertain their "friends." At the Paradise it might have worked out all right except that Steve had his eye caught by Showgirl Billie Moore (Janet Blair). And Billie was George's partner in the specialty act he was building; and something a little more than a business partner in his heart.

Billie gets involved in a gang killing engineered by Steve, and George steps in to protect her. From then on the Paradise Club is as dangerous as dynamite; the cellar becomes a tight, taut little place with Steve and George fencing with death and a detective Dan McCorn (Pat O'Brien) pattering around quietly and keenly in the background. Things finally do blow up in a climax, but it's not quite as you might expect it.

"Broadway" plays heavily on the tunes and the sidelights of the Twenties. George Raft does a whirlwind dance or two to "Sweet Georgia Brown." Marjorie Rambeau shouts and acts a character based on Texas Guinan. Gangsters named quaintly "Happy," "Porky" and "The Counsellor" move on and off stage. S. Z. Sakall and Edward Brophy flavor the cast; Janet Blair, Anne Gwynne and Marie Wilson handle the main feminine leads. "Broadway" is a bit of curious American history remembered, not exactly as it was, but with an eye for the colorful trimmings. Colorful isn't exactly the word. Gaudy.—Univ.

P. S.

"Broadway" was not such an easy assignment for George Raft, despite the fact that it told the story of his own life with almost day-to-day accuracy. Squabbles came and went twenty years ago, but when George got into a camera battle during the 1942 screening of his life, he proved that he could still take it and come back for more. Raft got in the way of a wild camera during the big fight with hulking Brod Crawford and, lifting the huge camera out of range, Raft staggered backward, tripped over the legs of a prop man on the sidelines, went over on his head and banged into a wall with such force that the structure shivered and split. Groggy but still game, George came back at Brod, "finishing him off," as dictated by the script. George pooh-poohed it all off with, "I took plenty of those as a kid—and I'm glad to know I haven't yet collected a 'glass' chin or a double to do the job." . . . First and last scenes of the picture show Times Square and the Big Street as they are today, dimout and all. May be the last footage permitted under tightening govt. wartime edicts. They're also the first ever made from the point of view of a stroller hoofing it down the main drag. Associate producer Frank Shaw battled weather, crowds, restrictions and pranksters for two weeks to get the shots. . . . "Killer" Mack Gray, often dubbed Raft's bodyguard, but actually only a lifelong friend, comes into this one as natural. After they'd done the first scene together with George giving his all for the reel-grinders, Mack piped up, "George, quit trying that acting stuff in a scene with me. We've been doing O.K. just being Raft and Gray. Don't start screwing it up by trying to act!"

THE INVISIBLE AGENT

The Invisible Man was the only stripteaser ever okayed by the Hays office, since the more he shed, the less you saw. Oddly enough, even ardent admirers of Gypsy Rose Lee enjoyed the procedure; undeniably there's something fascinating about watching a pair of pants skip gaily down a road or seeing a blob of nothing smoke a cork tipped cigarette. At any rate, the Invisible Man is an old friend, and this department for one is pleased to note that he's signed up with the Govt. for the duration.

The same idea evidently hit the Axis for "The Invisible Agent" opens with a Nazi and a Jap collaborating on stealing the secret. Fortunately, they don't succeed, and the next thing they know a gent is parachuting gently earthward over Berlin in a hail of anti-aircraft shells, calmly dropping assorted jackets, trousers and socks over the landscape. He drops his last shoe and reaches the ground simultaneously, and the somewhat befuddled Nazis are left with a strictly non-ersatz wardrobe and an empty parachute. The Invisible Man skips off invisibly to do his job.

The job he's been asked to do concerns the where and when of the next Nazi attack and a full list of Axis spies loose in America. This calls for neat stepping and a bit of high class shop-lifting, especially since the Nazis get wind of the fact that an invisible spy is loose. But danger or no danger, the Invisible Man is a fellow who likes his little jokes, and he manages to spill soup over a Gestapo big-wig, kick a few stuffed shirts in the slats and raise merry mayhem with the Nazis.

The Nazis and a few spare Jap agents don't take all this lying down. As a matter of fact, it's the Japs who work out a plan to trap him. They drop a silk net lined with fish hooks over him, and our man is hooked neatly as a trout. But while the Japs and the Nazis argue over the matter of jurisdiction, the Invisible Man makes his escape with the list of Axis agents. The tale ends in a blood bath as the Jap shoots down the Nazi and then commits hara-kiri while the Invisible Man and his girl go winging out of Germany, à la Hess, in a stolen bomber.

There's a host of favorites acting out the drama. Jon Hall, bodiless for most of the picture, is the Invisible Agent; Ilona Massey, complete with body, is the girl. The menace roles are in fine hands: Sir Cedric Hardwicke, Peter Lorre, J. Edward Bromberg and Lionel Atwill fill out a quartet designed to chill the most refrigerated spines.—Univ.

P. S.

Jon Hall is visible for only 10% of the 366 scenes. . . . Peter Lorre got himself all tangled up in the 12-foot net he was supposed to toss over Hall in a capture scene. Hall showed him how to swing it so it looped out in a wide arc and made a perfect circle—a trick he learned when he was a kid in Tahiti. . . . John Fulton is the man responsible for all the trickery in a picture like this. How he does it is his secret, though special types of cameras, of his own invention, play a major part in getting special effects. Furniture-moving and doors-opening is comparatively simple, but the script calls for Jon to pop into Ilona Massey's bathroom and take a bath! Fulton had to figure out some way to show the outline of an invisible body in the water! . . . Claude Rains was the first Invisible Man. Next, Vincent Price. Then they switched, made a picture called "Invisible Woman" with Virginia Bruce in the title role. . . . Sir Cedric Hardwicke made the mistake of calling Peter Lorre "Mr. Moto." Found himself flat on his back as the result of a jiu jitsu handshake.

MISS ANNIE ROONEY

Keep your eyes on a young girl named Shirley Temple; she's a comer. She's not quite competition for Greta Garbo or Marlene Dietrich yet, but give her time; the adorable little Shirley of last year's movies is growing up into quite a looker.

"Miss Annie Rooney" brings the new Miss. Temple back to the screen, and the "Miss" is deserved for Shirley is old enough to fall in love in this one. True, it's more or less puppy love, but then there's many a case of young love that's

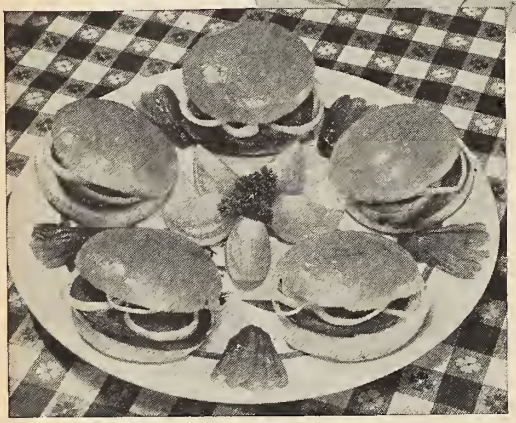
"Eatin' Out" WITH EASE

This summer, in particular, Bette Davis—next to be seen in "Now, Voyager"—plans to do all her entertaining, in informal fashion, in the peaceful patio of her home.

"The Old Oaken Bucket" filled with Fruitade is an invitation to the thirsty.



The hungry will hail these heavenly hamburgers—whether charcoal broiled in the open, or rushed out from the range—because of their super seasoning.

Since you can no longer wander far afield, make a virtue of necessity by becoming an expert on home picnics.

BY MARJORIE DEEN

This bids fair to be known as "The Summer of the Stay-at-Homes." Yes, this year, instead of wandering away from home for our week-end frolics, we are all destined to discover, for the first time, what Bette Davis and other famous Hollywoodites seem to have known all along—that there is even more fun to be found in relaxing, playing and eating in your own backyard.

Not that you should take this "backyard" business too literally. Your particular version of same may well be the front porch of a semi-attached house on a tree-bordered street—now noticeably free of motor traffic. Or it may be a de luxe penthouse terrace; or a less dressy but no less sunny apartment house roof. Or you may have discovered a shady spot on the lawn that you somehow had overlooked in years past; or a corner next to the Victory Garden where, come meal time, you find yourself conveniently close to the tomato vines! The fact remains that this summer, as never before, we will all be seeking some near-by place for our sun, fun and food.

"But remember," cautions Bette Davis who is by way of being an expert on the subject, "whether you describe it as a barbecue or dining al fresco; whether you call it a porch, lawn, penthouse, roof or patio party—it's still a picnic and no nonsense about it!" Which means, as she went on to explain, that in her opinion, informality must be the order of the day both in the kind of foods you serve and the way in which you serve them.

Bette herself is a barbecue specialist, having in her particular "back-yard" a convenient charcoal-holding, food-dispensing fireplace that in this case—as in most—adds to the garden's appearance. Many's the group of friends that has gathered here to enjoy "simply heavenly" hamburgers and other foods for which the Farnsworths are famous.

Those who don't want to go in for this barbecue business quite as thoroughly as this would do well to look into buying a portable grill. These can still be procured in all styles and sizes and prices.

You're not going to mind one bit, as Bette points out, giving up sand-strewn sandwiches, smashed-in cake, lukewarm pop or road-stand hot dogs in favor of foods served nearer home. And how swell they'll look if you set them out on a trestle table of unpainted wood, or on two or three card tables, put together and covered, as one, with red and white checked gingham or gay, shiny oilcloth.

For serving use those of your cooking utensils that will pass inspection. Pyrex glass casseroles of Spanish Rice or Macaroni and Cheese, for instance; a copper-clad skillet—the kind that comes with a cover and looks so grand—to keep chicken, ham or hamburgers hot; and a big brown pot of Baked Beans.

Other fine foods to feature are serve-yourself salads: Wooden bowls of mixed greens and raw vegetables, with a tangy French salad dressing made with a justly popular herb-flavored wine vinegar; a platter of chilled fruits nestling in lettuce cups, surrounding a bowl of golden mayonnaise. Many Hollywood hostesses also provide sandwich "fixin's" in the form of cold meat, cheese spreads, a variety of breads and other possibilities too numerous to mention but not too difficult to decide on. You should, most certainly, feature that national favorite, hamburgers—as a low cost but always welcome substitute for broiled steak. Remember, however, that no hamburgers—even sophisticated ones like the following whose special seasoning proclaim the user an epicure—can be better than the meat that goes into them. So order a good cut—top round, sirloin or chuck.

HEAVENLY HAMBURGERS: To 2 pounds of ground beef add 1 teaspoon salt, ¼ teaspoon pepper, 2 tablespoons grated onion, 1 tablespoon prepared mustard mixed with 2 tablespoons heavy cream, and ¼ teaspoon each of basil and marjoram, or ½ teaspoon of the House of Herbs mixture known as "Blend A." Work ingredients into meat, lightly, with a fork. Pat into bun-size 'burgers of desired thickness. Brown quickly on both sides so that they are crusty on the outside, rare and juicy inside. Serve on heated 'burger rolls that have been split and buttered. Provide Bermuda onion rings, sweet pickles and pickle relish.

As for beverages—with an extra-large supply of ice cubes handy—you can have them literally "by the bucketful." You'll like this cooling combination:

FLORIDA FRUITADE: Combine 2 (No. 2) cans orange-grapefruit blend, 1 can each of: unsweetened grapefruit juice, grapefruit sections and Hawaiian pineapple juice. Just before time to serve add a quart and a pint of pale ginger ale, sugar syrup to taste, plenty of crushed ice to chill, sprigs of mint to garnish.

The way things are today, golden Fels-Naptha Soap is, more than ever, a real bargain. There's no better—or safer—way to dislodge ground-in grime, or remove destructive perspiration stains. The Fels combination of gentle naptha and richer golden soap does a thorough job—in a jiffy—without harsh, ruinous rubbing.

This young woman will find Fels-Naptha a better soap than she remembers. Making richer suds. Making them quicker. More helpful in reducing the wear and tear of washday . . . By the way—have you tried today's Fels-Naptha Soap?

ended at the altar. It's possible. Don't be surprised to see Miss Temple married in one of her forthcoming pictures. If someone doesn't grab her, the script writers aren't what they used to be.

But meanwhile in "Miss Annie Rooney," Shirley is still dallying with the younger set. There's a gallant attempt in the picture to make the high school crowd out to be more than just a bunch of jitter-buggers. They jit and they bug all right, but surprisingly and truly enough they also read Shaw—George Bernard. Annie carries on long telephone conversations with her friend Myrtle concerning "Candida," "Pygmalion" and life in general; and yearns for a fellow who can discuss literature intelligently.

Sure enough she meets Marty who can not only quote Shakespeare but also happens to be rich and something of a man about town. That's the rub; he's rich, and Annie is from across the tracks. From then on the picture moves into more familiar territory. Annie is snubbed and insulted by the rich snobs. Her father, a good guy with harebrained schemes, breaks into a rather select little party to demonstrate a new rubber invention of his to Marty's father, a big rubber executive. Everything blows up but is nicely mended again when the rubber invention proves worthwhile.

While somewhat old hat, "Miss Annie Rooney" is warmly and enthusiastically played. Miss Temple catches some of the innocence and wonder of first love; and Dickie Moore, as the sober and serious Marty, is not cut from a conventional pattern. Peggy Ryan and Roland Dupree, as two of Annie's more exuberant friends, almost steal the picture; they look and sound real. William Gargan, as the father, manages a familiar role with a sincerity that lifts it out of the ruck; he's one of the few actors, this Gargan, who looks natural in shirt sleeves. Guy Kibbee, Jonathan Hale and Gloria Holden complete the cast.

"Miss Annie Rooney" is adolescent drama a cut above the usual and a cut below what it should have been. It's a picture for the whole family with shares of laughter, heartbreak and entertainment for everyone. The new note it strikes is that high school students read; someday they'll get around to proving that in a college picture, too. Sometimes it seems as if they only go to the movies. —U. A.

P. S.

Shirley celebrated her 14th birthday during production by tossing a party for the kiddies of the Pan-American consuls stationed in Los Angeles. . . . Papa George Temple gave her a small diamond ring; Mamma came through with a 17th Century butterfly pin, a third dimension camera, some perfume and a couple of China figurines of the particular type Shirley is collecting. . . . Four hours a day, production shut down while all the youngsters in the picture went to school. . . . Six teachers, paid by the studio, saw to it that the young'uns got their daily fill of education . . . Shirley confided to Harry Kronman, who writes her radio scripts, that she's most anxious to translate her air-lanes character of "Junior Miss" to the cinema if and when some studio lays out the current asking price of $300,000 for the rights. . . . Bill Gargan spends all his time away from work at the desert, riding and playing tennis. He got too tan and had to have his skin lightened a couple of shades before he could step in front of the cameras.

WINGS FOR THE EAGLE

The boys on the production line, the boys with the hammers, come up for another inning in "Wings For The Eagle." It's a picture of airplane workers, filmed at Lockheed, and it is a curious blend of documentary and conventional film fare. In some ways the documentary comes off the better of the two, for it's real, convincing and dramatic; there's little in the way of Hollywood plots that can compete with the sight of a bomber coming off the production line and roaring into a cloud filled sky, and there's no dialogue in the film half so tense and exciting as the sound of a harsh, blasting riveting machine.

Against the reality of Lockheed, "Wings For The Eagle" can only pit a cooked-up plot which has served before in dozens of other pictures. It's a triangle story; one angle is Dennis Morgan, cocky, a little smug, with a way with women and an eye strictly for the number one boy. Angle two (rather nicely curved) is Ann Sheridan, hard-minded, loyal and good to look at. Jack Carson, as Ann's husband, fills out the triangle; a nice fellow, but weak-willed and with only his love for Ann as a shield against Dennis. Mix well as before, and you have, more or less, the story of "Wings For The Eagle."

The complaint is not against the picture as it is, but a sigh for what it might have been. Some of you may have seen a short with James Stewart about the Army Air Corps, and it was surely entertaining; but always within the frame of its material and always with its purpose in view. In "Wings For The Eagle" production stops while the boy

Keep the Blitz from Your Baby!

Poor little China baby, scared of war so close and dreadful. What's to prevent that happening here, in your town, to YOUR baby?

Men can't prevent it—even big tough soldiers—unless they have tanks, planes, ships, guns . . . more of them, bigger ones, better ones, than any in the hands of the enemy.

And the supplies and machines for successful war cost money. Will you help?

How to buy a share in VICTORY . . .

Where's the money coming from?
YOU'RE going to chip it in, out of the money you are getting TODAY. Instead of spending it all, you're going to lend some of it to Uncle Sam. He'll put it to work for America. He will give you a written promise to pay it back in 10 years, with interest (2.9% a year). If that promise isn't good, nothing's good. But because this is America, it IS good.

How can you chip in?
By buying War Savings Bonds. You can buy one today for $18.75. It is worth $25.00 when Uncle Sam pays you back in 10 years.

INSTALLMENT payments?
Yes! If you can't spare $18.75 today, buy War Savings Stamps for 10¢ or 25¢ or 50¢. Ask for a Stamp book, save a bookful of Stamps, then exchange them for a War Savings Bond.

What IS a BOND?
A piece of legal paper, official promise from Uncle Sam that he'll pay you back your money plus interest. The Bond will be registered in your name. Keep it safely put away.

Can you CASH a Bond?
Yes, any time 60 days after you buy it, if you get in a jam and need money, you can cash a Bond (at Post Office or bank).

WHERE can you buy War Savings Bonds and Stamps?
At your nearest Post Office. At a bank. At many stores all over the country.

WHEN?
Our enemies have been getting ready for the past 7 or 8 years. Are you going to wait till they get nearer our kids?

and girl take time out for a few kisses.

It's with the secondary characters that the picture really puts in heavy slugs for our side. Jake Hanso (George Tobias) is a loving portrait of a foreign born workman, a wizard with his hands, in love with his adopted country. And Pete, his son (Russell Arms), is typical of the great mass of young Americans, keen, eager, willing and as native to the scene as a Mayflower descendant. Jake and Pete are as good and true as the rivets, steel and sweat that go into every plane. The devil take all Hollywood plots as long as those bombers keep coming off the line on schedule, or ahead.—W. B.

P. S.

Warner Bros. was the only studio in Hollywood to get permission to set up their cameras along the production line at the Lockheed Aircraft Plant. . . . Officials of the plane plant read and approved the script. . . . Every bit of celluloid the camera ground out was shipped to Washington for an okay. Not a single foot of film was deleted. . . . No studio worker was allowed to enter the huge aircraft plant until he'd had his birth certificate and evidences of citizenship checked and double-checked. . . . Annie Sheridan was made an honorary member of the Aircraft Women's Club, a group of wives of Lockheed workers . . . The plant is only half-a-mile from the studio, and the planes the workers turn out are constantly roaring and maneuvering over the Warner Bros. Lot. . . . Producer Robert Lord left to join the armed forces the day the picture was completed. . . . Oddest job went to dwarf Billy Mitchell, who played the part of a worker on the P-38s. He can enter cubicles too small for normal-sized men to squeeze into. . . . After the picture was finished, Jack Carson and Dennis Morgan went back to the plant and put on a song-and-dance act for the Lockheed Employees Recreational Club—8000 members. . . . This is the film that cut into the honeymoon time of Mr. and Mrs. George Brent. Between scenes she studied the script for her next film, "George Washington Slept Here" and chatted with hubby George, who was working on the next sound stage.

DEEP IN THE HEART OF TEXAS

"Deep in the Heart of Texas" begins in Chicago, which, the last time we looked, was pretty deep in the heart of Illinois. But the picture soon jolts rapidly South by railroad, steamboat and stagecoach. Time: just after the Civil War. Place: you guessed it, Texas. Music: Dixie and—

Deep in the heart of Texas; clap, clap, clap, clap.

It tells the tale of Barry Conovan, a brilliant young Chicago reporter who has been sent South to cover the biggest post-war story of the year—the reconstruction period in Texas. He finds a country still bitter, still smouldering with hatred and contempt for the Yankee; it's an armed and hostile camp. The only bright spot in the picture is one of his co-passengers aboard the stagecoach, Miss Jane Scott, blonde, beautiful and wilful. Barry is one who knows his bright spots, and before the stagecoach goes very far into the sagebrush, he and Miss Scott are talking of a good deal more than the weather.

But Miss Scott is more than just beautiful. She's the daughter of Major Calvert Scott, an old friend of Sam Houston and a fierce Texan patriot. Miss Scott knows, among other things, the whereabouts of various caches of arms, and she's not far from knowing a good deal about the rebel groups which hadn't given up fighting the war. As a matter of fact, she's the fiancée of a gent named Henry Clay Jackson, a strong son of Texas and a suspected leader of the raiders. Miss Scott is not quite so innocent as she appears to be, as Barry soon discovers.

And this Henry Clay Jackson is not quite what he seems, either. He's fooled Jane Scott, Major Scott and Bob Scott, Jane's kid brother who hero-worships him, into believing that he's a Texas patriot. But in reality, he's feathering his own nest, mulcting the people of Texas and gathering power. He's not above kidnapping Barry when the reporter gets a bit too warm on the trail; and he's equal to shooting down young Scott in cold blood when the kid threatens to expose him. He knows a lot of tricks, all of them dirty.

But Barry knows a thing or two, also. He manages to let his paper know what's going on through newspaper code; and he escapes to warn the small garrison of Federal troops. It all winds up in slam-bang style with Texas saved for the Union, Jackson brought to justice and Barry deep in the arms of luscious Jane Scott.

It's neat drama, swift moving, interesting and entertaining; it's a combination of the Old South theme crossed with the good old familiar, rip-roaring Western and, in tune with the times, a message of democracy. Robert Stack, Anne Gwynne, Ralph Bellamy and Jackie Cooper handle the main assignments. Obviously "Deep in the Heart of Texas" is a four clap picture; clap, clap, clap, clap.—Univ.

P. S.

Not once during the entire picture will you hear four hand-claps. . . . Technical adviser for the film was Scout Frank Murphy, 84 years old, an Indian fighter in the '70s and a pal of Buffalo Bill Cody's. . . . Coincidence Dept.: Broderick Crawford has discovered that every dressing room he's ever been assigned to has been used by his mother, Helen Broderick, before him. . . . Both Bob Stack and Leo Carrillo belong to pioneer California families who have been friends for generations. Leo used to jounce Bob up and down on his knee when Stack was a tiny tot. They both got a tremendous kick playing in the same film together. . . . John Litel's character is patterned after Producer George Waggner's wife's grandfather, an officer in the Confederate Army. . . . Jackie Cooper wasn't too keen about his role at first. The script made him a 16-year-old kid. The writers heard about it and simply changed the descriptive line to read "20-year-old.". . . Heroine Anne Gwynne is a real Texas gal and rides like one.

PARDON MY SARONG

It takes more than cannibals, assorted typhoons, runaway motorboats or stolen buses to stop the triumphant march of Abbott and Costello. In "Pardon My Sarong," they shamelessly poach on the claim of Miss Dorothy Lamour, and while Lou Costello is not apt to take the place of the beauteous Dotty in your affections, he's a sure bet for a lot more laughs.

Made to the same formula as previous Abbott and Costello epics, the picture mixes music with gags, love interest with comedy and excitement in the midst of belly laughs. Snaps Abbott quick as a flash: "Why don't you knock on the door before you go in?" Says Costello: "I don't know—I just don't give a rap any more."

The story rockets at a crazy pace from gag to gag and eventually (don't ask how) gets involved with the aforementioned cannibals and the previously noted sarong. To add a touch of madness to their natural insanity, Abbott and Cos-

JOAN CRAWFORD

You'd never dream she harbored the soul of a homebody to watch her jive through Col.'s new "They All Kissed the Bride"! Hoofed for the first time in 10 years, went at it so vigorously she sprained her back. Passed her huge $112,500 salary check on to charity. Despite Glenn Ford's constant calls on the set, she insists, "I won't marry any man until the war ends." Plans to settle down, anyway, with two adopted kids, Christina, 3, and Christopher, 15 mos. Is marketing for a 400-acre Pa. farm to replace N. Y. as her getting-away-from-it-all haven, seeing no one, going nowhere, devoting her entire time to reading, resting, writing up her life and times for publication, centering all that Crawford talent on 2 lucky kids!

GARY COOPER

Coop was a young man who went East before he went West and that was what started all the trouble. Off to merrie England for most of his book larnin', and fetched up that-a-way, Gary never did have much to do with the fine art of swinging a bat or covering the field. So when Samuel Goldwyn chose him for the role of baseball's beloved Lou Gehrig in "The Pride of the Yankees," soon to be released by RKO, Gary not only had to learn Big League lingo, but home-run technique as well. Worse, he had to roll 'em off the bat left-handed, Gehrig having been one of the staunchest southpaws going. Gary's society-bred missus faithfully supplied the main cheering section. But it was the pride of the Coopers, their 4½-year-old girl Maria Veronica who rooted loudest of all!

GENE TIERNEY

"NO!" she exclaimed heatedly to a tactless unbeliever. "I am NOT a half-breed!" Gene says she's been cast in so many slanty-eyed roles since "Sundown," she's beginning to wonder herself. Her latest role in real life was that of prodigal daughter's return. Mom and Pop Tierney somehow got to know their new son-in-law, Oleg Cassini, a little better, decided maybe he wasn't such a bad guy after all, called the whole tiff off. Gene celebrated, paid off the mortgage on the family homestead in Connecticut, gave it to her parents as a slight $15,000 token. She'll still steer clear of the family's fancy society ties, preferring her genuine career and newly citizenized husband. BARBARA STANWYCK

She and magnificent mate, Bob Taylor, kind of liked their out-of-the-way ranch farm until they discovered how really out of the way it was when studio time sheets ordered nine o'clock promptness. Besides, Barbara had set her heart on a diamond bracelet for her birthday, but she got a fair-sized mooing cow instead! So it was back to Beverly Hills for Barb and Bob, and how much more like the real thing to the Brooklyn born ex-chorus queen who's now showing the gang back home that she can really act. Currently it's in "The Gay Sisters" for Warners'. Still a sucker for sentiment, Barb adores her nine-year-old son, Dion, whom she adopted when she was still Mrs. Frank Fay, because she knew too well what it was to be an uncared for orphan.

RONALD COLMAN

"I saw Mr. Colman and the play at a disadvantage. The curtain was up."

So wrote the reviewer of Ronnie's first stage play. And he's hung on to it ever since, to keep him humble! Thinks the public would be bored with more than one pic of him a year. But after Col.'s "The Talk of the Town" watch 'em clamor for 12 per annum. So terrified of being dull, he economically keeps his speeches clipped down to a 40-word limit. Loves to dance but claims the rumba and tango are altogether too much for his coordination. Lives in a modest 8 or 9 room house, lounges around in odd jackets and slacks, gob bles Italian and French food to his heart's content, but hasn't gained an ounce in the past 20 years!

IS STIRLING HAYDEN married to MADELEINE CARROLL?

Modern Screen tracks this "global" guy from Iceland to Nassau to bring you the hottest scoop since he left Hollywood!

THERE was a flurry round Hollywood a couple of weeks back. Word got abroad that Stirling Hayden was in town. Columnists broke it, together with the item that he and Madeleine Carroll were married. One said Madeleine was with him. One said he'd come to outfit a boat and sail her to the West Indies. One really stuck his neck out—Stirling, he said, was returning to the screen.

They were all guessing. None of them had seen Hayden. Their information came to them out of the blue. Nobody saw Hayden who was willing to admit it. He was probably here on government business. Madeleine was probably not with him. Even if they're married, the government rarely encourages brides to accompany their husbands on secret missions.

Which sends us back to the starting point. Are they married? We'll leave it to you to base your opinion, as we have, on the facts. We refuse to climb out on a limb with the Messrs. Winchell and Fidler. Ours is the skeptical and inquiring mind. Until the principals quit being coy or our own greedy eyes scan a copy of the marriage record, we won't say they're married. But you can't be hanged for thinking.

Here's what we know. Those who held the best observation posts say that Stirling made no bones about being head over heels in love with Madeleine. Now that he's gone, even Hollywood admits what once it blandly denied. Hollywood, don't forget, is the place where you're told that the girl doesn't even know the guy, and next day they're being hitched in Yuma.

Trying to get Hayden to talk about girls was inviting mayhem. Yet the press did wring a statement from him. Yes, he conceded on one occasion, there was a special girl.—You don't say so! The studio was positively wide-eyed. Well, it must be that girl he met in Tahiti—

Whether she was the figment of a press agent's dream doesn't matter now. Nor why the truth had to be suppressed. Maybe they were playing along with Hayden, who loathed the public touch on his private life. Maybe they thought his romantic stock might go higher, were he kept unattached. Maybe it was love unrequited at the time, and they feared lest Stirling's fans pull Madeleine's hair out. Whatever the reason, his love was in Tahiti then, conveniently remote. Now they admit it was Madeleine all along.

There was never any doubt in the minds of the people who saw them together in Nassau while they were making "Bahama Passage." (Continued on following page)

To the best of our knowledge, Stirling's secret-missioning in the schooner, "We're Here," above, in port at Nassau. He's proud as Punch of his membership in Gloucester Moster Mariner's Assoc.!

It stuck out all over Stirling, generally self-contained as an oyster. In Hollywood, conscious of the Argus-eyed press, he bent over backward to divert suspicion. In Nassau he relaxed. You had only to see the guy look at her once, they said, to get all the answers. They grew used to the sight of him prowling the roads after dark, sometimes alone, sometimes with Madeleine. You couldn't have asked for a more idyllic setting than the moonlight and palms, nor a finer looking pair of blondes strolling hand in hand under them.

It was after Stirling left Hollywood that things began to happen. First, his mother went to live with Madeleine. Mrs. Hayden isn't one of your helpless females. She's a woman of intelligence and strength, as independent as her son. Financial provision had been made for her by his settlement with Paramount. Here was no question of, what shall I do with Mother, someone's got to look after her. She could very well have looked after herself.

And even if she couldn't, why should Madeleine be elected? Movie stars, however well-disposed, don't share establishments with the mothers of just-a-friend. People like the Haydens don't put themselves under obligation. The arrangement argued a close bond somewhere, and it could hardly be between the girl and the boy's mother. Not that close. They knew that such a move would rouse speculation. They knew and obviously didn't care. Which is (Continued on page 60)

Junior Miss

Shirley is "Little Bug" in school, but wears lipstick Saturday nights just to remind you she's a definite menace about town!

She wears a navy dress, V-necked, and a white sweater, its sleeves pushed back. That's the everyday uniform of the Westlake School for Girls. She wears a red ribbon round her chestnut hair, a thin gold bracelet and a V-for-Victory pin. If you notice that the arms of the pin are inscribed respectively S and T, she says: "M-hm. Abbreviation for street." That's Shirley, who liked her joke even at four.

She has the comedian's dry way of tossing them off, which makes the jokes sound funnier than they are. Rehearsing a "Junior Miss" program, the director found he'd failed to assign a tough-guy part.

"I'll do him," offered the treble-voiced star.

He threw her an appraising look. "I don't want him that hardboiled—"

"Oh," murmured Shirley, "—a three-minute yegg."

People used to wonder what she'd he like at fourteen. They couldn't draw comparisons, for Shirley's case was unique. No (Continued on page 73)

1934 Adolphe Menjou held Shirley up high in "Little Miss Marker," her first big role for which she was poid $150 o week. After the picture wos releosed, she jumped to $1250.

1935 Shirley's golden ringlets mode their first appeorance in "The Little Colonel," storting o wave of golden ringlets an children's dolls and would-be Shirleys throughout the world.

By IDA ZEITLIN

1938 Jane Darwell sympathized in "Little Miss Broadway." Same year, Shirley picnicked with Mrs. Roosevelt, chatted with N.Y.'s Lehmans, Box Officed No. 1 for her 4th straight year.

1940 "The Blue Bird" teamed Eddie Collins and Gale Sondergaard, ran a $2,000,000 Technicolor bill. Shirley, 12, retired with a $3,000,000 trust fund and plans to return at 16.

1941 But acting was in Shirley's blood, and the following year, "Kathleen," with the "new Temple" and Felix Bressart was released. Now she was attending a swank girls' seminary.

1937 Vic McLaglen and Douglas Scott shared honors in "Wee Willie Winkie." Shirley left for Bermuda with 3 bodyguards, 2 toy dolls. TCF insured her for $1,685,000.

1942 The current year brings "Miss Annie Rooney" and her policeman father, William Gargan. Just turned 14, Shirley's sandbagged her famous oversized doll house for use as a cozy family air raid shelter.

1936 In "Poor Little Rich Girl," stars Jack Haley and Alice Faye rated only second billing. Shirley's pop quit his bank job to agent for her, mom turning manager.

JOHNNY APOLLO

By KIRTLEY BASKETTE

THE blue Pacific breaker curled, boomed and shot toward the beach in a hiss of white suds. Riding it in on a surfboard was a tall, grinning Adonis—Mr. John Howard Payne of the movies.

When you gander John Payne in shorts it's hard to understand why they rave about Johnny Weissmuller or Vic Mature. The guy has shoulders like the Brooklyn Bridge, a wasp waist and muscles in his arms and legs like steel springs. If you go for statistics—he's six feet three, weighs 194, stripped, with a 30 waist and a 45 chest—quite a hunk of man. He looks like Li'l Abner, with a more intelligent expression about the face.

A big guy like John Payne needs plenty of room. He lives alone in a five-bedroom beach house with the Pacific Ocean for a front yard, but he's fretting to get away to his new ranch in the Malibu mountains. He sleeps in a special built double-double bed, wide enough for an army squad. He eats four meals a day and gets a suffocated feeling in night clubs. Every now and then he breaks away from town and deliberately loses himself in the Sierras, just to get enough fresh air and elbow room. He's never had the top up on his convertible, and he flew a plane up where there aren't any traffic lights, until the war stopped him. It takes 4½ yards to make his suits. He wears a size 17 shirt. His favorite retort is, "Don't crowd me!"

Since the John Payne-Anne Shirley split, daughter Julie Ann's been staying with her mom. Adores coming down to the shore to see her dod and play on the sand couple times a week.

It took six years for Hollywood really to discover John Payne. Five studios tried to pin him to a satisfied existence, before one succeeded. He's made nine pictures in the past eighteen months, which is one every eight weeks, and in that time he's also scribbled reams of stories, blocked out scores of songs, pursued a couple dozen hobbies, developed a bunch of muscles most people don't know they have, both earned and spent sizable hunks of money. He's made a new bachelor life for himself when his marriage broke up. Right now he's giving Hollywood's postmen lumbago toting around enough Payne fan mail to swayback a mule. Everything John does is of epic proportions.

John picked up the surfboard as if it were a shingle that had slipped off the roof and extended his free paw in a bonecrushing welcome. After the first panorama of Payne, you forget the muscles. You're struck with the surprisingly boyish face that beams amiably above the Lionel Strongfort build. John's face is almost pretty, with frank hazel eyes and unruly black hair. (Continued on following page)

He's kept TCF. on pins and needles risking his neck an skis, plane trips and matarcycles. One particularly bad smash-up led studia to tack verboten an cycles af all descriptians!

Prior ta actual marine explaratian, Payne gets in practise far the briny by prowling araund an the battam of his private swimming paal, equipped with a diver's helmet!

Fun to be free? MODERN SCREEN scoops the first look-see into John Payne's return to Bachelordom Unlimited . . .

He talks softly and says what he thinks. "Boy, you're sure out of luck if you're hunting a story," he told me. "I'm the most abnormally normal guy in this town."

I'd heard that John Payne was a tough customer. A lot of people consider him stand-offish, a bit stuffy and maybe a little hostile. That's not true at all—but he could give that impression easily enough. That's because he's not the kind of fellow to fit into a Hollywood pattern. John is a Virginia gentleman whom an accident turned into an actor and fate delivered to Hollywood. But he's still a gentleman and insists on living like one.

He's living at Santa Monica, right down the strand from Marion Davies, Harold Lloyd, Norma Shearer and the rest of Hollywood's old line beach set and their mansions. John has never met them. He moved to the beach when his marriage with Shirley busted up. With his Filipino man, Jerry, he rattles around in the big place, living mostly in the front room, one bedroom and the kitchen. "I'll dress and mix you a 'honey-Scotch,'" offered John. "It's my favorite drink. I made it up. Nobody likes it but me," he grinned.

Waiting for the Payne-killer and for John to whip into Levi denims, slippers and an old checked shirt, I looked over the lair of this easy-going guy who has all the gals from Seattle to South Key in a tizzy. The place is a rented one, but it reflects what John Payne considers important in life. It's patterned primarily for comfort, culture and self-conditioning.

The furniture is big, man-sized and arranged for use. Scattered around the front room are piles of books, stacks of records. A collection of well-seasoned pipes and John's array of guns (he's got almost as many rifles and sporting pieces as Clark Gable), sporting prints, camera equipment, fishing gear, badminton rackets, a battered typewriter, all reveal his working hobbies. Ash trays are handy in the Payne menage and coasters, too. It's a masculine place, with boxing gloves and other athletic equipment stacked here and there.

John got his physique the hard way, plowing the family plantation and earning his cakes and coffee later on in the not-so-gentlemanly grunt-and-groan racket. You've probably never heard of Tiger Jack Payne or a wild Indian called The Masked Marvel or Alexei Petroff, the Savage of the Steppes. But John was all of those as a professional wrestler in his impecunious Columbia College days around New York. He got his exercise also bouncing bums from a Broadway pool parlor and keeping the atmosphere genteel and refined at a social club on 125th Street and Lenox Avenue. The only scars he has are a mended foot, some out-of-place knuckles and a few bumps here and there. Since his active youth, John has taken care of his body beautiful. In fact, it's one of his prime concerns.

"When I'm out of condition, I louse up everything," is the way he puts the "sound mind in sound body" idea. When he was idling in Hollywood a while back John let himself soar up to 218 pounds. He couldn't think, couldn't sleep, couldn't work and couldn't enjoy himself. Now he exercises more than Gene Tunney. The out-of-condition era was, incidentally, only a brief lapse. (Continued on page 64)

After nursing a severe cold for 1½ months, he showed up for "Footlight Serenade" beach scenes in a deadly pallor. Had to be plastered with deep brown make-up to out-tan Groble!

An inveterate bookworm, Johnny's stocked his bookshelves to the ceiling. Reads virtually every stage play published (averages one a day) and rarely shows on the set without a book.

IT ALL started the afternoon Laraine sauntered into Schwab's Drug Store, ordered a chocolate float and asked, "Anybody know a wolf?"

"Stick around," answered Joe from behind the fountain. "They amble in on an average of two and a half a minute. What kind do you want?"

"One that sings tenor," said Miss Day.

The gang at Schwab's stopped sipping their sodas long enough to ask details.

"It's very simple," Laraine explained. "I've just done a tricky little job called 'Lame Brains and Daffodils.' It starts out with the story of Goldilocks but Little Red Ridinghood and the wolf get mixed up in it, surrealist fashion. I had a wonderful wolf lined up for the part but the army got him first."

None of Laraine's friends raised an eyebrow at her sally into amateur theatricals. She'd been writing three-act musicals for quite a while . . . directing and producing them with the care of a Korda . . . watching the makeshift curtain rise with butterflies in her stomach and little devils pounding her temples. The finished product may not have been Great Theater, but it was always as gay and lissome as Laraine herself.

"Do you suppose Ray Hendricks would play the part?" somebody asked. "Yes . . . how about it?" the others chorused. "You know, he's sung around the country with Bob Crosby. They used to have a quartette. Did a stint with Benny Goodman, too."

"And Ted Fio Rito," Joe added. "Lasted at the Grove for two full years."

Laraine listened. Ray Hendricks again. Who was this heaven-sent masculine morsel they were always dangling in front of her nose? When friends told Ray about the amateur production that needed a wolf, he mumbled something about being tied up . . . then changed his mind when (Continued on page 85)

FORBES: "There they come—down, quick!"

FIVE STRANDED R.A.F.'ERS FIGHT FOR THEIR LIVES IN THE HEART OF NAZI GERMANY!

STORY The British Flying Fortress "D for Danny" crash-landed in the Black Forest, her skipper dead and Flight Lieutenant Terry Forbes (Errol Flynn) at her controls. But not before she had completed her mission. Not before she had dumped her bombs neatly on a certain vital rail intersection.

Four of a crew who had left England tonight lay dead amid blazing wreckage. But five of them were left, five prisoners to be herded into nearby Arnswalde for questioning. Forbes. The American, Johnny Hammond (Ronald Reagan). Lloyd Hollis (Ronald Sinclair), whose dad had been an ace one war ago. Big Kirk Edwards (Alan Hale). And Jed Forrest (Arthur Kennedy), that accurate and scientific Canadian.

A certain Major Otto Baumeister (Raymond Massey) was the little king of Arnswalde; its Nazi despot, who asked questions and expected them to be answered.

Until he realized that from his office window these swine had spotted odd activity near an underground Messerschmitt plant camouflaged as a peaceful hillside, Baumeister even tried bribes (Continued on page 70)

BAUMEISTER: "Get more men—circle this areo tharaughly."

PRODUCTION There isn't a single love scene in the script of "Desperate Journey," but this is Nancy Coleman's first picture with Great Lover Errol Flynn, so Director Raoul Walsh decided to give her a break.

"In the next scene, Nancy," he told her, "you're seeing Errol perhaps for the last time. I think it'd warm it up a bit if you'd throw your arms around him impulsively as he turns to go, and kiss him. Then kiss him again, and the second time, give it the old Cubanola."

"All right," said Miss Coleman.

They rehearsed the scene once, twice, four times all together, with Nancy going through the prescribed actions. Then they shot the scene—with no film in the camera. Someone told her, later, that the whole thing had been a gag; that the scene would never appear in the picture.

"And I tried so hard," Nancy was (Continued on page 72)

She tipped us off first about that surprise wedding—and we're giving it to you smack off our Hollywood ticker!

"Jeepers, I wish I were in love," Pat Lane would tell you a few months ago, giving you the wistful blue eyes. Look, you'd think, who's wishing. She's never anything but in love. There's practically a groove in that third finger left hand from all the engagement rings she's worn in her day, not to mention a wedding ring—but briefly.

"I mean really in love. Forever and ever," she'd say softly, and then you knew she wasn't kidding. "Oh, lots of times I've thought, 'This is It,' but each time I've called it wrong. One mistake meant a divorce, and a couple have meant giving back engagement rings. Next time I'm going to be so sure."

Rosemary would explain it this way: "Pat is such a darned romantic, she wants to work every passing fancy into a little vine-covered cottage with dotted swiss tie-backs in the kitchen. I don't know what I'm doing married. I'm the career woman. She's the born wife and mother."

"Born wife and mother—" Pat would scoff, giving a refined version of the Bronx cheer. "She kills me. I'm not domestic at all. I'm an awful cook, and I'm scared stiff to hold a baby. (Continued on page 67)

-UP MAGIC . . .

BY CAROL CARTER

mascara, eye shadow and eyebrow crayon. You can use all of these, too, when you are pretty-ing yourself for a very special date.

POWDER BASE—A good powder base is a wonderful magician. Suntan shades of your favorite foundation cream or lotion will make a gypsy of you with the stroke of your fingertips. Paint on the color in smooth even layers and look as if you spend all your days lazily dawdling on the beach. If your problem is the opposite, and your summer glamour depends on covering up a forehead or nose you left in the sun too long, a light cream-shade foundation will do it for you. Always remember to change the color of your neck and throat to match your face, so they look as if they belong to you and not to someone else!

ROUGE—Most movie stars use cream rouge because they find it stays on longer. That's something to think of these summer days when make-up seems to wilt away. Why not use cream or stick rouge at home, and a cake type for touch-up jobs? Remember that the cream and stick go on after powder base and before powdering—and dry rouge is used over the powder. The cream and stick rouges should be dotted over your cheeks and then blended smoothly into the skin. Dry rouge should be patted on lightly and then covered with a film of powder. Do the job right and even a close-up won't show if you came by that luscious coloring naturally or with outside help.

If your face is broad, start the rouge way over at the nose and bring it in an upward line back to the hair. The color should be slightly heavier towards the center of the face to make it seem more oval.

If your face is narrow, and you want to accent its width, start the rouge about the middle of the cheek (under the center of the eye) and use it more heavily towards the sides of the face. Rouging the lobes of the ears, too, will help increase the apparent width.

If your face is long, place your rouge lower on the cheeks and extend it down quite far—almost to the jawbone. The continuous line will appear to shorten some of the length.

If your face is too short, keep the rouge high so you don't look as if you are all cheeks and no chin.

Always extend your rouge back so you "lose it in your hairline" as one Hollywood expert says. An abrupt line of red in front of the hair makes an unattractive profile, which we sometimes forget to notice unless we have a sideview mirror.

Here's something else you can do with your dry rouge. If your complexion is (Continued on page 76)

Take care to match your face powder to your summer skin or your sun-tan make-up base.

Moscara is as important as lipstick to a glamorous movie star. Use it yourself to dazzle your audience with sparkling eyes.

Lipstick has a magic touch when it's used with a deft hand. Choose bright, gay shades for flattery, and a creamy texture for protection.

No Jane Withers scandal! Autry rodeos curbed! Grable's fan mail in lead!

Wedding bells are expected to peal any day now for Norma Sheorer and her Sun Valley ski instructor, Free Frenchman Morty Arrouge. They beamed at Mocambo.

Double Trouble

Whew! That's over! The scandal of Jane Withers has been cleared up and all of Hollywood is breathing easier. Hardly seems possible that our sweet Janie could find herself smack in the middle of a situation that would cause her friends to thrash her with criticism and her fans to hurl shocked and angry letters at her youthful head. Yet it happened, and Jane still shudders when she thinks about it.

"There I was," Jane told us, "minding my own business, when all of a sudden I began to receive gobs of letters and anonymous phone calls from people who accused me of indulging in vice! They said I ought to be ashamed of myself, and they said my mother ought to be ashamed, too, for allowing her youthful daughter to make a public display of herself in every drugstore in the country!

"Mother and I were stunned. We couldn't imagine what I had done. Until one morning I opened a note from a fan and found a magazine ad attached. Then I understood. A big cigarette company was conducting a national campaign, and the girl they were using in their advertising was a dead-ringer for me!

"I've been busy ever since, trying to explain to everyone that I don't even like cigarettes! But how am I going to convince the man who wrote me a sympathetic six-page letter—yes, six pages—telling me what to do to break myself of the habit even if I smoked three packs a day!"

Livvy de Havilland's black cottons were the hit at the Victory Caravan. Face-making Charles Bayer won laurels for his curtain speech on why he became a U. S. citizen.

Victory Caravaners Joan Blondell and Frances Langford worried Bob Hope stiff telling about the one small dressing room most theaters provided for all 17 gal stars.

That Foreign Dame

For a big boisterous boy, Vic Mature has been surprisingly quiet about his latest romance. We might have had no inkling of it had not a friend of ours encountered Vic coming out of a Beverly Hills toy shop the other P.M. with a box of candy under one arm, and a stuffed Dumbo doll, tagged "For Michele," under the other. A bit of probing disclosed the fact that both armfuls were intended for Miss Michele Morgan, a chum of Vic's from 'way back.

The first time Vic saw Michele he was still a bachelor, and she was a cute trick just off the boat from France. He winked at her across the heads of lunchers in the RKO commissary, and she winked back. Later he maneuvered an introduction, only to find she understood no English. He considered dating her but abandoned the idea because he likes to talk, and he couldn't see any glamour in an evening spent staring mutely at a girl who could only snap her eyelids in response. When they met after that Vic always grinned and called her "that foreign dame." Those were among the first words of English Michele learned.

Then Vic went to New York, and while he was gone Michele worked like a demon learning this strange new language. When he returned, Michele was ready for their date. But Vic brought a bride with him, and the date never came off. Michele admits she forgot Vic—until the Matures separated several months ago, and she met him again.

At this writing their friendship had budded into a several-times-weekly affair. Yet, we have a hunch it's going to wind up the way it started—with Vic winking at Michele and Michele winking back—at Buck Private V. Mature, off to a U. S. army camp.

Harmony-minded Dave Rose and Judy Garland (all recouped from her strep throat) guested at songwriter Jimmy McHugh's shindig in honor of composer Hoagy Carmichael at the Beverly Hills Hotel.

Off the Record

When Nelson Eddy goes to Heaven there will probably be no angel chorus to greet him. For if the sweet singers ever look down from their celestial perches and scan Nelson's earthly box office record, chances are, they will be too abashed to do anything more than hide behind the pearly gates and refuse to utter another chirp.

Uh, huh, Nelson's done it again. At the close of the 1941-42 concert season, he finds himself sitting pretty—right on top of a musical heap consisting of Lily Pons, Marion Anderson, James Melton, Paul Robeson and other similarly talented people. According to "Variety," the bible of the entertainment world, Nelson is the top star in the sharp-and-flat field. His phonograph recordings and concert and radio appearances are the signal for more people to lay out more dough than they will for any other music-maker.

It is estimated that in the past year Nelson's golden voice trilled him into a $350,000 income—an amount exclusive of his M-G-M movie earnings! Since this total was revealed before Nelson signed his new radio contract at a reputed $5,000 a week, you can figure it out from there!

However, not all of this lovely lettuce will find its way into Nelson's pockets. We hear he is planning to turn over every penny he receives from his radio broadcasts to Army and Navy Relief Funds. Nothing half-way about our Nelson!

Gals Behind the Guns

Pvt. Bill Holden, passing through Hollywood on his way from California's Ft. MacArthur, to New Jersey's Ft. Monmouth, brought with him a copy of "The Alert," the camp newspaper in which the MacArthur boys voted on the ten women who are their greatest inspiration in their fight for freedom. Wanna know who the lucky ladies are? Just keep reading!

(1) Mother. (2) Wife or sweetheart. (3) Daughter. (4) Sister. (5) Mrs. Franklin D. Roosevelt. (6) Mrs. Douglas MacArthur. (7) Queen Elizabeth. (8) Queen Wilhelmina. (9) Mme. Chiang Kai-Shek and (10) Ann Sheridan!

Private Lives

John Payne is what writers call "tough copy." An exciting story about him is rarer than a laugh in Berlin. He never does anything spectacular. He never says anything spectacular. And what he thinks, he keeps to himself. Columnists, striving to feed their public news about the guy, go quietly mad in the process. "He's dry as the desert," they mumble. "Thank God there's not another like him."

Well, the boys are in for a jolt. There is another like him. She's Anne Shirley, the ex-Mrs. Payne, (Continued on following page)

ANN HARE, beautiful young daughter of Mr. and Mrs. Emlen Spencer Hare of Park Avenue, New York. Her engagement to Walter Wooster Richard of New York and Long Island was announced a few months after her debut. Like Wooster, Ann is Navy-minded, works hard with "Bundles for Bluejackets" and the "Navy Relief Society." One of the season's loveliest debutantes, she made her bow in Philadelphia, where her mother's family has long been socially prominent.

ADORABLY YOUNG AND LOVELY—There's a rare-orchid charm about Ann's blonde young beauty, and her exquisite skin has a luminous satin-smooth look. Of her complexion care Ann says, "I just use Pond's Cold Cream every day. Pond's is so light and silky my skin just loves it —and it's perfectly grand for cleansing."

ANN'S RING is unusually lovely—a large marquise-cut diamond, that reflects light with sparkling radiance. A baguette diamond is set on each side of the brilliant solitaire.

She's Lovely! She uses Pond's!

IT'S NO ACCIDENT SO MANY LOVELY ENGAGED GIRLS USE POND'S

This is Ann Hare's simple daily skin care:

She slips Pond's Cold Cream all over her face and throat. She pats with deft little pats to soften and release dirt and make-up —then tissues off well.

She rinses with more Pond's—for extra softening and cleansing. Tissues it off again.

Do this yourself—every night, for daytime cleanups, too. You'll see why society leaders like Mrs. John Roosevelt, Mrs. Ernest Biddle are so devoted to Pond's Cold Cream. Why more women and girls everywhere use Pond's than any other face cream. Buy a jar today—at your favorite beauty counter. Five popular-priced sizes—the most economical— the lovely big jars.

who carried away from her marriage the same quality of secretiveness that infects her former mate. Right now Anne is protesting there's nothing to her daily luncheon dates with Eddie Albert but a common interest in their Paramount picture, "Lady Bodyguard." That may be true, reporters concede. But why, they ask, does Anne always say good night to Eddie on the set—then go directly to his car where she waits for him to join her several minutes later? Anne won't answer that one.

As for John, his life is supposed to be devoted to his gymnasium workouts, his surf board and an occasional date with Sheila Ryan. Yet, reports coming to this desk say he's been spotted around town, playing escort to—Jane Russell!

The Real Glory

Attention Jane Wyman! You're going to like this story!

The other evening Ray Milland hurried through the door of his home and into the living room where his wife sat chatting with some friends. His face was white and his hands were trembling, and when he spoke it was in a small voice, to ask for a drink.

Mrs. Milland was startled. Ray seldom touches liquor, and neither is he in the habit of coming home so visibly shaken. When he'd had his drink and settled in a chair, she demanded to know what was the matter.

"Maybe you'll think I'm foolish," he said. "But I just heard a man make a speech and nothing in my life has ever moved me so deeply! It was at a USO rally, and Ronald Reagan—Lieut. Ronald Reagan—got up to say a few words. He talked about our fight, and about the brave kids who are going to win it. He talked so sincerely and so feelingly, that I felt like bawling. Imagine, a big guy like me! I've never met Ronald Reagan, but hell, I'm going to write and tell him how his speech socked me!"

Get that, Mrs. Reagan? Aren't you proud of your man?

Stolen Love

Hedy Lamarr and George Montgomery will never look back at their courtin' days with any great joy. Though they're hopelessly in love, they're two of the most frustrated sweethearts in the land. Try as they will, they can never be alone!

Most fellows can go calling on their girls and sit in the parlor and hold hands and coo for blissful hours on end. But are such plebeian pleasures open to Hedy and George? They are not!

Trouble is, Hedy lives two blocks away from the Beverly Hills Hotel, wherein is located a huge USO center. In some mysterious manner, the boys around the center manage to discover Hedy's home address and, at five minute intervals throughout every evening, appear at her doorstep to say hello!

Hedy and George are delighted with their visits, but they also yearn for some uninterrupted romancing. At present, their only escape is the movies. When they want to be "alone," they sneak off to a neighborhood theater and, in the company of a thousand other ticket-buyers, they enjoy their solitude!

Gabin Makes a Comeback

Not since Valentino have the women of America gone so all-out for a movie hero as they have for Jean Gabin. The night "Moontide" premiered in New York, star-struck lasses thronged the theater lobby and strewed flowers in the path he was to walk. When he stepped from his car, they cheered till their larynxes cracked, and only a restraining rope kept them from lunging at his person and smothering him.

If the ladies were disappointed in Jean's reaction to their adulation, they were completely justified. He offered no deep bows or broad smiles but ambled casually by them and into the theater. Let it not be said, however, that Jean was snooting his fair fans. Nothing could be farther from fact. The actual truth is that the Great Gabin wasn't at all sure the whoop-la was for him. And he didn't intend to stick his neck out, only to discover the fireworks were for Ty Power, arriving just behind.

Jean remembered too well his experience the last time he was in New York.

Upon his landing in this country, his friend, the noted author Antoine de St. Exupéry, took him for his first stroll down Broadway. As they made their way along the Big Street, Jean noted with satisfaction that they were the target of all feminine eyes. Thrilled by the recognition of American fans, he beamed brightly and was about to comment on this flattering phenomena when a long-stemmed lovely rushed up.

"The others don't dare," she exclaimed "but M. de St. Exupéry, I just had to tell you how much we've all enjoyed your books."

And completely ignoring the crushed Gabin, she turned on her heels and hurried into the crowd.

Malady Lane

A couple of weeks ago, half the kids on Roddy McDowall's street were breaking out with big, whopping nightmares and daily tummy-aches to match. The cause of their suffering was a deep mystery to their parents and to the weeping moppets themselves.

It was a grammar school teacher, doing a little sleuthing, who finally got to the bottom of the stomach-ache epidemic. Poking around the local drugstore, she discovered a batch of her charges lined up at the soda fountain, waiting for their chum, Roddy, to appear. "We're gonna have a Roddy McDowall Special," the youngsters told the curious teacher. "Wait'll you see it!"

"I saw it, all right," the teacher later informed the worried parents. "Roddy came rushing through that door like a man on a great mission. He went directly to the working side of the fountain and began filling soda-size glasses with squirts and dabs from every tap in the place. Lemon, chocolate, cherry, root beer—there wasn't a syrup flavor he missed! And those poor children. They gobbled it up, never dreaming it was that gruesome concoction that made 'em wake up screaming. Roddy McDowall Special? It's a lethal potion!"

Hollywood doesn't brag about Thunderbird Field. It doesn't even talk about it, except in a few quiet corners.

Yet, Hollywood has every reason to be proud of the Arizona air-training center which will graduate from 2,000 to 10,000 crack Army pilots every year for the duration. For Thunderbird is almost entirely backed by Filmtown coin—owing its existence largely to Jimmy Stewart, Henry Fonda, Cary Grant, Brian Aherne and Margaret Sullavan's husband, Leland Hayward, who pitched in with their dough and their time when Uncle Sam's stepped-up cadet-training program called for civilian help.

IS STIRLING HAYDEN MARRIED TO MADELEINE CARROLL?

the strongest piece of internal evidence we have to bolster the marriage theory.

Then, after finishing "My Favorite Blonde," Madeleine asked and was given a year's leave of absence. To do war work. Unspecified. Mind you, we're casting no slur on her intentions. For all we know to the contrary, she's doing war work like mad. Meantime she's been glimpsed here, there and yonder, hanging on the arm of one Captain Hayden. Lots of things come under the heading of war work. Giving aid and comfort to a sailor of Uncle Sam, for instance.

Stirling went straight from Hollywood to a naval enlistment center. Because he was an inch over regulation height, the Navy regretfully turned him down. He was offered the post of first mate aboard the U. S. geodetic survey schooner, "Atlantis." That wasn't what he wanted. Casting about for the best way of serving his country and keeping himself on water at the same time, he joined the outfit of Wild Bill Donovan, late of the 69th Fighting Irish. He'd met Donovan through the latter's wife, twice a passenger on the globe-circling yacht "Yankee" when Stirling was first mate.

Wild Bill, more formally Colonel William J. Donovan, is now Co-ordinator of Information, directly responsible to President Roosevelt. The office was created in July of '41. Its purpose, in the arid language of the records, is "to collect and analyze all information and data which may bear upon national security, to co-relate such information and data and to make such information and data available to the President and to such departments and officials of the government as the President may determine . . ."

It doesn't take much acumen to read between these vague lines the opportunity for high adventure in the line of duty. What Hayden's part is in assembling information important to national security we don't know, and couldn't tell if we did. "Supplementary activities" covers it. Several months ago he made a trip to Iceland and not for the scenery. More recently he's been in Scotland, narrowly escaping passage on a bomber that crashed. From all account's, he's now headed for the Caribbean. Between trips he's seen in and around Gloucester, and Madeleine's been with him.

Gloucester's the town where he grew up, where he fell in love with the sea. It's the town of his heart, as far as his heart can be given to any piece of dry land. It's the town where his friends live, the people he trusts, who talk his language, against whom he raises no defensive barriers. It's also the town that doesn't really give a damn whether he's married to Madeleine Carroll or not. So Gloucester would have no reason for saying they're wed unless it thought so.

To the townsfolk of Cape Ann—as the section around Gloucester is called—Stirling's no sun god. He's the likable kid who came from New Jersey and went nuts about the sea, who stood with the waterfront reporter when the "Yankee" hove into port in '33 and soon had a job aboard her—the kid who was a natural on a ship, ready to swarm up the mast and repair the rigging in the dirtiest weather, a better man aloft and on deck than most Gloucester fishermen—and that's a tribute not lightly paid in Gloucester. They weren't impressed with his movie career. As an actor, they thought he stank—a conclusion in which he fervently concurred. His friends knew he hated acting. In Hollywood he had to suppress his feelings—to a degree—so in letters home he poured out all the disgust he felt over his own antics as a "film monkey."

Gloucester took his return calmly—those who were conscious of it. Lots of them don't even know who he is. They took Madeleine's appearance among them calmly, too. She's been in the movies longer, so they know her better. A few asked for autographs. There might have been a few more if she'd removed the disguise of dark glasses. But New Englanders keep their sense of proportion as a whole. Nobody grabbed at buttons for souvenirs or hung round the local barbershop begging for locks of Stirling's hair. They called it golden in Hollywood, by the way. Gloucester calls him tow-headed.

Gloucester, in a word, finds itself annoyed by all the Hayden pother. They consider him a fine, honest, upstanding young man, who'd give his life for his country, but so would millions of others, so what's all the shootin' for? They think he's married to Madeleine, and who cares. Lots of people get married all the time. If they don't want to tell, why ask them? It's their own business.

The story we gleaned by piecing a word here with a hint there is that they were married last March in some small New Hampshire village, where intentions don't have to be filed in advance and town clerks are discreet; that Madeleine negotiated for a house at Beverly Farms, Massachusetts, about fifteen miles from Gloucester, but the deal fell through because Stirling had to be closer to New York; that they finally bought a place either on Long Island or in Connecticut—the versions vary—where they honeymooned; that Madeleine lives there now with Stirling's mother, while he goes where his job takes him.

o'er the bounding main . . .

In the last couple of months it's taken him from Gloucester to Nassau to California. His primary purpose in Gloucester was not to hold hands with Madeleine, but to pick him a crew of seafarers from among men he could trust as he trusted himself. They were to take a ship from somewhere along the Pacific, down to the West Indies for the coasting trade. The coasting trade, Stirling called it without batting an eye, and nobody batted an eye back. His old friend Larry O'Toole would have liked to go with him. Larry's an artist—one of the amateur seamen who sailed with Stirling from Gloucester to Tahiti on his first command as skipper of a pile of junk called the "Florence C. Robinson." The ship was a wreck, and the crew so green that they heaved up their dinner at the slightest hint of a breeze. On at least three occasions disaster was close, but Stirling got them to port at last without losing a man—a feat which won him Gloucester's undying respect.

Larry couldn't go because he was committed to the Navy. One of the local fishermen turned Stirling down. He was fifty or so, had been with Hayden when he raced the "Thebaud" against the City dog days . . .

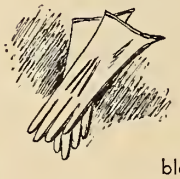
• This is the summer that will go down in history as the stay-in-town-and-like-it year. But it's not enough to give up your annual jaunt to seashore or mountains. Even to stay in the hot, hot city and grimly slave for Victory. To be 1942's prize package, you just decide to make this a bang-up summer! You have to use your bean, of course. No humdrum doings or tired-looking rags for you. Make up a swimming party if your city boasts a pool. Hostess the crowd to cool drinks after the early-evening park concert. Develop your own clothes personality to the point where it dividends with both compliments and invitations!

For summer charm, a bag and calot of cotton rug yarn. Takes only 3 balls at 25c, so out with the crochet hook and make your own.



Short white gloves do the trick for formality even when you skip the hat. Have several pairs from Kress' or your local five-and-ten. If now and then you suffer from seam-splitting trouble (who doesn't?) take Clark's O.N.T. Brilliant thread and make blanket stitches along edges of ripped seam to strengthen it. Then draw edges together by overhanding through blanket stitches. Conceal thread ends inside the glove and there you are, with no one the wiser.

Carol Bruce, Universal star, now in "Off the Beaten Track," poses in a peplum jacket with pebbly, checked seersucker dress. Crisp, town-ish and of course goes right in the tub like any patriotic cotton. A Loma design, $8.95.

Want to change the "How hot it is" routine to the more pleasant "How cool you look" line? Easy enough, if you:

1. Dress simply. Avoid the cluttered look of too-many accessories.
2. Change your shoes when you get back home at night. A high-heeled summer sandal will ease feet and please vanity.
3. Choose hat and bag colors that people associate with cooling things like raspberry ice, limeade. Pale lemon touches here and there.
4. Wear whites only when they are strictly fresh.
5. Pick fabrics that won't rumple as soon as the temperature soars.
6. Keep well-groomed via Carol Carter's expert advice, and outdo your own best efforts for a trim, stay-cool-longer appearance.

There's something about jersey, especially a two-piece. It looks cool, feels cool and says a firm "no" to wrinkles. Jonbarry, $8.95.

City Sundays demand the light note, so take a hint from the suit shown on Carol Bruce. Correlate your with-white costumes in order to interchange them subtly.

IS STIRLING HAYDEN MARRIED TO MADELEINE CARROLL?

Canadian "Bluenose," and yielded to none in his admiration for "the lad. But I'm not aimin' to kiss the bottom of the sea just yet. Fishing's a cinch compared with the West Indies waters these days."

His quota unfilled, Stirling flew down to Nassau in April. Some of those he took were friends of the year before. Others were chosen after painstaking investigation. Applicants flocked to him. He's the kind of guy whose manner and presence inspire faith. After a first interview, men were heard to say: "We'd follow that one anywhere."

transformation . . .

Despite the distinguishing mark of his height, few people recognized him. Last year he was sun-bronzed, his hair rather long to conform to the Hollywood Viking-pattern. Last year he went slouching around barefoot, in a faded pair of jeans. Quiet and self-controlled, he worked like a galley-slave, incapable of shirking even a distasteful job. But last year he was a misfit, resentful, struggling against a life he loathed.

This year his hair was cut short, his skin was paler, and he wore a business suit. But the difference went deeper than clothes or haircut. His eyes, which had been baffled and sometimes a little angry or defiant, were now serene. His shoulders that had drooped, were squared. Now he walked free again, in his own element, a man at peace with himself in a world at war.

A friend passed him in the street and had to look twice to make sure it was Hayden. He spoke of the preceding summer, how he used to see Hayden strolling by under his window. "I wanted to ask you in for a whisky and soda. But knowing you had to get up at four and work like a dog, I skipped it."

Stirling grinned. "Those were the days when I sure needed a drink."

A few days later Captain Hayden and his crew flew back to the United States. A month after that he was rumored, but not seen, on the West Coast. All that we know and can guess adds up to the inference that Hayden and his crew of Nassau and Gloucester men are aboard ship somewhere in the Caribbean, collecting important information.

It was just about a year ago that he talked to me in Hollywood about ships and movies. He hadn't intended to betray himself. But there were pictures all over his dressing room—pictures of ships, not one of a movie star—and I asked about them. He could no more help revealing how he felt than a charged wire can help giving off sparks.

I was moved and impressed by the intensity of his feeling. "But then how can you bear not to be sailing?"

"I have plans," he said with a kind of fierce stillness, "but I'm not talking about them yet."

"Plans for what?" I knew he was tied to a contract.

"For getting out of this racket."

I'd heard other actors say the same. They are still in it. But the way Hayden said it I was sure he'd get out.

So now he's out—sailing ships through peril for safety, through rat-threaded waters for freedom. And somewhere two women wait for him together. One is named Hayden. Maybe they're both named Hayden. What do you think?

John was one of conditioner Terry Hunt's charter patients, still is. He doesn't let Terry do all the work, either.

The dip he was taking in the Pacific is only routine stuff with John. He swims every day of his life—winter and summer—something no true Californian in his right mind will consider. (In the summer he gets as tan as a Turk.) And if I went into all the other physical activities that slip into a Payne existence, the bowling, badminton, golf, mountain shagging and riding the guy would rather do than eat—that is, almost rather—there wouldn't be room for any more data. Suffice it to say that right now John is fretting impatiently because the 11-acre place he has bought up in the Malibu hills is lying there in its pristine state, and he's itching to hitch a team to a plow and give it a vigorous and personal once-over.

hearthside hugger . . .

For a big guy with such a terrifying past and muscle-bound present, John Payne is surprisingly gentle, artistic, shy and sensitive. He's never been in a night club brawl, doesn't swagger his dangerous dukes around.

When he grinned and said modestly, "I guess I'm just a home boy," he wasn't kidding. Practically every evening of his life he spends at home with the few good friends he has, Vic Mature, Bob Stack, agent Henry Willson and a few other stags and their girl friends. When he was married, you couldn't drag him away from home, and no young dad in Hollywood was more crazy about his daughter and family. That's why the marriage rift, when it did come, was so terrifically surprising. John still can't understand it. "You'd think," he said, "that two people like us could get along in this town." That's about all he'll say, but you know he regrets the smash-up of his home life and is dazed by it all. Right now he's especially mixed up, because people hang a romantic tag on every girl he goes out with, and romance is the last thing in the world John Payne is considering now.

In fact, he sees his wife, Anne, once or twice a week regularly. Since his separation, John has lost some friends he thought he had, who seem to think they have to take sides in his domestic life, but he'd just as soon not see them anyway. The few good ones still hang around. They meet at John's after the Hollywood workday, have a few honey Scotches or what they'd like and settle down for the evening, often ganging around John at his spinet piano, which he can tickle pretty solidly. When supper time comes around, Jerry gets busy, but more often than not John himself will gather the gang in the kitchen and preside at the stove. He prides himself, in fact, on his cheffing. He's swell at cooking meats and hearty fare, although he thinks about the tastiest specialty of his is "brandied deep dish sweet potatoes," the kind his mother makes. "The only trouble is," grins John, "if you eat very much of them you get crocked—the way I make 'em."

When the pals aren't about, John settles down in a long sofa on the end of his spine and reads to the faint background of his record collection. Both writing and music, by the way, are John's two secret passions. He used to pound out action stories when he was a college kid and sold some, too. He tries his hand on the rackety typewriter all the time, usually late at night, and he's written a novel, but it hasn't been published. He's composed all sorts of songs, and Bing Crosby has groaned a few on his program.

Particularly touchy is John about the feelings of others. That's one reason why he's the despair of interviewers and columnists. He's afraid anything he says will make someone else feel bad. John has been palling around with Sheila Ryan, a starlet at his studio, but the relationship has never been serious, especially in the confused state of heart that John now finds himself in. A few days ago at one of those arranged Hollywood affairs where stars have to show up, John was paired with Kay Francis, and Sheila had another date, with Dick Derr. One of the more catty Hollywood gossips cracked that while Sheila showed up with Dick Derr, she was wearing John Payne's orchids. That was true—he had sent her flowers. But there was no romance rivalry involved. The same column hinted that John and Kay were interested in one another. Both items made John sore as a boiled owl—but not for himself. He was mad because Sheila's boy friend was put in a chump light and because Kay Francis might be embarrassed.

John may bend over backwards that way, but it is refreshing in Hollywood to find someone who defends people the rest of the town picks on. John likes Vic Mature—they're good friends, and if you want to get a low look with plenty of steam behind it, start boobing Vic, as much of Hollywood does, in his pal's presence. You might even get pitched somewhere on your ear.

This softhearted side of a big guy is surprising, perhaps, but it is one of John's prime attractions. He carries to extremes, maybe, but it's genuine. For instance, while John loves dogs and was raised with them, he won't keep any as long as he has a house and no grounds. He had an offer of a swell pedigreed Irish setter not long ago like one of his pets he had particularly favored in the past. John shook his head. "It would be cruel for a setter to be kept in the house," he said. He used to hunt deer each season, but once he killed one. That was the last. The sight of the beautiful beast in its death agonies made him sick. And from a skilled and seasoned outdoor guy, that ought to prove something.

I don't mean to paint Payne as a softie or a sis. In fact, when I reviewed his many accomplishments, hobbies and interests, which he admits are fairly fickle, I suggested that he was perhaps a dilettante. "Say faddist," said John. "Dilettante sounds sissy." It isn't, of course—but that gives you an idea.

Recently, one of John's fads was a secondhand motorcycle he'd picked up to coddle the tires on his car. Right off the bat he had it apart and put together again. Anything mechanical is great sport for him. He has stacks of model planes he's assembled around his house. Everything he has, including his Zephyr car, is "souped up." He gets fancies for certain mechanical gadgets and tracks them down. It took him two years to find a certain Mauser pistol he fancied (he's a crack pistol shot) and Heaven knows how many miles of delving around in junk and swap shops. One of his prize possessions is a set of throwing knives, presented by an entertainer in a show John once worked in.

Among John's pet peeves are night clubs and fancy dancing palaces. He hates to dance, although he can if he has to. He hates dinner clothes, and if he has to dress will take tails any time.

A while back he was in Washington, D. C., near the ancestral Payne stamping grounds, which he knows like a book. Teamed with some other Hollywood greats, he set out for dinner. The rest of the luminaries wanted to swank it. "You want good food?" asked John. "Then follow me!" He took them to an obscure place in a very ratty neighborhood. They beefed at once. Just as their wails rose loudest at wasting an evening on a hash house, in came Jim Farley, Secretary Morgenthau and a host of government big shots. The food, by the way, was terrific. But John thinks he has the best cook in the world right at his beach house.

In the Payne bachelor diggings breakfast is early. John usually has pineapple juice and milk—and that's all he goes to work on. John drinks three to four quarts of milk a day. For lunch at the studio when he's working, sometimes, and runs up against a nervous stomach, he has figured out a Payne special which might be worth trying. It's mixed orange juice, honey, dextrose and the white of an egg. If John gobbles up a heavy lunch, he finds himself so logy and lazy in the afternoon that all he's good for is a soft seat and the yawns.

Eight o'clock is the dinner hour in the Payne menage. That's when he really stokes up. Meat is his favorite dish. He has a weakness for rich dishes, too, though he knows he shouldn't, and that's one reason he's such a vigorous calisthenic customer. He worries about cigarettes, too, and limits himself to a certain number daily. John didn't smoke cigarettes until last year. He had a three-day scene in a picture that required puffing a fag, and he thinks that was his downfall.

Probably the thing John prides himself on most in the gourmet league is his superior savvy about California wines. The native vintners ought to give him commissions the way he goes around super-selling the merits and glories of California vintages.

His major luxury at home, however, is his bed. He bought it with the first sizeable check he earned in Hollywood. It's a colossal affair, especially designed with built-in bookshelves, radio, bar and telephone. On solitary evenings when he isn't off to a neighborhood movie in Santa Monica or Westwood or playing badminton on the Ocean Park pier, John plunks in his custom-built hay and has everything he needs for a cozy evening at home. He never goes to sleep, though, working or not, until one o'clock. He sleeps on an average of six hours, when he sleeps. Because sometimes, in spite of his health program and exercise, John gets the Hollywood affliction of actors—insomnia. Partly, he thinks it's due to his habit of taking his next day's lines to bed with him and reading them last thing before he turns off the light. He doesn't worry, but his concentration is so deep that the lines race around in his brain. On the set it pays off, though. He never has to study between takes.

Another personal luxury John indulges is clothes. In spite of his sorry social report card, he loves and knows good clothes. He has some fifty odd suits and bolts of tweed materials he's collected as moth bait, with an emphasis on rough Donegals. Since he wears them so seldom, and they are all tailored so expertly, they last him forever. His major clothes weakness is sweaters. He has drawers crammed with enough knitted goods to keep Lana Turner in style for years.

John is a slick dresser and a neat person in general, except when he has something on his mind—a story or a picture part he's particularly nuts about. Then he forgets to get a haircut for weeks but always shows up clean shaven. His beard is of the wiry variety, dark and thick, and for a long time the only thing that would make an impression was a straight edge razor. He shaves twice a day when there's anything on for the evening, and once set a record of five scrapings in twenty-four hours when he was doing two pictures that overlapped and necessitated twenty straight hours before the camera.

Once John gets his mitts on a movie break that means anything, he's as aggressive and canny as a guy can be, and he doesn't hesitate to give it all he's got. The test for his contract chance at Fox might have ended differently if John hadn't turned on the heat. He was given a scene in "Star Dust" for the lead opposite Zanuck's then-new Cinderella girl, Linda Darnell. Seventeen of Hollywood's hottest males had already made tests and all flopped. John's noggin started clicking. Why? He took a look at the script and thought he knew. So he took it home, wrestled around with it, rewrote and put in some laughs. It won him a contract.

John got his first important TCF part, too, by shrewdness. Henry King, the director who has made more stars in Hollywood's history than any one else—from Ronald Colman to Tyrone Power—was looking for a romantic lead for "Maryland," a horse-racing picture. Both King and John, being Virginians, know their horses. So John, still an unknown box-office quantity, had a bit of an inside. There was only one thing that worried King. The boy was big. And the part was that of a gentleman jockey who rides in the famous Maryland Hunt Cup Race. "How much do you weigh?" he asked John.

"A hundred and sixty!" said John. He fibbed. He tipped the beam at 198 at the time. When King later found out he was very burned up, but it was too late.

Payne is the kind of star that has never worked up any dignity or set grandeur. He doesn't like people to gush over him, and there are times when he can't stand the incessant chatter, gags and frivolity that go on in the set waiting periods. Then he sits by himself and reads or goes into his dressing room and closes the door. But when he gets interested in a scene, he forgets he's a star and pitches in at whatever is needed to help it along. On "The Shores of Tripoli" he used to grab things and help the grips move them in changing scenes until one day they asked him if he had his union card!

He seldom goes in for jokes, although on "Iceland" the other day, which features swing-master Sammy Kaye and his band, the set was thrown into confusion when the unique jive of Glenn Miller came out over the recorded playback. Glenn was recording for "Orchestra Wife" in the next door sound stage. John had switched the recordings.

No chore in the line of business ever finds John playing cosy. He either does it pronto or not at all. One day when he was making "Footlight Serenade," his previous picture, "The Shores of Tripoli," staged an opening in San Diego. John started work at six o'clock, worked until one, caught a bus at 1:30, made the 135-mile trip to San Diego. That evening, he made three theater personal appearances, showed at Camp Elliott for the soldiers, hustled over to a radio station for a broadcast, caught the bus home, arrived at three A.M. and showed up for work again at six.

pipe dreams . . .

He doesn't mind things like that. What does get him down is the waiting around on sets between scenes. John has some ideas on that subject. He thinks, after he does some of the pictures he has in the back of his head, he'd like to make them with somebody else looking in the camera. He'd like to direct and write.

For a time John thought he'd go back to Virginia one of these days and run the farm where his mother and brother still live. John's dad was pretty well off and left some property scattered around Roanoke, but it's all tied up until John reaches thirty-six. He's thirty-one now, and the way things are going it looks like the customers won't let him get carried back to old Virginny for a spell.

That will suit him fine. In fact he'll have only one regret. Part of the tied-up Payne estate includes a Roanoke movie house. It's leased out now, and so far the management has never played a Payne picture. That has been burning John up for years. When he gets his estate John will be in a spot to say what's what about the movie house.

"I would sure like to go back there and remedy that particular situation," determinedly grinned big John Payne.

But jeepers! It would be so swell to be settled with the right guy in the right house. You know, your life all set."

You'd pump her about this guy. . . .

"Oh, him. He's going to be a cross between Gary Cooper and God. An outdoor man, because I love the outdoors. A hug-the-hearth, 'cause I'm one. (Do you know I've been to Mocambo and Ciro's exactly once apiece?) He won't veto singing in the shower. Once daily I do 'Madame Butterfly' and 'Samson and Delilah' up brown. He'll be a wack about kids and horses and amusement parks and planes. Oh, he'll have to love flying as much as I do. He'll be able to beat me to pieces at tennis and golf, and he'll teach me to bowl a 200. Gosh, I'm sick of that measly 120. He'll be quite a gent, my husband."

That was a few months ago. Right now you can't see the wistfulness in those enormous blue eyes for the lovelight. That right guy turned out to be Lieutenant Joseph Howard, bombardier instructor at the Victorville flying field. And he loves riding and bowling and kids and amusement parks. He's everything Pat wanted—with just a touch of Eddie Rickenbacker thrown in.

And Priscilla is quite a gal, if you can believe one mother, one sister, two servants and a few assorted chums. Lend an ear, Mr. Pat Lane. Meet the wife.

"Pat's a wonderful boss," grins Mrs. Lane, who once took in boarders to finance the girls' singing lessons and now lives in a darling rambling white farmhouse that the girls gave her. "I'm their agent, manager and fan mail answerer, and it's so much fun. Rosemary's my problem child, but Pat's a cinch to 'manage.' Actually sticks to the budget we've worked out." All her earnings go into three separate accounts—Business, Special and Personal. Household expenses, doctors' bills and such are paid from Business. Special holds the reserve fund for next year's income tax, and Personal takes care of lunches, soft drinks, cigarettes, gum, amusements, gifts, etc. She used to budget $20 a week for Personal, but now it's cut to $5 a week, and she is managing nicely with a little scrimping here and there. All money not needed for the three accounts goes into savings, chiefly War bonds of the $750 denomination. She also is knitting sweaters for the army, by the way, and taking several civilian protection courses.

"She loves her comfort," goes on "Mommie," as she's still known to her children. "Lives in inelegant blue jeans or tired-looking grey flannel slacks when she's at home. Joe won't have a clothes fiend on his hands, anyway. Not long ago I bought her a stunning slack suit to the tune of $60. She wore it a couple of times to please me—then quietly slunk back into the atrocities!"

Although she could afford to buy a couple of new dresses every day, she prefers to have fewer clothes but fairly expensive ones. They look better and wear longer, she argues, and proves the point by several items in her wardrobe which are four and five years old and still chic as all get out. She pays over $100 apiece for street and dinner dresses, but the rest of her closet is filled with comparatively inexpensive cotton sports things and the inevitable assortment of slacks. Only once has she had a suit tailored; the others have been purchased ready made. Hats are her abomination (she has a nifty John-Fredrics which she has worn only once), and shoes are her pet extravagance. She owns at least fifty pairs, including some sports numbers she crocheted herself. She loves everything loose-fitting and purrs in black velvet. She dislikes purple, knitted gowns, geegaws and high necks. You have to hog-tie her to get her into a formal evening gown—a hangover from her days with Fred Waring's band when she had to dress to the hilt every night.

Winding up a mom's eye-view of the littlest Lane, "I'd say the worst thing Pat's husband will have to contend with is her mania for independence. She likes to have her own way, and no one ever ever shares her plans until they are in the bag. Witness her marriage to Oren Haglund. I was still denying the existence of the marriage—and in all good faith—even as Pat was preparing the divorce papers!"

sis's say . . .

"That secretive stuff is as nothing to a few little items I'm putting Pat's young man on to," says Rosemary. "There's her teeth-grinding, for one thing. From the time she hits the pillow till the alarm goes off, it's grind, grind, grind. Then there's Miss Muffet, her cat, who wanders in and out of the room all night scaring you out of your senses. And her clothes borrowing! Lieutenant, you may just possibly be safe from that, but I guarantee nothing. She pretends not to give a darn about clothes, but she'd just as soon take the shirt off my back—literally. As for my mink coat, it's dizzy trying to figure out who its mama is."

As is Pat's poor Lincoln convertible coupe, we happen to know. It seems the only real fight the girls have had in years was over Pat's car and Rosemary's coat. They'd swapped them affably for months; then one night, when Pat was going out for some strictly platinum fun, didn't she discover that Rosemary was off in both mink and Link.

"Pat stayed mad for a decent interval," Rosemary tells it. "Then she came apologizing to me, if you can bear it. The blonde one cannot bear a grudge, and in spite of all my panning, she's really a honey. She's the most understanding and sympathetic soul in the world, and she's more fun than anyone I know. Best of all, you can confide anything in her, and it goes no further. Now there, brother-in-law, is a woman!"

"And a tomboy," laughs Pat's pal Gwen Behr, who runs the Yucca Loma ranch near Victorville (where Priscilla met her husband). "Gene Autry should see her ride a horse and throw a lasso. She's an absolute nut on the horse subject. I've known her heckle Joe into driving 100 miles to see some fifth-rate, broken down old rodeo and come back raving over the time they had. But she wouldn't cross the street to see a bullfight. She thinks they're cruel.

"The thing that amazes me most about her—next to her angelic disposition—is that she always looks so darn beautiful. And she never seems to work at it, for which that hubby of hers can praise Allah." (She takes care of her own hair, incidentally—it's naturally curly and requires only shampooing—and she does her own nails. Nail polish and rugged buffing. After a picture, she goes to a beauty shop for a clean-up facial; the rest of the time it's soap and water and a make-up base.

Hubby can also praise Allah for other things. She'll probably never get fat on him, as nothing she eats puts an ounce on her. And she'll eat practically anything, Mary, the Lanes' colored cook reports. "Funny thing about Miss Pat though, she gets spells of wanting one particular dish day in and day out. Last month it was chili and beans. Another time it was barbecued spare ribs." With the latter she experiments with sauces of her own devising and is always electrified when the "extras" turn out edible.

She loves to dream up midnight snacks for herself. Hideous combinations that are such fun in the making but invariably horrible in the eating. She usually winds up palming them off on Miss Muffet.

Should insomnia set in after an especially colossal slab of cake, she goes down to the living room and listens to the victrola till the small hours. "And the next morning she'd be down for her toast and coffee right on time and as spry as you please," says Mary. "She was never cranky mornings—" for which, Lt. Howard, oh be joyful.

Morgan, the chauffeur-butler, is also strong for her. "She's a swell driver," he volunteers, flashing a huge white smile. "No accidents and no tickets yet . . ."

Pat says she wouldn't know a piston rod from a totem pole, but she'd rather drive than eat. Before tire rationing, she was inclined to enjoy whizzing along at a good clip, and once The Law nearly got her for speeding. Nearly, you understand. Those Los Angeles coppers know a pretty face when they see one. She drives with the top down, weather permitting, and tunes the car radio to good dance bands and news broadcasts. (Aside to Mr. Pat: Morgan further divulges that she doesn't backseat drive, no matter what. Oh, you lucky guy!)

"Lucky guy is right," corroborates her stand-in Bonnie Schrader. "Priscilla is really the very best. And cute? I've never known anyone like her. She lives in a regular ivory tower half the time. Never hears gossip when it's brand new and sizzling. She gets it months later and is crushed when there's no one left to tell it to. She's terrifically superstitious, and her pet fetish used to be picking up pins. It was heart-rending watching her grovel for them after a fitting. Finally she said to me, 'Say, Bonnie, do you think there's anything in this pin business?' I gave her a flat no, and now her favorite superstition is not walking under ladders. Kind of a negative approach to the whole thing, but saves wear and tear on the sacroiliac."

The technical crew over at Warners' adore her. She always has a gag for them and a big laugh for all of theirs. No wonder Sheriff Jack Brown of Victorville says, "She's practically my favorite woman." And he's made her a deputy sheriff on his staff to prove it!

No matter where you go, they'll all tell you the same thing—from the waitresses at her beloved drive-ins to George Brent, her leading man in Paramount's "Silver Queen," the verdict's unanimous.

on the seamy side . . .

You have to go straight to Pat herself to get any of the seamy side. Are you listening, bridegroom? This, too, is Lane.

For years she's been fooling the public about her height. She's barely five feet, but she jacks herself up with four-inch heels and lifts in her shoes. She doesn't like Hollywood, and when she's through making a picture she gets the hell out of the place. Doesn't like the strain of making continuous conversation, but loves the companionable feeling of two people reading in the same room. (On a lazy afternoon she'll curl up in a big chair with a book and once in a while after dinner. She likes best-seller fiction and has just finished "My Friend Flicka" which she loved). As a rule she's miserable in crowds. If she's making a public appearance as a movie star, she likes attention of course. But if she's trying to go about her own business the furore embarrasses her and she hates it. She is at times a mad poetess, and the Lord help the chap who disturbs her in the middle of a spectacular rhyme. She used to dabble a bit in oils, but that phase blew over. It seems she was in the throes of doing Rosemary a few weeks ago. The maid, however, dusted it with furniture polish one unhappy day, turning Rosemary into a smeary mess and Pat into an ex-artist. She's decided to postpone portraiture until she has a studio with lock and key.

Pat's on the New England side when it comes to profanity and off-color jokes. She hates them both, though she can give out with a good healthy damn.

I SAW IT HAPPEN

When Hedy Lamarr was still Hedy Kiesler, I attended the opening night of her first picture in Vienna, Austria, and happened to sit next to her father, Mr. Emil Kiesler. On the screen Hedy took a swim, leaving her bathing suit at home. "How do you like this girl?" I asked Mr. Kiesler. "Bad luck I have," he answered. "I am acquainted with such a pretty girl and she must be my daughter!"

Charles Glauber

"Let's see," says Pat. "What else should Joe know about me—and, boy, is he learning! I've got a terrible temper, and I have claustrophobia. I say 'Jeepers,' every other minute till people go crazy. I'm disgustingly sentimental. Adore anniversary celebrations and all that goo. I'm a terror for neatness around the house." This incidentally goes for anybody's house. She frequently drives her hosts to a double scotch and soda with her habit of straightening pictures, moving ashtrays and adjusting the angle of doilies. "My church-going could stand improving and bridge bores me to tears. That does it, I think. There's no more to tell. . . ."

Except that the Lieutenant doesn't object a bit—and just one quick look at the two of them is convincing even the hardest-dying cynics that this is indeed it!

DESPERATE JOURNEY—STORY of special privileges for wanted details concerning England's air forces. After that, of course, bargaining was futile. His prisoners knew too much.

That was the way Forbes and the others felt about it, too.

Johnny landed a lucky punch on Baumeister's chin, proving their Iron Fist had a glass jaw, and the brawl was on. Five cornered men, they stormed their guards and won a perilous battle by weight of sheer surprise. When they left the town hall, by way of Baumeister's window, they took the Major's hastily commandeered papers with them. And one of those papers listed the locations of six camouflaged aircraft factories!

Five men, with half of Germany between themselves and home! Five uniformed enemies of the Reich, possessed of a secret Hitler's minions never could allow them to know and live! For once that list reached England, British flyers would flatten the hidden factories. . . .

They struggled onward, heading west as best they could. There was no food anywhere. Even Edwards, forager extraordinary in World War I, could bring in nothing to eat. They must travel only by dark, lying low in the wet bogs during hours of light. Hollis contracted a fever. All of them were chilled. Yet they'd covered only twenty miles.

Four hundred more between them and the Channel. Only one pistol among them. No food. And uniforms which begged aloud for re-arrest.

It was on a lonely bridge, somewhere without a name, that they staged their second desperate coup and overcame a set of unwary sentries. And now at last they had clothing of the right sort for safety, unless they were caught again; in which case there would be no question of a prison camp. They would be summarily shot as spies.

From the bridge to a railroad siding was not far. And here they discovered a hospital train about to get under way. The last car, alone, was not filled with wounded from the Russian front. It was a grandiose private salon belonging, by the look of it, to Herr Goering himself.

At any rate, they were safe inside it as the train sped westward. The train attendants were too busy with their casualties, too reverent of the deadhead's august owner, to come snooping.

In the outskirts of Berlin, a station guard whom they managed to convince they were mere indiscreet soldiers on leave, deprived them of their foodless splendor; thus, although he was unaware of it, cheating a net the furious Baumeister himself had flown west to prepare.

Forbes, who once had studied at Leipzig, knew the city. He found them a boarded-up house to rest in, on a quiet residential street.

Had a brace of soldiers not spotted sparks from the deserted dwelling's chimney one day while Forbes was out foraging, there might have been no trouble in Berlin. As it was, four startled fugitives found themselves facing two deadly guns before they realized their hideaway had been invaded. But once more it was Forbes to the rescue.

Returning from his trip, the tall young Australian had caught onto what was afoot before he himself was spotted. He had only to lure a passing Nazi captain up an alley, slug him from behind, don his uniform and return to the house, to trick the captors into turning their backs on four alert prisoners. The rest was easy, for desperate men.

Once more they were free, if hunted. And Forbes had an idea; an exciting, daring idea which had all of them cheering—all but sensible Jed Forrest, so set on getting their information back to England. Forbes had discovered a factory (and nearby, too) where a goodly share of the incendiary bombs the Luftwaffe intended for London were being manufactured. If they could start a fire in a nest like that—

Peril stalked them with every bated breath, that night. But swift uppercuts, quick leaps from behind, took out two intervening sentries one by one. Soon Edwards and Jed were pacing the beats. The others were inside, locating a door marked VORSICHT EXPLOSIONSGEFAHR.

Forbes used the keys of one of those overpowered sentries to open this last barrier. But as the door swung wide somewhere in the night an electric alarm began to clamor like all the lost souls of hell. Shouts and shots mingled with it. Forbes and Lloyd and Johnny fled.

Floodlights sprang to life while they scrambled for the wall, clawing a fog-shrouded yard. The guns of pursuing guards kept yammering. Suddenly young Lloyd flung up his arms and pitched forward.

The other two swerved back, jerked him erect, loaded him across Johnny's shoulder. Forbes held the pistol. He kept it barking back toward the dim shapes lashing after them. Over the wall they went and out the factory gate. Edwards slammed it shut before he and Jed joined the flight.

They had lost their pursuers long before they dared approach an apothecary shop in search of medical aid for Lloyd. The kid was game, but desperately wounded. It was Forbes, whose knowledge of German had gotten them out of tight spots before, who undertook to ask the questions.

He was surprised when one of the customers who had overheard—a pretty, tragic-eyed girl who said her name was Kaethe Brahms—volunteered to help. Yet in such a moment, years of understanding may be encompassed. Forbes felt he could trust her; that her tale of Nazi hatred, her passion to defeat Hitlerism, were as real as his own.

In his back room Apothecary Mather, who also was a surgeon, made ready to operate. Lloyd kept gasping detached words of English as he lay half-conscious on the table. Waiting for that ordeal to finish was the longest wait Forbes could remember. Jed had been right! Lloyd would be shipshape at this very instant, if he hadn't imbued the rest with his own dizzy scheme for firing the factory. Jed, not he, should be leader!

But Jed, refusing, made him know they still believed in him. A new determination gripped Forbes. And he promised himself and them that no side issues would interfere, from here on in!

Summoned by another customer, the Gestapo stormed into the place just as Mather was finishing. Forbes ordered his subordinates to dash for it, by a back way Kaethe knew. Himself, he remained at Lloyd's side to face it out. He didn't realize then that the boy was dead.

The wooden-faced giants of the Staatspolizei were in the act of shooting him down at his comrade's side, for "resisting arrest," when a fusillade of bullets from the hallway tumbled them in their tracks. In the door behind them stood Johnny, smoking Luger in one hand and tight grin on his lips. He had circled back, against orders, to Forbes' rescue.

They loaded the three bodies—Lloyd's and those of the two Nazis—into the Gestapo sedan. Ten minutes later, it was a fiery wreck at the foot of a bridge far from Dr. Mather's establishment. Four hounded shadows headed west, for Muenster and the safety of Kaethe's father's house.

On the way, they shanghaied an army car which expedited the journey considerably. The man who opened Kaethe's door to them at the end of their ride was reassuring; tall, fleshy, pleasant, solicitous. His plump wife fed them excellent strudel, while her husband asked a hundred questions.

Their host was busy on his telephone, making arrangements for them, when Kaethe came in fresh from the railroad station, delayed in her return from Berlin by the troop trains clotting the line.

She was congratulating them on their escape when Brahms entered—and her thin cry of horror was something Forbes knew would ring in his ears forever. The man was not her father! His frau was not her mother! The Gestapo had planted them during her absence, to replace her arrested parents and ferret out the grapevine aiding anti-Nazis.

Fists hammered the front door even as Forbes shot its bolt. Two cars were disgorging Gestapo men, rifle-armed, by the front steps. Up through the house the cornered fugitives panted, locking the imposters into a closet on their way. Besiegers already were trampling the garden beyond a swiftly barricaded back entrance, also. The house was surrounded.

It was the rooftops or nothing. They leaped the twelve-foot gap to the next eaves, taking the girl with them. Bullets whined after them. Balanced on the guttering, Kirk Edward spun, flayed out blindly—and fell.

When they took leave of the brave girl who refused to accompany them back to England, while Germany still needed her, they were only three.

Three who had been five! They captured a Gestapo car in the street—a car from which, mere moments earlier, they had witnessed Baumeister himself descending—and now they swerved it toward the border with motor roaring. New knowledge that their special nemesis was still so close on their heels goaded them onward.

They crossed the Dutch border without danger, their uniforms and official car their passports. But they hadn't sped a dozen miles onward before Forbes spotted an official car and motorcycles racing after them.

From there on, it was like a whirlwind finish at the Derby. An ambush awaited them at a quaint little farm to which the

Use these special creams

An old, weather-beaten look is a high price to pay for a summer's fun.

Exposed to sun, wind and weather, without benefit of hat, your unprotected skin may develop a plague of blemishes which are not easily banished—a dried-up harshness or a shiny oiliness; blackheads; enlarged pore openings.

To keep your skin soft, smooth and delicately fresh, give it special care with two special creams . . . Phillips' Milk of Magnesia Creams.

PHILLIPS' MILK OF MAGNESIA SKIN CREAM

A night cream with double benefits. Here's what this remarkable cream does: 1. It softens and neutralizes acid accumulations often found in the external pore openings. 2. It retains moisture in the skin (due to an ingredient, cholesterol), and so helps to keep it soft, supple and pliant, free from excessive dryness. And it's a joy to use because non-greasy.

SKIN CREAM

A flattering foundation. By day use it as a powder base and you'll marvel at the subtle way your make-up blends. Because it prepares the skin properly, powder and rouge cling for hours. You'll also find it a helpful protection against sunburn and windburn.

PHILLIPS' MILK OF MAGNESIA CLEANSING CREAM

The minute you cleanse your face with this cream you know it's different! It not only loosens and takes up surface dirt but enters outer pore openings and cleanses away accumulations which may lodge there. Cleaner, softer, smoother, more refreshed—that's the way your skin looks and feels after cleansing with this cream.

Major must have telephoned ahead. But they hurtled right through the thick of it, and by some triple miracle escaped alive. They lost the pursuit car and were pounding northward toward the Channel when the inevitable happened.

Their motor sputtered and died. It was out of gas.

They abandoned the car and were proceeding afoot when they spotted the big fuel truck swerving off the highway ahead of them. The rutty trail seemed to lead nowhere, back into weed-choked woods, but—fuel! Forbes looked at Johnny and Johnny looked at Jed and the trio veered inward. There was a single, overpowering thought in three desperate minds.

In a clearing well back from sight, a rehabilitated British Hudson bomber was being readied for action. While they crouched, screened from view, mechanics were fueling the craft and loading aboard a giant demolition bomb. A Luftwaffe touring car arrived presently, bearing a crew of pilot, co-pilot and bomber. They all carried British flying togs.

In whispers, Forbes revealed what their chatter made clear.

Thus camouflaged, the Huns intended to land their two-tonner on the Battersea Waterworks before being spotted as enemies. A swarm of planes with incendiaries would follow them. London would be ablaze in a matter of hours—with no water coming through to fight the fires.

While the hidden trio still debated their next move, it was settled for them. A distant, ominous sound had become the baying of hounds as they listened. Baumeister and his men were closing in, trailing them from the abandoned Gestapo car. Regardless of odds, they had to start moving!

They were half way across the clearing before any of the workmen realized these uniformed strangers were up to no good. They broke into a run just as Baumeister started roaring orders in the distance. Johnny slugged the last mechanic to bar their way. Jed dove underneath to kick away the wheel chocks. Forbes jumped the gunner already inside, hitting hard.

Jed scrambled into the plane just as Johnny got it rolling. Machine-guns from the field began to pepper them unmercifully. Forbes had the blister gun taken over from his German and he swung it back toward the snipers below. They began to sprawl as his slugs found them.

But one of their last bullets had made a lucky hit. Jed stiffened, slumped and rolled into the control cockpit, clawing his abdomen.

Grim-jawed as the bomber began to lift, Forbes finished off the last job they had left. He leveled the blister gun on Baumeister's sinister figure and let her start kicking. The Major toppled forward. His body lay dark on the field, like a stain, when the plane banked.

They were headed home, now. Two, who had been five! Two with a mission completed! Two with that information Hitler's henchman hadn't halted!

Their plane veered north, toward England.

REMEMBER WHEN . . .

In 1932, wide awake studio prowlers were warning us that Bette Davis, a rising starlet, was a little thing to keep an eye on. She was living with her mother not far from her studio and busy writing three times a week to a boy in Amherst.

overheard telling a pal, "I did my best to give it the old Cubanola, even though I didn't know what it meant!"

No out-of-door night scenes can be filmed, so the roaring fire sequence had to be shot inside a sound stage. Everyone connected with the sequence was given a detailed description of the plan of action, a couple of aspirin tablets and a special pass to let them on the set.

Towering, full-grown pine trees were set in place to represent the Black Forest of Germany. A special tarpaulin painted blue to represent the sky had to be swung into place, else the camera, shooting upwards, would catch pictures of electricians instead of views of fleecy clouds. Half the tree-branches were heavily sprayed with fire-proof liquid, so that the flames wouldn't get too far out of control. The studio fire department was stationed right outside the stage during the three days it took to film the scene.

Studio production nearly came to a standstill the day Walsh filmed the sabotage-factory scene. Only building large enough outside of the aircraft factories was the crafts building, where all the sets are constructed. All equipment was moved out, and professional arsonists moved in.

Citizens of nearby Piru suffered some bad moments when the troupe, garbed in Nazi uniforms, zoomed into town in trucks for a day's location shooting. During a lull, Ronald Reagan, Errol Flynn and Alan Hale wandered down the road to a nearby coffee-and spa. They debated for a few minutes about going in, dressed as they were with swastikas plastered all over their uniforms. They had no other clothes with them, though, and the odor of freshly-baked doughnuts was powerfully persuasive.

The three of them lined up at the counter and waited for the attendant's eyes to pop. He fooled them—gave them a dead-pan stare, then said:

"You boys don't look like you're from any of the local camps. Are ya?"

"No," said Flynn, pulling out all the stops on his clipped accent, "we're R.A.F. flyers. Had to make a forced landing in the hills a few miles away."

"Oh," said the guy and went on pouring their coffee.

The boys are still trying to figure out just who got the kidding on that deal!

I SAW IT HAPPEN

In the Cincinnati winter of 1938, Jane Withers was making a personal appearance. Backstage where we went to see her she sat quietly with her mother, demure, sweet, shy, very proper. We were disappointed at seeing the screen's pet tomboy so different in real life. As we were getting up to leave, Jane spotted a pin my cousin was wearing. "Oh!" she blurted out as she jumped up impulsively, "I like your Mickey Mouse pin. Where'd you get it? Gee, it's keen!"

There it was, the real Withers enthusiasm, the lively, unspoiled Janie that we all adore.

other child had been the darling of millions nor queen at the box office for seven long years, with all the adulation that entailed. It wasn't healthy, wailed the experts. The artificial life was bound to ruin her. Either she'd go on making pictures and never know a normal girlhood or, removed from the limelight, she'd pine like a fish out of water.

It would be nice if every fourteen-year-old were as healthy, happy and normal as Shirley is today. The wailers reckoned without two factors—Shirley's disposition and her mother's wisdom.

"What's a premiere?" asked Shirley, on being taken to her first.

"Something to honor the picture and everyone who made it—from producer to propmen and grips."

"Me, too?"

She's enjoyed making pictures, but they've never been her whole life. The domestic round of the Temples has remained pretty much what it would have been if they'd never set foot inside a studio. Shirley's no poor-little-rich-girl. She's known the security of a normal family background. Her mother's put her to bed, her father's taken her to parties, her brothers have roughhoused with her, she's always had plenty of children to play with. Life at home was as busy and happy as life at the studio. She attached no greater importance to one than the other. They were both part of being Shirley Temple.

So life didn't stop for her when she left TCF. She was old enough to have grown critical, to understand why she was leaving. "Oh, Mom, the same old lines and the same old picture. Don't you think I'm getting too big to be cute?"

Shirley doesn't emote. She keeps her feelings to herself. But she was visibly startled and upset by the news that she was a year older than she thought she was. Till the first strangeness wore off. Then she found herself rather pleased than otherwise. "That brings me a year closer to being grown up, without waiting."

She was fourteen in April. Her face retains its child's contours. The mouth-corner dimples continue to come and go. But her body is growing long and slim. She's a half inch over five feet, weighs a hundred and one, and is ending her freshman year at Westlake.

school days . . .

Most children tolerate school. Shirley revels in it. Its good comradeship and competitive spirit are as thrilling to her as a studio lot might be to your own youngster. She's a good B-average student, who cops an occasional A in French or art or algebra, her favorite subjects. The girls call her Little Bug, because she's the smallest in their group, and are unimpressed by her movie career. Mrs. Temple chose the kind of school that takes movie youngsters in its stride. Harold Lloyd's girls go to Westlake. So do Joan Bennett's.

Shirley was glad to make "Kathleen" and "Miss Annie Rooney," and just as glad to get back to school again. One compensation for missing school was that she had lessons at the studio with Mary Lou Isleib, her stand-in and chum from way back. New friends haven't weakened the bond between her and Mary Lou, who still comes to spend the night in Shirley's other twin bed. They giggle and whisper after lights out, subsiding only when Mrs. Temple calls up for the third time: "Aren't you girls ever going to sleep?"

Shirley has a picture a year to do for Edward Small for the next two years. She's committed to "Junior Miss" on the air for at least six months. That's enough, the Temples feel. More would interfere with her school and personal life, which they're resolved shall not be interfered with.

As it is, her days are pretty full. Her alarm is set for seven, just in case. Mostly she's up before it rings. Five minutes to wash and slip into her school uniform—or it might be ten, she concedes—anyway, it's as fast as she can make it. Not that breakfast lures her—it's the one meal of the day she can't stand. But Chingching, her precious Peke, and the funnies are waiting. They're both more diverting than food in the morning. While Dad reads the rest of the paper, she reads the funnies and talks to Chingching. By the time that's over, there's not much time left for breakfast. Besides, she has to hold Chingching in her lap, which makes eating difficult. Mom doesn't come down, that's how she gets away with it.

Katie, the cook, has her lunchbox ready—a couple of little sandwiches, cookies, sometimes fruit cocktail in a cup, and a thermos of milk. She used to eat in the school dining room, till a bunch of them decided that picnicking out on the lawn was more fun. The chauffeur drives her to school, where she stays till three except on Tuesday and Wednesday, rehearsal and broadcast days, when she's off at noon. Whatever she misses, she has to make up by herself. Mrs. Temple gets no concessions for her and wants none. After "Miss Annie Rooney" she took and passed the same tests as the rest of her class. Since afternoons are given mostly to physical training, her scholastic routine doesn't suffer by reason of her radio program. But she hates to miss military drill, taught by a real captain in the real army—especially since she's lieutenant of her group and gives the commands.

Generally she goes straight home from school—maybe bikes around the grounds with her Dad if he isn't busy or challenges him to a game of badminton, at which she's good. Or she'll go to the kitchen to kibitz with Katie. If Shirley likes you, she'll rib you. If not, she's just a nice polite little girl. She ribs Katie like mad. She'll steal up behind and tickle her neck. Or haul her round the room in the latest dance step. Or plant a bottle of bath salts, which Katie loves, in the double boiler. But if she wants to help with the dinner, as she frequently does, Katie stands for no fooling. Shirley's allowed to make the butter rolls or fix the salad, but under strict supervision, and the finished product's got to measure up to Katie's high standard.

By her own account, she's a very good eater, especially along some lines like chocolate éclairs. Otherwise, she can take dessert or leave it. She likes solid foods—meat and potatoes and vegetables—squash as often as she can get it. Candy doesn't interest her much. She chews gum on occasion and, so long as it's only on occasion, Mrs. Temple lets it pass.

Home lessons after dinner generally take about two hours. She sort of enjoys them, because there's no one around in her little sitting room, telling her what to do or anything. For company, she tunes in a symphony on the Capehart.

Bedtime is nine, she sleeps in pajamas, and her room is still that of a little girl. Blue rug, blue flowered wallpaper, blue tie-backs for white organdy curtains, quilted cotton bedspreads with a design of quaint little figures made out of scraps of her childhood dresses. A doll sits on one bed, a lamb on the other, an ancient teddybear lolls on the chaise longue. If there's a script to learn, her mother goes over it with her before turning the lights out.

sweet dreams . . .

"Good night, Prune." The pet name of her babyhood.

"Good night, Mummy." It's Mom as a rule, but Mummy for some reason at bedtime. By the time her mother gets downstairs, she's asleep.

Those are the weekdays. Week-ends have more variety. She belongs to a number of groups—the Thrifties, the Nightingales. The Thrifties include the younger members of the Assistance League. Shirley's president right now, and just got through running a fashion show for the League's benefit. The Nightingales make bandages and knit for the army. She's knitted a sweater and several scarves.

There are luncheons and an occasional movie. She was so crazy about "Fantasia" that she saw it three times. Of recent pictures, she liked "The Invaders" best, and she wishes Vivien Leigh would make more films. Vivien's her idea of near perfection on the screen.

There are dances on Friday or Saturday nights. She may have left the girls an hour earlier, but they call up to check, and the conversations, in which little of anything is said, would go on forever unless stopped by maternal authority at one end or the other. She doesn't fuss much about what she's going to wear—just looks in the closet and sees what's hanging there and tries to remember what she wore the last time. She is fussy about her hair. Only her mother can do it right, and to wash and cut it is a two-hour job. Since it's naturally curly, the rest is easy. Mrs. Temple has only to wind it round her finger.

Week-ends she's allowed to use lipstick and the palest pink nail polish. After getting the lipstick on, she mops most of it off. Her nails are the pride of her life. She calls the pinky nail Elmer and, left to herself, she'd wear them much longer than the family law permits. She hasn't got around to using perfume yet, but dabs a little toilet water on her arms. Then her mother gives her the once-over, and they go down to the living-room where her date is waiting.

Boys as boys mean little to Shirley. The important thing is that they should dance well. Since she's good and popular, they phone for a date a couple of weeks ahead, and the two are driven to the party in the Temple car by the Temple chauffeur. Whether she dances with one boy or many in the course of the evening depends on school policy. Some schools have program dances, some don't. Shirley likes it better when they change around. Jitterbugging, she says, is a matter of opinion. If you're in the mood for it, you let loose. She's more often in the mood for a slow foxtrot, which is just about her favorite. One night she went to a civic affair at a large high school, where the kids were mostly strangers, and each of the seventy-five or a hundred boys watched his chance to cut in and dance with Shirley. In the car going home, she took off her slippers and wriggled her toes. "They stepped all over my feet," she explained with a grin. "But my! I had a wonderful time."

Mrs. Temple likes to have her friends at the house as much as possible. They gather on Sundays, swim if it's warm, run archery and badminton contests, play records down at the Pupule House or roll back the rugs and dance. The Pupule House is the Hawaiian playroom built beside the pool. "That's what they call them in Honolulu," Shirley tells you. "It means crazy." Sometimes the youngsters broil their own hamburgers on the outdoor barbecue or are taken to a drive-in.

Her favorite color is still red, though turquoise runs it a close second. She'd rather wear beanies than hats, and thinks slacks are cute but doesn't get much chance at them—only for rehearsing dances. She's growing clothes-conscious, her chief interest being in sports clothes, "because that's what we mostly wear—you know, collegiate."

Her temper's even. No one's ever seen her in a tantrum. If she gets sore, she goes quiet on you. This happens when her mother's severe with her, as mothers must be on occasion. Then she sits round the room and gives dirty looks. But it never lasts more than ten minutes.

Theoretically, her allowance is five dollars every two weeks, but business arrangements with her dad are somewhat elastic. At school she doesn't need money except to pay dues once in a while, so when she needs some, she asks Dad, and he gives it to her. Gifts gouge the biggest hole out of her budget, and around birthdays she puts herself in hock for weeks ahead. It's worth it, she thinks. Dad's been known to go a little easy when the load's heavy. Her parents are keenly conscious of the importance of teaching her the value of money.

At fourteen, the war has come home to Shirley. Her brother George, a marine aviator, was stationed at Ewa Field in Hawaii on December 7th, and it wasn't till three weeks after Pearl Harbor that they learned he was safe. Last April a shortwave broadcast was sent by remote control to army camps all over the world. This was the biggest thrill—not because, as mistress of ceremonies, she introduced Dotty Lamour and Baby Snooks and Abbott and Costello. But because George had said, "I want to hear my sis's voice again."

"That's all I could think," says Shirley, "that my brother was hearing it."

I SAW IT HAPPEN

A year or so ago when "The Philadelphia Story" played the Toronto stage, I waited at the theater early one evening to give Katharine Hepburn a portrait I had painted of her. Certainly it was no artistic triumph, but had it been a Rembrandt it couldn't have received more enthusiastic appreciation. She was really delighted and shook my hand warmly. After the show, when Miss Hepburn was hurrying from the theater to her car, she spotted me in the crowd and stopped for a few minutes to tell me how much her friends all liked the painting. It isn't every actress who would be that thoughtful.

"Perfectly Mated... and Perfectly Miserable"

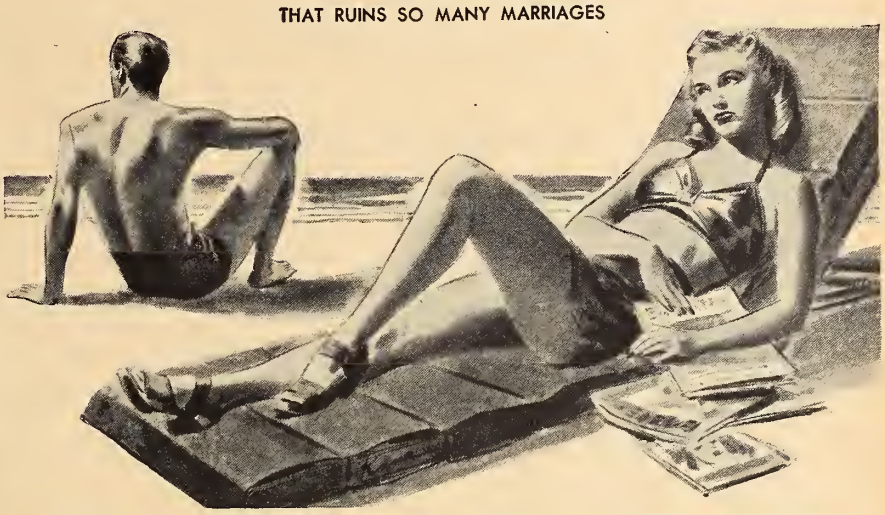
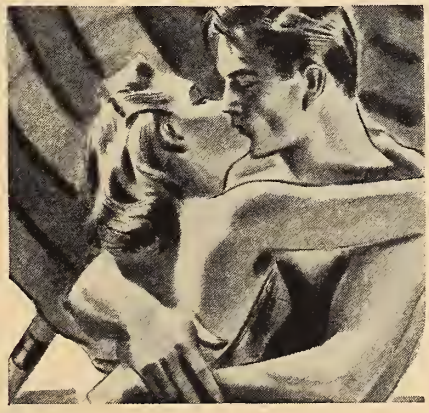
HOW A YOUNG WIFE OVERCAME THE "ONE NEGLECT" THAT RUINS SO MANY MARRIAGES



1. Everyone called us "the ideal couple." At first, we were . . . ideally happy. But gradually, Chet stayed away . . . or kept his distance . . . more and more. I was miserable . . .

2. One morning, my chum found me crying, down on the pier. I didn't want to, but she made me tell my troubles. Then . . . "Little silly," she scolded, "it's happened often. The loveliest girl can lose her husband if she's guilty of one neglect. Carelessness . . . or ignorance . . . about feminine hygiene." Then she explained . . .

3. "My doctor," she told me, "recommends Lysol—and here's why. It's so effective a germicide that it speedily kills all germ-life in the vaginal tract on contact. Yet it's so gentle it won't harm sensitive vaginal tissues—just follow the easy directions on the bottle. And Lysol cleanses and deodorizes, too."



4. Thanks to her, I use Lysol regularly. And it works! I find Lysol easy to use, so inexpensive, so effective. And today, Chet and I are the ideal couple—ideally happy, once more!

Gentle—yet IT WORKS

Used as directed, Lysol is harmless to sensitive vaginal tissues (not an acid—no free alkali), yet there is no germ-life in the vaginal tract that Lysol will not kill speedily on contact. SPREADING—No other widely advertised douche preparation has the wide spreading power Lysol has—Lysol solution virtually searches out germ-life in tiny folds other liquids may never reach. ECONOMICAL—Small bottle makes almost 4 gallons of solution. CLEANLY ODOR—Soon disappears. HOLDS STRENGTH—You can rely on Lysol's germ-killing power to the last drop.

MID-SUMMER MAKE-UP MAGIC

sallow or "faded tan," brighten it up! Dust your rouge puff lightly over forehead, nose and chin, and then smooth the color in with your fingertips. You can achieve this same effect one other way—with a rose-toned powder base.

LIPSTICK—There's a new movement in Hollywood. Down with over-painted lips, say Bonita Granville and other young stars! It's sound advice, too, particularly for summer days when heavy effects are out and informality is in. Apply a firm layer of lipstick so your lips have a smooth, even finish, but blot off all the excess with a handy facial tissue. The blotting will also "set" the color and keep it on much longer, in spite of your frequent trips to the faucet or soda fountain on hot, sultry days.

Lipstick is magic, too, when you use it with a deft hand. Visualize your ideal mouth and pattern your own as near like it as possible. If your lips are too thin, give them some added "weight" by bringing the color slightly beyond the natural lip lines. If they are too full, stop the lipstick a little inside the outer borders. If you think your mouth is too wide (although that is a sign of two fine traits, generosity and good disposition), stop your lipstick a little before the ends of your lips. To make a narrow mouth appear wider, extend the color a bit beyond the corners but slant the "addition" upward, not down, so you don't give yourself a sad expression. If you undertake any major lip alteration, sketch in your new mouth first with a lip pencil and then fill in the lipstick.

Another trick from Hollywood's sleeve . . . rouge the upper lip a little more heavily than the lower. This helps make your face look interesting and expressive.

LIPSTICK AND ROUGE SHADES—Put your winter make-up in moth balls when the summer sun is shining. If you are playing the gypsy with either real or artificial sun tan, your old make-up looks out of place. Even if you have not deliberately basked in the sun's shining rays, summer exposure has probably darkened your complexion a few degrees at least. Besides, you're wearing bright gay colors—and your make-up should keep step.

If you are blessed with light skin and golden or titian hair, your complexion will tend to become more pinkish as mid-summer approaches. Wear lipstick and rouge that are medium in intensity and on the orange-red side.

If your skin and hair are half-way between light and dark (that Typical American Type), brighten your coloring with brilliant red-red or rose-red make-up. Here's something enterprising Anne Shirley discovered about rose or blue-red lipsticks . . . they make your teeth look whiter because of their bluish caste. Experiment, and you'll see that it's true.

If your summer complexion is a tawny-gypsy hue, show it off with vivid red-red or orange-red make-up. The brighter, the better!

POWDER—Powder shades change even more than lipstick-rouge when summer rolls around. You may have to buy several to keep up with your sunburn. Match your skin or foundation as closely as possible because lighter powder looks artificial and too dark a shade makes you look old. It slips into the "laugh lines" of your face and makes them appear to be wrinkles.

When you put on your powder, slather it all over, so your face looks as if it had been dumped in a flour barrel. Wipe off the excess with a clean, fresh puff, and you'll be pleasantly surprised at the velvety complexion in your mirror.

YOUR EYES—You can do a lot with your eyes, as every smart gal knows. Flirt, tease, smile or use them to provoke a bit of sympathy or a strong, protective feeling. And you can do lots more of all of those if you touch up your "windows" with make-up magic!

Mascara is as important as lipstick to a Hollywood movie queen. It makes her eyes look bright and shining and so-o-o much larger! Give those eyes of yours a chance to look out on the world from an appealing, flattering frame. Brown mascara if your hair is light, and black if it is dark—is the make-up magic that will make your lashes seem long and silky, like the lucky girl in the movies who "always gets her man."

Eye shadow brings out the color in your eyes and helps make the eyelids look smooth and sleek. Eyebrow pencil intensifies the fine, clear line of your brows, and you should always use it in short, straight strokes to simulate actual eyebrow hairs. A blurred dot of crayon (or mascara) at the outer corner of each eye is one way the Hollywood stars make their eyes appear larger.

Eye make-up is especially important if you wear "specs" for regular use or sun glasses to cut down summer glare. Shadow, mascara and brow pencil will highlight and accent your "peepers" so they won't appear small and insignificant.

The magic touch of Hide-It will camouflage a lot of things. It makes blemishes, light scars, under-eye circles do a disappearing act, and if your sun tanning efforts leave stripes of white where none should be, it will paint them a darker shade. If your cheekbones are too pink or your nose too red, subdue them with a lighter tone. Hide-It comes in five shades, so you can always find the right one to practice your gay deception.

It's a smart girl who matches her powder to her summer complexion. Lady Esther has nine exquisite shades from which to pick the best one for you. Its fine-grained texture will settle on your skin as lightly as a summer breeze and cling as flattering protection for hours and hours. Let Lady Esther Face Powder help make you into a glamorous creature, the most-dated girl in town!

tello have a trained seal to play stooge to their pranks in this one; Sharkey, the seal, is a little fatter than Abbott and not quite so funny as Costello. But, then, that seal swims like a fish.

The story that weaves all this together is concerned with one Wellington Phlug (Costello) and one Alsey Shaw (Abbott) who agree to drive a rich playboy to Los Angeles from Chicago in their cross town bus; the boys, evidently, just got tired of nickel fares and, besides, the playboy had a transfer. In Los Angeles, Robert Paige (the playboy) is due to take part in a yacht race, and true to form Abbott and Costello find themselves aboard ship for no good reason. Shanghaied with them is Virginia Bruce, who, it develops, is a darn good sailor. Caught in a storm, the boat is cast up on a small island inhabited by cannibals; for good measure, there's a group of desperate white men, too, hot on the trail of a fabulous jewel fortune.

Before things wind up to a final clinch, Costello is acclaimed a long-lost hero, gets into a fight with the clapper of a huge bronze bell, makes friends with a hungry lion and is finally sent to a deserted old ruin supposedly inhabited by an angry cannibal god. He's sent, among other reasons, because he explains that he isn't "very digestible."

Between the cannibals and the desperate white men, they come in for a full share of spine-tingling, uproarious adventure. At odd moments the Ink Spots fill in with harmony, and Nan Wynne manages a song or two along with a spot of dancing. Abbott and Costello foil the white men, foil the cannibals and arrange for Robert and Virginia to fall into each other's arms.

By this time every one must have (or at least should have) seen one Abbott and Costello picture; your life isn't complete without it. You should know by now just how these clowns affect you. If they made you laugh before, they won't fail you now. "Pardon My Sarong" is broad, funny and tuneful; Costello is just broad and funny.—Univ.

P. S.

Leif Erickson, playing a native, whipped up a new language of his own for some ad libbed dialogue. Turned out to be a combination of Hopi Indian, double talk and old-fashioned Norwegian . . . the wardrobe department ran up three outfits apiece for Abbott and Costello at a total cost of $38.50. Bud's bill was $19.00; Lou's $19.50. Extra charge for Chubby was for labor. . . . Both boys had to learn magic routines for their roles. Instructor was Charles Sylber, owner of the Hollywood House of Magic. Lou got discouraged, trying to fool his youngsters. No one bothered to tell him that kiddies are twice as skeptical as adults. . . . This is Samuel Hinds' 300th picture in ten years. Hinds, once a millionaire lawyer, turned to acting after losing his entire fortune in the crash. . . . Bud and Lou looked at the script, saw they were to work with a couple of wild animals. "Not with US!" chorused the boys, so all those scenes were shot with the beasts in one spot, and A and C in another, far, far, away. . . . Virginia Bruce socked Robert Paige on the head with a break-away vase that didn't live up to its name. Total damages: three stitches had to be taken in the cut on Mr. Paige's brow.

EAT NUTRITIONAL FOOD

This month I want to give you some of the "reasons why" for the first of the food groups in the Nutrition Food Rules listed below. Milk and Milk Products carry the essential food factors in a convenient form. This is true of fresh, evaporated and dried whole milk. Cheese also helps to supply milk solids in a form which most people like.

Everybody needs milk—drink it, eat it in "made" dishes. A glass of milk furnishes about 160 calories—equal to 8 teaspoons of sugar. Its high food value makes it a better choice for those who have to watch their weight.

CROSSROADS

What would you do if you were told that you weren't yourself but someone else? It's a pretty point, especially when there's a fortune and a beautiful girl at stake. And it would be even more disturbing if you were a rather tony diplomat accused of being a petty criminal.

In a nutshell, that's what William Powell faces in "Crossroads." As David Talbot, about to leave as Ambassador to Brazil with his newly married wife, Lucienne (Hedy Lamarr), he's suddenly faced with a blackmail demand of one million francs. An ambassador doesn't yield to blackmail. He promptly jugs the extortionist; and just as promptly the extortionist (Vladimir Sokoloff) proves in court that the Ambassador, frock-coat and all, is one Jean Pelletier, a notorious petty criminal.

Ambassadors may be criminals; that much is allowed in diplomatic usage. But petty? Never! Bewildered and stunned, David Talbot fights the charge. But proof mounts up against him. A night club entertainer (Claire Trevor) identifies him as a long lost lover. The blackmailers challenge him to produce proof of where he was in 1919. That's tough; for Talbot had been in a railroad accident and as a result was suffering from a type of amnesia.

History has moved at breakneck speed for the past few decades, and an Ambassador might be excused for not knowing just where he had been. Or even where he's going. But a court of law is a court of law, and proof is proof. He's saved finally when Basil Rathbone steps in and testifies that Pelletier died in his presence. A live Ambassador, obviously, cannot be a dead thief. Case dismissed.

But here's the rub. Rathbone is himself a blackmailer, and no sooner is the trial over than he begins again on poor Talbot. He threatens to reopen the trial, and this time the charge wouldn't be petty larceny but murder! Rathbone claims he has proof Talbot, when he was Pelletier, murdered the victim of a robbery. Talbot has popped out of the frying pan only to land in the fire.

It's then that wife Hedy Lamarr steps into the case. One way or another they must find out his true identity. Did her husband indeed keep jimmies and gimmicks stored away in his striped pants? Was his top hat only a masquerade for a Raffles? Pretty problems and a fine mess for an innocent wife to find herself in.

It's unethical to give away the details of the case; it's like spouting the murderer of a who-dun-it. But it's a mad chase the Talbots run to find out who they are; like trying to catch up with your shadow. But Ambassadors are good at chasing shadows or bubbles. It's only occasionally that bubbles burst. —M-G-M.

P. S.

Lieutenant Robert Montgomery, on leave from the United States Navy, spent a few—very few—minutes watching Hedy Lamarr and William Powell working in one of the most dramatic scenes in the picture. After Hedy had nervously fluffed her lines three times, she turned to Bob, blushed prettily, said, "I guess it's the uniform. It scares me." Montgomery smiled and left the set. . . . The day the picture started, Powell found two dozen roses in his dressing room, a "good luck" gesture from wife Diana..... Final pages of the script were kept secret. None of the actors knew what their screen fate would be. All of them vowed the suspense made them give a better performance. . . . Felix Bressart always wears a fake moustache in pictures, is never recognized in public 'cause he looks so different with a nude upper lip. . . . Bill Powell sings in one of the scenes. Nothing fancy. He's still a little sensitive about his voice. The first time he sang in public was during a play, 15 years ago. One critic's printed opinion: "William Powell had his good moments in the play, but his singing was not one of them." . . . Daily visitor to the set was George Montgomery. In uniform for "Ten Gentlemen From West Point." It didn't scare Hedy Lamarr once.

first leaked through to the outside world when Chinese youths began arriving at the field in droves, where today they are learning U. S. flying technique, and studying the planes they will pilot against the Japs. They are taught their lessons in Chinese, and few understand English.

Besides Thunderbird Field, the Hollywood gang is also interested in nearby Falcon Field where British fliers are in training. According to a Hollywoodian who recently returned from there, most of these future RAF aces, can't even drive an automobile, and they're so young, their canteen doesn't even carry razor blades because there's no demand for them! But the kids are bright and spirited and eager to get in the fight—and that's what'll count in the end!

HOLLYWOOD DIARY

Sat. May 23rd: Gotta hand it to Priscilla Lane. Imagine eloping right under the noses of the whole darn town! You never would have guessed what was in her mind when Jean Kinkead and I visited her on the "Silver Queen" set the other day. She did seem nervous, though. In the four hours we were with her she puffed away a half a pack of cigarettes, explaining she smokes when she's under a strain; hardly ever when she's not.

LITTLE RED RIDING HOOD MARRIED THE "WOLF"

Laraine Day's name was flashed at him.

"O.K., so I'm a cad," he told himself. "But this is one way of getting to know her."

He'd heard enough about Laraine to be genuinely interested. She had the kind of face that doesn't happen very often. She danced like a butterfly. She was quick-witted and fun and . . . well, just an all-around good thing.

A few nights later, Ray wondered whether the end would justify the means. After all, he was a singer, not an acrobat. All his adult life he'd gotten by with the simple arrangement of steps he tenderly called "the Hendricks Special" . . . and who ever heard of a wolf doing an adagio, anyhow?

"Where are those knees and elbows going with the rest of you," Laraine was shouting above the music. "Try to relax. Unknot yourself and follow me."

Whereupon Ray found himself gliding through an intricate maze of steps . . . through the breaks, the slides, the works!

"That's the boy," laughed Laraine. "Now you're forgetting yourself!" Forgetting himself indeed. Forgetting everything but Laraine . . . her sure-footed ease. The floating, swirling, shimmering grace with which she danced.

swept off her feet . . .

Their first date had in it all the anguish of one's first high school prom. He'd asked her to dinner. Because Laraine hates hurting people she said, "Yes, thanks, I'd love to." But immediately she'd started poking into her mind for a plausible out. It wasn't that she didn't like the guy. It was that their relationship, until then, had been so casual . . . so "hi-ya-kid-what's-cookin'." But a formal date would be different. They hardly knew each other. What would they talk about. Time would drip by thickly, and of course he'd never ask her out again. Suddenly the Robinsons flashed into her mind. (He's a close friend of Ray.)

The Robinsons took a Boy Scout oath right then and there. "You can count on us," they said, with enchanted grins on their pans. Half an hour later they were echoing the promise to Ray who had phoned to say, "Look, pal, I'm wilting my collar! I've strung myself up by the shirt-tail, and I'm hanging there waiting for help. You know how it is when you're taking out a girl who really means something to you, and suddenly your jaw freezes up."

The Robinsons did show up, but not until ten o'clock. Two thoroughly oblivious diners looked up at them vaguely and said, "O, it's you!"

Laraine and Ray discovered enough mutual habits and interests to fill a Sears Roebuck catalogue. It was natural their friendship should have wound up in marriage two years later. So natural that neither one of them had been fully aware of what was happening.

When the papers carried the brief announcement, "Laraine Day, actress, wed to Ray Hendricks, civilian flying instructor," wires buzzed furiously.

"Laraine, you haven't really done it. A feet-on-the-ground girl like you, marrying during war-time? Could it be possible?"

"It's not only possible. It's actual. And, darling, it's a star-spangled delirium! It's . . . well, it's just something you can't put into words."

But Laraine didn't have to put it into words. You could see it in her eyes.

strains of lohengrin . . .

They were married on May 16, 1942. Hardly half a dozen people attended the ceremony. There was no music, but you could hear the birds busily chattering outside in the brilliant spring sunlight. The fireplace was banked with flowers . . . not orchids, but white gladioli and snapdragons. Laraine entered through a nearby doorway dressed simply in a white print dress.

That evening Ray left for Falcon Field, Arizona, driving through the night to get there by reveille on Monday.

Since then they've both lived for weekends. It's meant more to them than a couple of days spent in tired old clothes. It's meant hours of sun-soaked fun. It's meant the Farmers' Market . . . the picnics . . . the long, starry drives at night . . . the hours of talk about themselves, their work, their house.

Often, on Saturday afternoons, they mosey through furniture stores, stopping now and then to inspect a delicately-turned vase. Or Ray might sink into a deep-cushioned arm-chair while his wife fingers the price tag.

"Don't tell me the price, Laraine. That always spoils things. Let's pipe-dream."

"But, darling! It's only . . ."

"What would we do with it, anyhow. Wrap it in tar-paper until after the war?" (It isn't until then that they'll be able to have their own place.)

"Just the same, we'll need something like this for your den."

"Not MY den."

"Sorry, darling, I forgot. You do insist on red leather chairs, don't you?"

"And pine panelling," adds Ray. "But, of course, the walls won't really matter so much because they're going to be covered with aviation maps anyhow."

Ray's ideas about the house begin and end with the den. The rest is Laraine's.

"I can see it when I close my eyes," she tells him. "It's going to be done in early American. Chintz at the windows . . . pottery over the fireplace . . . a slouchy sofa covered in linen . . . loads and loads of ivy. I know it's not terribly original, but I'd rather be comfortable than clever."

"Smart girl, my wife," nods Ray in approval.

One night they took Deanna and Vaughn Paul with them, but it was an ill-starred evening. They'd just about exhausted all the old Irving Berlin tunes when the lights went out along the highway. The radio in their open roadster reminded them of the blackout they'd forgotten . . . a blackout that lasted four hours. When the all-clear sounded they were stiff with cold, but hoarse from laughing at the old jokes they'd dragged out to pass the time.

The Farmers' Market has become a kind of Saturday morning ritual with the Hendrickses. They love roaming through the fabulous bazaar that covers acre after acre. The stalls are jammed thickly together, rich with the color and odor of a thousand things. "This always makes me feel like Richard Halliburton in the Orient," laughs Laraine. "All they need is a snake charmer."

Pointing her nose like a setter, Laraine says suddenly, "What is that heavenly thing I smell?"

"Follow that quivering nose of yours, and we'll find out," Ray advises. But they never do. An oyster bar or beanery always side-tracks them. Sitting at a bright red table under a gigantic yellow beach umbrella, they abandon themselves to the steaming dish before them.

"Remember the day I started with clam juice and ended with those huge slices of cucumber floating in sherry vinegar?" Laraine asks.

"That's the day I named you goon girl."

"And held me back with both hands when we passed the barbecue."

gift goofy . . .

In addition to owning a shock-proof tummy, Laraine has an over-generous heart. Take, for instance, the little matter of Ray's birthday. Seems it follows Christmas so closely it's always been slighted. Laraine thought it wasn't fair.

"Well, knock me down," Ray said, the night Laraine handed him three brightly wrapped packages marked "Happy Birthday." Smiling broadly, he unwrapped a sweater that was a couple of sizes too small but none the less precious. In addition there were two rather gay pairs of plaid wool socks and a cigarette lighter. Attached to the latter was a tag bearing a few lines of doggerel.

"There once was a young man named Ray,
Who ran out of matches each day,
As well as at night,
So, here, to give light,
Is a vest-pocket fire,
That won't go astray."

The firm of Day & Hendricks is mad about movies . . . and a lucky thing because movies are inexpensive. By the time Saturday night rolls around their joint budget usually reads, "$4.25 to fritter." That covers dinner, movie and hamburgers. Unusually they drive out along the road for their wimpies.

And after they've munched their two apiece:

"Ray, what do you think of her?"

"Who?"

"The ingenue in the movie."

"You could have done it better."

"No, Ray, I'm serious."

"So am I, darling. The trouble with you is you're modest."

And she is. With utter sincerity she'll tell you she's never been deluged by autograph hunters . . . never been followed mutely by the staring eyes of admirers.

"Listen, my pretty pigeon, every time I take you into an ice cream place, heads bump together and people whisper, 'That's Laraine Day over there.'"

All this might leave one with the impression that all is sweetness and light with the Hendrickses. . . . But the truth is, they've had their darker moments. Moments like the time Ray called long distance from Phoenix, steaming mad. It seems somebody had prematurely released the story of Laraine's engagement. The newspapers and radio networks got the news before Ray's parents.

"A fine thing, picking up the morning paper and finding your son's going to be married," Ray shouted. "What kind of a heel will they think I am?"

"But, Ray, honestly . . ."

"And another thing, Laraine . . ."

By the time Ray said good-by, Laraine was in tears, too bewildered to explain.

But Ray was on the wire again. She listened, keeping an indignant silence, but inside her head there was a singing . . . a glorious, light-hearted singing.

"We've hurdled the first obstacle. We took it clean and now we're safe."

Ray at the other end, was saying, "Darling, I blew my top off, and I'm sorry. I'm just a great big lug who talks too much, but you said you'd marry me, remember? And now you're stuck with it."

FOOTLIGHT SERENADE

he really was Mature, (Vic obligingly told 'em), they began writing notes to be passed around to their chums during morning classes. From then on the 7:20 trolley became a rolling chapter of the Victor Mature Fan Club, with new members piling on at every stop!

light fantastic . . .

Any blonde cuties planning to step into Betty Grable roles ought to scan the list of Unfortunate Incidents that nearly ruined our honey-headed heroine during filming of the picture. First of all, she suffered a couple of torn abdominal muscles when Mature, who's not a professional dancer, misjudged his timing in their adagio routine. She did the rest of her dances with a taped-up torso.

Later on, Betty had another dance to do with Vic. She went into the scene a little fearful, and sure enough, came out minus the nail of her index finger! The palm of Victor's hand had struck her outstretched fingers as he swung her to him. She had to have the digit bandaged and equipped with a false finger-nail before production could resume.

The trickiest dance in the picture has Betty literally knock herself out at the finish. Not one, but two Grables appear on the screen, dancing for four and a half minutes. The trick photography involved made it necessary to have every step marked out on the floor, and Betty had less than an inch latitude in overstepping the chalked lines. She had to do both routines, of course, and each had to be timed to match the other. The entire number took two weeks of patient rehearsal, one week of careful filming. Betty spent her entire day off in bed, as a concession to her silently suffering basal metabolism.

The fisticuffs in the film had Jack "I zigged when I should have zagged" Roper as technical adviser, and cost the studio a total of $40,000. To cover the biff-bang stuff between John Payne and Victor Mature, C. H. Halligan of Lloyds wrote a policy on each of the men, for $50,000. Premiums paid by the studio amounted to $57.40. Mature took out a similar policy himself. "If my mug is worth $50,000 to the studio," he reasons, "it's worth as much to me!"

The fight in which Mature knocks out Payne took up only two minutes in the script, but on the screen, actual running time is four and a half minutes. Says Producer William Le Baron: "In a motion picture or in any other descriptive medium which makes an appeal to the imagination, there is no such thing as actual time. An event is only as long as it seems."

bussing technique . . .

The kissing scenes are something else again when it comes to the time angle. Things work just the opposite for osculation. All kisses in the script were shortened. "If a kiss lasts too long on the screen," says Le Baron, "the audience becomes self-conscious and often embarrassed!" Anyone with a complete explanation of why this is so is cordially invited to write to Mr. Le Baron c/o 20th Century-Fox, Beverly Hills, Calif.

Between scenes, the set phone was used constantly and alternately by Jane Wyman and Cobina Wright, Jr. Both were moving into new houses and had to check details by remote control.

Frances Smith, who handles all of the fan mail for the studio, says that during production of "Footlight Serenade" Betty Grable's mail set a new record—14,800 separate pieces in one month. Betty does not personally reply to post cards or requests for pictures, but does answer all letters requesting information.

Director Gregory Ratoff worked out a new technique called "shorthand" directing. He likes to explain it to mystified set-visitors.

"Ven a take is no good, I knock my cane vunce on the stage. Ven it is good I knock twice. Ven it's terrific—I knock t'ree times and we print the one after that! That's sansashional!"

MANY NEVER SUSPECT CAUSE OF BACKACHES

This Old Treatment Often Brings Happy Relief

Many sufferers relieve nagging backache quickly, once they discover that the real cause of their trouble may be tired kidneys.

The kidneys are Nature's chief way of taking the excess acids and waste out of the blood. They help most people pass about 3 pints a day.

When disorder of kidney function permits poisonous matter to remain in your blood, it may cause nagging backache, rheumatic pains, leg pains, loss of pep and energy, getting up nights, swelling, puffiness under the eyes, headaches and dizziness. Frequent or scanty passages with smarting and burning sometimes shows there is something wrong with your kidneys or bladder.

Don't wait! Ask your druggist for Doan's Pills, used successfully by millions for over 40 years. They give happy relief and will help the 15 miles of kidney tubes flush out poisonous waste from your blood. Get Doan's Pills.

kid herself that he might come breezing in tomorrow.

Ready for bed, she shifted his picture on the dresser, so it would be the last thing she saw before turning out the light. She'd dreaded bedtime but, worn out by emotion, she fell asleep quickly that night without shedding a tear. A record for her. She seemed to have been howling steadily for weeks. A time came, she supposed, when the well dried up.

There had been a couple of hysterical scenes in "The Constant Nymph," which had come easily to Brenda.

"How can you cry so much?" young Joyce Reynolds had asked her.

"With a husband going to war, it presents no problem."

Maybe if they'd been married longer—if their time together hadn't been so broken up— No, it wouldn't have made any difference. All their married life had been shadowed by the shape of things to come. She remembered the train, packed with boys in uniform, when she'd gone up to Canada for "Captains of the Clouds." She remembered thinking, "Thank God, we're not at war yet."

After Pearl Harbor she refused to think. When it came, it would come. Meantime each day was a reprieve. She knew Bill would have to go, that he wanted to go, that he was tormented only by the thought of leaving her and the knowledge of what their parting would mean to her. Once she caught him muttering, "Got to get into it."

At sight of an envelope marked Selective Service or War Department, her blood would freeze. She'd phone Bill at the studio. "Open it, honey." Come down for a physical, it would say, or something like that, and she'd breathe again.

Warners' wanted her to go to New York in February for the opening of "Captains of the Clouds." She wouldn't, unless Bill could go along. So Columbia postponed the starting date of "Meet the Stewarts," and they stopped over in Washington for the President's Birthday Ball.

New York had a special significance for them. They were going to be happy together where once each had been wretched alone. Bill had been sent there for the opening of "Golden Boy"—a greenhorn, on trial in a tough racket, his future at stake, not knowing a soul. Brenda was there at the same time—just back from her first picture in Hollywood, uncertain as to whether her option would be picked up, all her friends away in summer stock.

She scowled at the picture of Bill Holden in the paper. "Young upstart! Who does he think he is, playing Golden Boy. Luther Adler's Golden Boy." Later, she and the young upstart compared notes on that summer and resolved that if ever they got time off for a honeymoon, they'd spend it in New York.

On the third afternoon of their stay Brenda got in at five-thirty. They had tickets for "Blithe Spirit." A few of the publicity boys were there along with Bill.

"Well, honey," he hailed her, "the draft board's called me. Got to fly back tomorrow night." Just like that, light and casual, but his eyes never left her face.

She stood, trying hard to swallow the lump in her throat. Then, "Darling," she wailed, "it's getting so big I can't stand it," and fled to the bedroom.

Presently, sounds seeped through her misery. Bill had had a piano moved in. He doesn't play very well, but he likes to bang. When she reappeared, the boys had gone—all but Bill Yolen—and the two Bills were creating a diversion for her benefit by the four-handed rendition of comic songs. She gave them a watery smile, in return for which they played louder, faster and funnier. The noise drowned out another rising sob from the small figure in the armchair behind them. Whatever Bill did, all she could think was, pretty soon he wouldn't be doing it any more—

Noel Coward had to knock himself out for Brenda that night. While the curtain was up, she laughed and laughed. When it came down, she had only to look at Bill and keep a tight clutch on his hand.

Brenda and Bill know what it means to say good night till it be morrow. If the actual moment of parting is the worst of it, they got more than their share. In a minor way, it started the following night when, through a driving storm, she drove him to the airport. She had to stay ten days longer for the opening of "Captains."

The plane was scheduled to leave at ten-thirty, weather permitting. Weather didn't permit, so they sat in the waiting room playing gin rummy till three, at which time they were told to go home and return at seven-thirty. A couple of hours sleep, a dismal breakfast, driving back through the still pelting rain, hanging around some more till the ceiling cleared sufficiently for a take-off at eleven.

Bill fought against making "Meet the Stewarts." He wanted a quick break. But Columbia fought, too, and had him deferred long enough to make the picture. Meantime Warners' had it all planned for Brenda to return to Hollywood via Louisiana, with a couple of stopovers. She nixed that, and no monkey business, even before receiving Bill's wire. "You're my wife. I need you here. Besides, I can't make out my will without you."

While Bill made his picture, she wept her way through the part of Toni in "The Constant Nymph." They had dinner together every night in their little dining room—the only completely furnished room in the house. Among their wedding gifts had been a case of fine wines. Bill would be darned if he'd leave them behind, so he had them served with every meal. "Honey, I love you," he'd tell her from across the table—and laugh as he said it. Once she asked him why he always laughed. "Better than crying."

farewell to arms . . .

She laughed sometimes, too. When he brought new guns home to add to his precious collection. As if he wouldn't be having his fill of guns before long. He handled them so tenderly, he wiped fingermarks off so carefully before returning them to the case. She vowed that when he left, she'd have the case locked and hide the key away, so that no one could touch his treasures while he was gone. She promised that if worse came to worst, his guns would be the last thing she'd part with. She giggled at a vision of herself and Ginger, squatting in rags on some bare strip of ground, entirely surrounded by guns.

His picture finished, he reported to the draft board. "You'll have to wait," they said. He'd had all the waiting he could stomach, asked permission to enlist. It was granted, and he enlisted on sentimental journey . . .

By now Brenda felt with him, the quicker, the better. She kept a tight rein on herself. On Saturday they dined with a close friend. On Sunday Bill packed. It didn't take long—socks and underwear, shirts and shaving kit, only one pair of pajamas because he'd heard it was sissy not to sleep in your underwear.

They went to the Beachcomber that night. It held common memories. Bill had gone there one evening, flanked by Wayne Morris and Buddy Westmore, three musketeers who'd scrapped with their girls. They had a fine time feeling sorry for themselves and dubbed their compartment the crying hut. After making up, Bill steered Brenda to the crying hut, which together they re-christened the laughing hut. That's where they went Sunday night. They ate with the special chopsticks marked BM and WH. Then the chopsticks were put away. Brenda wouldn't go to the laughing hut again until Bill came home.

Next morning he said good-by to Ginger. "What shall I send you?"

Ginger's four and a half. "Send me a soldier hat," she said gravely, "or a hat with flowers."

He wouldn't let Brenda take him to San Pedro. He wanted to go with the boys. So she drove him down to the center on Main Street, from which they were scheduled to leave. Bill felt lousy. He had a cold and was running a temperature. Brenda found a tight parking space and pulled up to the curb. As his arm went round her, three Mexican school girls spotted them. They stood on the sidewalk, giggling and poking each other. Brenda drove on. A light turned red. "This is where I get off," said Bill and kissed her. The light turned green. Her eyes clung to his face for a moment, and she forced her lips into an answering smile. Then she turned the corner, wondering dully whether big moments were always like this except in the movies.

Between prowling round the house, bathing her eyes, picking up books and throwing them down again, she got through the day. At five-thirty the phone rang. Bill. They'd allowed him three days traveling time to go home and nurse his cold. Two thoughts snapped through her head. It's all to go through over again. I'm going to see him again.

She nursed him through Monday night and all day Tuesday. On Wednesday he dashed down to the barbershop and had his hair cut off. Again she drove him to Main Street, again they said good-by. Late Friday night he called her. They were leaving for the East next day—if she could be at Ft. MacArthur between twelve and twelve-thirty, there was a chance they might get to see each other. He wanted some more socks and underwear. She could pick up his civvies, which they weren't allowed to keep.

She arrived before twelve, but nobody could tell her where to find him. After chasing frantically from office to office, racing against the minute-hand of her watch, she finally got a pass, found a sentry who directed her right and reached the place five minutes after he'd left. A friend of his was waiting for her with his civvies. Equally frantic meantime, Bill was pursuing the officer in charge for a pass to admit his wife into camp. Breaking down at last, the officer phoned the gate. "Is there a gray Cadillac around with a young lady in it?"

On advice from Bill's friend, she'd gone down to the Union station. The troop train was due to go through there, and there might be a layover. She phoned a message home that she'd wait for him near the information booth.

The station was jammed with uniformed men. At first she went hunting for him, because suppose he didn't phone home? But that was hopeless, and no one would admit to a civilian that such a thing as a troop train existed. So in the end she took up her forlorn station by the information booth. And an hour later she felt a hand on her arm and heard a voice say, "Hello, honey."

She'd never seen him in uniform, and the spectacle might have scared her if she hadn't loved him so much. Golden Boy into rookie! An overseas cap perched on an all but clean-shaven head, body bulging from his twice-too-tight khakis. She wanted to laugh and cry and kiss him, and she did all three.

They said he could leave, since his wife was there, but to be back by eight. So they went to the Biltmore. Bill ordered a steak, and Brenda picked at a salad. This time he was really going far away. There were so many things she hungered to tell him. She made one or two abortive attempts. "Don't," said Bill. "The time's so short." What he meant was, he didn't want her to cry.

They said their real good-bys in the parked car, just in case there might not be another chance. There wasn't either. In the train two women stared, so they got out and stood on the platform with all the rest and shifted from foot to foot and looked at each other and said, "It's just another location."

All aboard!—this was it—he pecked at her as if she'd been his sister—the train was moving—she walked along beside it, faster, faster—he was leaning far out to wave and she was running down the platform till a curve cut him off.

Next day came a letter Bill had written from the train—a love letter, in which among other things he said: "Johnny Doughboy's got his gun, and he's finding it a little heavy."

miss you . . .

It's grown lighter since. The first state of confusion when he felt like a bowl of jelly in an earthquake, has given way to the ordered routine of an ordered existence. He's adjusted by now and says it's hard to remember what civilian life was like. He enjoys the training and drilling, the comradeship and military courtesy. He loves pistol and rifle practise and swells with pride, in a modest way, because he's a whiz at both. He could do with a little less of the kitchen police meted out to rookies, complaining that he's likely to emerge a better dishwasher than a soldier.

They write every day—sometimes more than once a day. Bill scribbles little notes from the edge of his bunk between classes—the last one written just before he goes to bed by the light of a flash. He's asked for pictures of the house and of a favorite horse he used to ride and of Rhodes, the lionhound, who sleeps outside Brenda's door since he left. He's asked for more pajamas, too. It seems you can sleep in pajamas and still be a soldier. He was amazed and touched to learn that his fan mail has tripled since he joined the army.

Brenda cries less. She's made a radical discovery. You can bear what you have to bear. The advance terrors are worse than the actuality. What right has she to complain when so many other guys are going, when so many other women are in the same boat?

WAKE UP YOUR LIVER BILE—

Without Calomel—And You'll Jump Out of Bed in the Morning Rarin' to Go

The liver should pour 2 pints of bile juice into your bowels every day. If this bile is not flowing freely, your food may not digest. It may just decay in the bowels. Then gas bloats up your stomach. You get constipated. You feel sour, sunk and the world looks punk.

It takes those good, old Carter's Little Liver Pills to get these 2 pints of bile flowing freely to make you feel "up and up." Get a package today. Take as directed. Effective in making bile flow freely. Ask for Carter's Little Liver Pills. 10¢ and 25¢.

MAIL COUPON TODAY...TEST 10 DAYS ON GUARANTEE OF FULL SATISFACTION OR MONEY BACK! The beautiful, sentimental solitaire has a gorgeous, brilliant center replica, nearly ¾-karat size and two dazzling replicas on each side. The mounting reproduces in fine detail the same popular ring styling which has been the rage from Miami to Hollywood. It is the ring of youth, of love, of affection. You have your choice of genuine sterling silver or yellow gold-plate mountings. Remember, we're not trying to tell you these are real diamonds. The originals would cost $100.00, $200.00 or perhaps more. But these replica diamonds ARE one of America's greatest imitations. Not too big, not too flashy, it takes the closest inspection to tell the difference. Stage stars, celebrities, social leaders and millionaires don't risk their precious originals but wear replica diamonds without fear of detection.

The solitaire is offered to you for only $1.00. The solitaire and wedding ring to match are specially priced at only $1.69 . . . the perfect pair for only $1.69. Send no money. Just mail the coupon below and deposit $1.00 for the solitaire alone or $1.69 for both the solitaire and wedding ring, plus 10% Federal Excise Tax, and postage charges. Inspect these beautiful replica diamonds. Wear them, see how real-like they sparkle, how amazingly brilliant they are, how envious your friends may be. Convince yourself—compare these replica diamonds with originals. Consider them on-approval, on free trial for ten full days. Then, if you can bear to part with your rings, if you aren't satisfied in every way, return them and get your money back for the asking. Don't wait, but mail the coupon, today!

Invite Romance with a Skin that's Lovely go on the CAMAY MILD-SOAP DIET!

This thrilling idea is based on the advice of skin specialists—praised by charming brides!

HAVE YOU ever heard a man say of another woman—"Her skin is lovely"—and wondered what he was thinking of yours? Wonder no longer—be sure your skin invites romance! Go on the Camay Mild-Soap Diet!

Let this exciting beauty treatment help bring out all the real, hidden loveliness of your skin. For, without knowing it, you may be cleansing your skin improperly . . . or using a beauty soap that isn't mild enough.

Mrs. Thorsen's skin is wonderful proof of what proper care can do. "Not a morning . . . not a night would I let go by without following my Mild-Soap Diet routine," she says.

Tests prove Camay milder!

Skin specialists advise regular cleansing with a fine, mild soap. And Camay is milder than dozens of other popular beauty soaps tested. Start today on the Camay Mild-Soap Diet!

For 30 days use Camay faithfully night and morning. From the very first treatment, your skin will feel fresher—more alive. And in a few short weeks greater loveliness may be your reward.

This lovely bride, Mrs. Robert M. Thorsen, of Evanston, Ill., says: "I've found the Camay Mild-Soap Diet to be a beauty treatment that really works for greater loveliness. I'm so pleased with what it has done for my complexion!"

GO ON THE MILD-SOAP DIET TONIGHT!

Get three cakes of Camay today! Start the Mild-Soap Diet tonight. Work Camay's lather over your skin, paying special attention to nose, base of nostrils and chin. Rinse with warm water and follow with 30 seconds of cold splashings.

In the morning, one more quick session with Camay and your face is ready for make-up. Do this twice a day for 30 days. Don't neglect it even once. For it's the regular cleansing that reveals the full benefit of Camay's greater mildness.

FOR 30 DAYS...LET NO OTHER SOAP TOUCH YOUR SKIN!

Now Guess Her Age!

New-Texture Face Powder Makes Her Skin Look Years Younger!

By Lady Esther

ONCE THIS lovely girl looked quite a bit older. Some people actually thought she was approaching middle age.

For she was the innocent victim of an unflattering face powder! It was a cruel powder, both in texture and in shade—showing up every tiny line in her face—accenting every little blemish and skin-fault—yes, and even making the pores seem somewhat bigger, coarser!

But look at her now! Can you guess her age? Would you say she is 21—30—35?

She has changed to Lady Esther Face Powder—the powder with a new and different texture. Lady Esther Powder is deliberately planned to flatter the skin, to make it look smoother, fresher, younger!

Lady Esther Face Powder is not mixed or blended in the usual way. It's blown by TWIN HURRICANES until it's much smoother, finer, than ordinary powder.

But it's not the texture alone that's so different! The TWIN-HURRICANE method makes the shades different, too! Just imagine—hurricanes blow the color into this amazing powder! That's why the shades are so rich and glamorous. That's why Lady Esther Powder makes your skin look so much fresher, younger.

Try this hurricane-blended face powder! See how it helps hide little lines and blemishes, helps hide big pores and even tiny freckles! See how it gives instant new life and freshness to your skin—how it makes your skin look years younger.

Now more beautiful women use Lady Esther Face Powder than any other kind.

METRO-GOLDWYN-MAYER'S LION'S ROAR

Published in this space every month

The greatest star of the screen!

The minutes of the last meeting, read and approved, placed "Mrs. Miniver" right up there on all ten-best film lists of all-time. Now we can get on to present and future business.

Clark Gable (Honky) and Lana Turner (Tonk) ignite again in "Somewhere I'll Find You".

"Tish", based on the popular stories by Mary Roberts Rinehart, dusts off the mantle of Marie Dressler and tenders it to Marjorie Main, who plays the title role.

The inimitable Mickey Rooney becomes "A Yank at Eton" and the role becomes Mickey Rooney.

Judy Garland's out-and-out starring vehicle is one of the out-and-outstanding entertainments on the horizon. "For Me and My Gal".

"Red" Skelton and Ann Sothern are in "Panama Hattie". You'll see Red—and Ann.

"Random Harvest", the James Hilton best-seller, is in the able hands of Director LeRoy and stars Ronald Colman and Mrs. Miniver Garson.

"Seven Sweethearts" brings prominently to the fore those up and coming artists, Kathryn Grayson, Van Heflin and Marsha Hunt.

MOVIE REVIEWS

By Zachary Gold

Blonche Stroeve (Doris Dudley) runs owoy with Strickland (Geo. Sanders) ofter nursing him bock to heolth in her husbond's home. Miss Dudley left Kothorine Cornell's show to play in "Moon."

When "Moon ond Sixpence" wos written, it rocked the ort ond literory circles of the doy becouse of its bold similority to the reol-life story of o fomous modern painter-genius!

United Artists' production of "Moon" is bosed on the soltiest ond most widely reod of oll Somerset Moughom's novels. Above, Strickland ond Coptoin Nichols (Eric Blore) when pickin's were smoll!

THE MOON AND SIXPENCE

Swinging from the old Paris of bohemian artists, studio garrets and second rate cafes to the color-drenched islands of the South Seas, "The Moon and Sixpence" paints a wide and absorbing canvas. Lusty, real and alive, it sketches a group of full-blooded figures on the screen that you won't soon forget.

In the movies and fiction generally the artist has usually been portrayed as a romantic, sensitive-lipped, hothouse flower. Charles Strickland, the artist of "The Moon and Sixpence," is a romantic figure, vividly so, but the rest of the definition goes by the board. For Strickland, in many ways, is a male Scarlett O'Hara; driving, intense, proud and egotistical, he leaves wrecked behind him the lives of women and men as he marches toward his goal. "The Moon and Sixpence" is sharp, acrid and somewhat salty to the taste.

Taken from the novel by Somerset Maugham, it takes a place with other unusual films that have been fashioned from his work. You should remember "Of Human Bondage" which not so many years ago catapulted Bette Third woman in Strickland's life is Ata (Elena Verduga) with whom he falls deeply in love in the island paradise. Rale requires her ta wear a camplicated 2-haur make-up.

Davis to stardom; further back there was "Rain," colorful and dramatic. "The Moon and Sixpence" is another leaf from the work of this sharp-eyed reporter of the human race.

It tells the story of the artist and genius, Charles Strickland. Until he was forty, Strickland lived the placid, somewhat smug life of a fairly successful stockbroker, head of an average family, seemingly somewhat dull and prosaic. And then one day, for no apparent reason, he left his family, his business, all his connections and went to Paris. His wife was sure a woman was involved; but in the usual sense there was no "other" woman. Charles Strickland, at forty, had decided to be an artist. Simply that.

Or perhaps not so simple. It poses a riddle of character and morals, personality and conventions not at all easy to understand. It is that riddle which Geoffrey Wolfe, a writer whose life touched Strickland's at various points, sets out to solve by telling the story of the artist's life as he knew it.

Wolfe met Strickland in Paris and found him utterly without remorse for his action, without pity for his wife, without sympathy for his children. Strickland simply said that he had to paint. Nothing else mattered in the whole wide world. Without money, he lived on crumbs, literally half starved, yet he never made the slightest move to return.

Once, falling seriously ill, he was taken in by a kindly painter, Dirk Stroeve, who believed Strickland a genius. Stroeve nursed him back to health, cared for him, fed him, gave him a place to sleep and work. In the end, his health restored, Strickland repaid Stroeve by running off with his wife. Stroeve's despair failed to move him; he called him a "fat fool." And when, in turn, the wife committed suicide because of him, Strickland merely shrugged. He had taken her in, he said, because he needed practice painting the female figure and could not afford models.

Through all the years in Paris, Strickland lived with the vague dream of a land flooded with sunshine and color, where he could paint as he felt he should paint. And finally, through (Continued on page 12)

Avoid crowded week-ends to make the most of Greyhound Travel in Wartime

THE BEST travel-time in wartime is on mid-week days—too many people want each bus seat on week-ends and holidays—the only times that many war workers and men in uniform can travel at all! You'll help ease crowding of buses by going on Tuesday, Wednesday or Thursday whenever possible. It's also wise to avoid taking trips in rush periods and on holidays. Get information and tickets as far in advance as you can—and don't take any more baggage with you than is absolutely necessary. Your cooperation will aid in keeping vital wartime traffic on the move!

MODERN HAIR RETAINER

Hollywood stars can't stop to fix their hair whenever they'd like to. That's why so many of them depend on Grip-Tuth. Grip-Tuth looks like a comb—but isn't. This non-metallic hair retainer slides into your hair in a jiffy—and stays there until you take it out! And that's especially important if you're working in the war effort, where you must keep your hair up, out of the way! Try one to hold your wave. Try one to keep your hair high on the sides. Try one to anchor bows or flowers just where you want them! Two on a card (or one extra length) only 25c. If notion counter or beauty shop can't supply you, send 25c for card. State hair color.

accident, he heard of the South Sea Islands—Java, Bali, Tahiti. He beat his way there, surviving incredible physical misery, living on slops, braving dangers. Reaching there, he found it the Paradise he had dreamed about.

He settled on the Islands. He took a native wife and found that he loved her as he had never loved a woman before. Isolated from civilization, away from a world which didn't understand him and which he couldn't endure, he found his happiness. It wasn't destined to live long, for Strickland caught leprosy and after a few short years in his Eden, he died.

His end, horrible and untimely, was perhaps the just desserts for his life. Surely he had spared no one in achieving what he had wanted. But that is just the point of the picture; who was at fault in the life of Charles Strickland? For all he did, he repaid in masterpieces of painting, pictures of a wild and brooding beauty. Who was in debt—the world to the artist, or the artist to the world? The picture does not solve the riddle; it does not condemn. It merely presents.

Told in a manner to catch the full flavor of the book, "The Moon and Sixpence," uses a narrative flashback technique. It's not entirely new to the movies, but it has rarely been used so extensively as here. Almost throughout the whole picture, there is a narrator, the writer Goeffrey Wolfe, telling the story in the background while the screen acts out the words. It's a novel and highly effective way of presenting a story whose flavor lies in the mood and the curiously impersonal point of view.

George Sanders, in an ideal bit of casting, plays the haughty, contemptuous Strickland; Herbert Marshall, the writer Geoffrey Wolfe. Doris Dudley and Elena Verdugo handle the female leads. Albert Basserman, Steve Geray, Eric Blore and Florence Bates round out the cast. For good measure Devi Dja and her group of Java-Bali dancers are included.

Depend on it, "The Moon and Sixpence" is excellent entertainment on any level. The story is vivid, moving, different, colorful in locale, exciting in incident. You will get from it exactly what you care to; an hour and a half of rattling, good movie, an hour and a half of good, rattling ideas. Or both; preferably both.—U. A.

P. S.

George Sanders stopped off in Hollywood to spend a week-end and has been here seven years. Didn't know anyone here, but got indignant when refused a trip through the studios. One week later he was working at 20th Century-Fox as Madeleine Carroll's husband in "Lloyd's of London" . . . Katharine Cornell advised Doris Dudley to accept the role, said it was the best motion picture script she'd ever read . . . Doris still winces at mention of her previous film appearance, a part in "A Woman Rebels" with Katharine Hepburn. That same opus is also a skeleton in the closet of one Van Heflin . . . Elena Verdugo, the native girl Sanders marries, is 17 years old, a descendant of the old Early California Verdugo family. Studied Spanish on the set between takes and found a tutor in Sanders, who speaks the beautiful language like a native son. When asked how the Javanese liked American movies, Devi Dja said they were very well received, but that Dorothy Lamour came as quite a surprise to them!

HOLIDAY INN

There's a rumor that the film cans of "Holiday Inn" are done up in gift wrappers, gay as a penny post card from a vacation resort. Joyous as a Christmas gift, romantic as a Valentine's day greeting, satisfying as a Thanksgiving Day turkey, "Holiday Inn" is as delightful as an unexpected birthday present.

For the occasion, Paramount has merged the nicest double feature bill you could think of and served it up on one platter. Bing Crosby's dulcet voice and Fred Astaire's miraculous feet beat out counter tempos for the picture. Not enough? Music—tinkling, gay and romantic—by Irving Berlin. More? An entertaining story, bright lines, pretty faces.

The story's about the lives and loves of Jim Hardy (Bing Crosby) and Ted Hanover (Fred Astaire) who have an act doing the rounds of the New York night clubs. And a couple of gals, of course. One of them, Lillie Dixon (Virginia Dale) danced with Ted, kissed Jim and loved everybody. So she marries a Texas oil millionaire—

Ted goes out to the nearest bar to brood; Jim goes out to the country for his. Brooding among the cows and chickens, he turns up the bright idea of making his farm into an Inn. The place is to be open only holidays, some fifteen a year; the rest of the time he can lie around and recuperate. A Holiday Inn!

Up pops the second gal, fresh as a country egg, blooming as a peach on the limb, pretty as a tiger lily, sweet as honey from a hive. She's Linda Mason (Marjorie Reynolds), and she's turned up at "Holiday Inn" for a try at show business. And up pops Ted, drunk, disorderly and with a broken heart. He stays drunk and disorderly, but the broken heart mends quick as a zip of a zipper as soon as he sees the girl. That's where they came in: two guys and a gal—but love, they say, is a merry-go-round anyway.

And this merry-go-round comes complete with music and dancing. Ted snags her for a partner in a couple of routines; Jim serenades her with "Easter Parade" and a couple of other smash tunes. In between, regretfully but firmly, they try to slip daggers into each other's backs. It's a happy threesome up "Holiday Inn" way.

It all works out. But before it does, the picture skips to Hollywood, winds up a lot of song numbers, gets off a slew of gags; and all with high gaiety as befits the holiday spirit. Jim gets Linda at the end, but Ted gets back Lillie; everything —songs, girls, jokes and spotlight—is divvied up as neatly as a Lease-Lend treaty.

But it's the production numbers which make the picture the top-notch entertainment that it is; and there are fifteen of them spotted through the story. They run the gamut from slick ballroom numbers and romantic ballads to a spiritual with Bing in blackface and a Colonial number with Fred in knee-length pants and buckled shoes. They're just the best there is in Hollywood in their respective fields—Crosby and Astaire. And that's enough.—Par.

P. S.

Trickiest of the dance routines is Astaire's Fourth of July number . . . Explosion of fire-crackers was timed to accompany the tapping . . . Dance director set 'em off by means of an "organ" equipped with fuses instead of keys . . . Everyone except Fred wore goggles for eye-protection against the 3000 tiny torpedoes that explode during the dance . . . Bing Crosby's muscles took a terrific beating. For four days he pitched hay, milked cows, dug ditches, pruned trees, while the cameras ground. Result of his hard labor—a fast-moving two-minute montage . . . Prop men spent four days affecting each change of season. Used 20 tons of blossoms, buds and flowers for the Spring and Summer scenes . . . Bing started the film immediately after a trip to South America. All the mail that came to him from his newly found friends there was addressed simply "El Bingo" . . . Fred Astaire went through every one of his dances in slow motion so the "still" man could get his quota of pictures. Contrary to general opinion, Mr. Astaire is one of the most co-operative gentlemen in pictures . . . He's very superstitious and won't allow any member of the cast or crew to get a hair-cut during production. During the last two weeks of the long shooting schedule, the long-haired boys exercised iron control and completely ignored the constant yoo-hoos of their pals.

THE GAY SISTERS

The Gaylord sisters, three of them, were weaned on subpoenas, went to grade school with a bailiff, had their first dates in a Magistrates' Court and bloomed into beauty with the Circuit Court of Appeals. That's not to imply that the Gaylords were a bunch of minor Dillingers. They manage to cut up a few touches; at the opening of the story one of them takes a high kick at a photographer's camera, and one of them sports a monocle. But the gals are really Society, and their long legal career is just due to a will—or really a couple of wills.

It seems that after the death of their father, two wills were discovered, and while the claims and counter claims were being sifted, twenty-three long years passed, the girls got to know every judge in the circuit and lived on advances of the money due them. Root of the trouble is that one will gives a large chunk of dough to a charity, and the eldest sister Fiona (Barbara Stanwyck) has refused to settle or even compromise.

Fiona is quite a girl; high spirited, proud, beautiful and stubborn as an army mule. It's not that she has anything against charity that's kept her fighting these twenty-three years; Charles Barclay (George Brent), head of the charity, has refused to settle unless Fiona sells him the Gaylord house for a project of his which is a sort of miniature Radio City. So the case drags on while each of these two principals refuses to give in an inch.

That leaves the other two sisters high and dry with Fiona. One of them, Evelyn (Geraldine Fitzgerald) has taken up café society while cooling her heels waiting for the millions to drop into her lap, managed to snag an English lord for a husband and sports the aforementioned monocle; the other, Susanna (Nancy Coleman), has stubbed her toe with an unfortunate marriage which broke up a few days after the ceremony and, at the moment the story opens, is in love with an artist. Evelyn and Susanna, however, are completely under the thumb of the quick-tempered Fiona and just sigh and wonder what it's all about.

What they don't know is that Fiona and Charles Barclay were once married. Matter of fact there's a child, Austin, as proof of the nuptials; but no one knows that Austin is Fiona's child, and no one knows, except the two, that Fiona and Charles were once man and wife. The story of that marriage is one of Fiona's high-handed tricks; she married Barclay only to collect some money coming to her from an aunt, coming to her only if she married by a certain time. You can't blame Barclay for being a little angry about it when he found that out; the boy was really in love with Fiona.

Those skeletons in the closet rise to haunt Fiona, for Charles Barclay finds out about the child and threatens to blow the whole case wide open. Meanwhile Evelyn, on the loose and with nothing to do, has taken a shine to Susanna's artist and Susanna is broken-hearted. Faced with the prospect of ruining all their lives unless she settles with Barclay, Fiona gives the child to Barclay in return for a compromise on the wills.

Defeated, lost, her child gone from her, Fiona's a pitiful figure in the run down Gaylord house. But we said above that the guy loves her, didn't we? So it all ends happily, for oddly enough, she loves the guy, too. Fiona and Charles are re-united; Susanna gets her artist and Evelyn goes back to London, to an embattled England.

The role of Fiona is a meaty one for Barbara Stanwyck, tailor-made for her intensity and beauty. In the role of Barclay, George Brent has one of the best parts he's had in a long time. There's a host of top-notch supporting players in the picture; Donald Crisp, Gene Lockhart, Grant Mitchell and Bryant Fleming handle assignments. "The Gay Sisters" is solid screen entertainment, studded with odd and colorful characters. —W. B.

P. S.

Larry Simms, Barbara Stanwyck's adopted son in the film, is much better known to fans as "Baby Dumpling" of the "Blondie" series. He's seven years old, a real he-man. Had to be held down by force when the make-up man had to powder his face for an illness scene . . . 14 exterior sets, 27 interiors were used . . . the transportation department had to round up buses, cabs, bikes, even a steam roller, for different periods between 1915 and 1942 . . . Barbara Stanwyck and Nancy Coleman had planned a gag, to continue crying hysterically after the director had called "cut" on their weeping-in-the-wine-cellar scene. By the time they'd rehearsed a couple of times they were all out of tears. Had just enough left for one "take" . . . Barbara suffered a pulled muscle in her leg, putting everything she had into a kick aimed at a newspaper photographer's camera during the courthouse scene . . . Geraldine Fitzgerald's complete costume included a monocle . . . At a sneak preview, so many people praised the work of an unknown actor, referring to him by his character name, that Bryant Fleming became Gig Young legally and will use that name for his future screen career . . . Stanwyck and George Brent have worked together before—in "So Big" and "The Purchase Price"...Brent's first scene was his wedding to Barbara. Came time for the take, who should walk demurely up the aisle and stand beside him but Annie Sheridan Brent? The expression on George's face was recorded for posterity by the grinding cameras.

WAKE ISLAND

"Wake Island" has the sharp, stinging reality of a newspaper headline. After sending out a string of pictures in which the war was a sort of khaki background for love and kisses, Hollywood has finally caught up with the grim-voiced communiques which have been coming out of Washington and the capitals of the United Nations. "Wake Island" is Hollywood's finest love story to date; it tells of men whose love of country led them to death and glory on a barren coral rock.

A speck of land in the middle of nowhere, two and a quarter square miles in area, home base for twelve fighter planes and a handful of Marines, Wake Island fought off the full fury of Japanese air and sea attacks for precious weeks until the last plane was gone, and the handful of Marines had shrunk to a fistful of men willing still to fight and die.

"Wake Island" tells the story of those men in personal terms. Major Caton, who took with him a silver cigarette case from his daughter; Lt. Cameron, who left his bride of a few days in Hawaii only to learn on Dec. 7 that she had been killed in the Jap raid on Oahu; Joe Doyle and Smacksie Randall, leathernecks, who yelled, "Send us more Japs," as wave after wave of attacks beat against the island; McCloskey, the civilian, on the island for a construction job, who watched the last refugee plane take off while he gathered a handful of grenades to toss at the coming Japs; Probenzki, the mechanic, performing daily miracles with the battered motors of the dwindling supply of planes; Triunfo, the steward, who went after the Japs with a Bolo; Commander Reynolds, wounded in the first attack; Johnny and Squeaky, recruits.

They all came to Wake Island. They were there when Kurusu, the Jap Ambassador, stopped over while on his "peace" mission to Washington. They were there on December seventh when the skies were suddenly split with man-made thunder as the Japs made their sneak attack.

Yet it's not all grim and deadly. For men meet danger in many ways. "Wake Island" is full of the sound of men laughing at odds, joking at death. It's a picture about men, naturally; yet not wholly. The women hover over the action, shadowy but real; there were wives and sweethearts left behind, there were girls back home. The tough-bitten old timers discuss regretfully the number of blondes still left in the world that they haven't met.

The sights and sounds of "Wake Island" were made in Hollywood; but they were created by the Marines on bomb-blasted Wake Island itself. There is nothing in the picture that could not have happened and much that actually did. Here is what American soldiers suffered on a bare atoll that we might be safe. Dare to forget Wake Island!—Par.

Gasless summer getting you down? Here's how to settle for a high old time in your own back yard!

Summer's a wonderful institution and all that, but it also has its headaches. Or hasn't yours? F'rinstance, How are you doing in the moonlight? A) Slapping swains' faces a dime a dozen? or B) Wondering why the heck nobody makes a pass at you? Either way it's no fun, but—let's face it—it's your own fault. Hardly a man is now alive who kisses without a bit of a come-on. If you're problem A, it's up to you to tone down your oomph.

Take it easy on the too-sheer-too-tight-too-low little numbers you've been wearing. A less lavish hand with the snaky perfume.

Don't double-date with a pair of confirmed smooch-artists. You feel like such a dope sitting there watching them, and you never can think of a word to say to your chum. Result: You take the line of least resistance and hate your lipstickless puss in your coldly critical bedroom mirror.

Another thing—don't be naive when your date heads his jalopy up a dead end street or starts turning off a lot of lights in your living-room. Be one step ahead of the Crisis. Get him interested in talking or doing a crossword puzzle or listening to some music. Should all your best efforts fail, and he's on with the lerve, don't—oh, never—slap his face. Say something pleasantish like, "Please don't, Bill. I'm saving my kisses for something kind of special, and this just isn't it." But smile when you say it, sister, and intimate that if he plays his cards right he might work into something special later on.

If you're problem B, look to your glamor. Stop thinking all the get-beautiful ads are aimed at the gal next door. Lovely hair, a gorgeous complexion and a darling figure are enough to make any guy look at you twice and, having looked, decide you're worth dating. Having achieved a date you shouldn't have any trouble getting yourself kissed, barring B.O. and that whole charm-slaying league. But your attitude's got to be right.

Remember that very few boys will get romantic if they think you're a face-slapper. So if a quickie clinch would make a swell evening perfect, let honey chile know you're available. When you get to your door, stand in a fairly accessible position and look into his eyes while you're telling him what a wonderful time you had. Then, instead of bolting inside, give him an instant to size up the situation. If he knows his Charles Boyer—you'll get it!

Supposing night holds no terrors for you, but Oh, those hectic days! Too much sun on the poor face, too much water on the old hair. Frankenstein in a dirndl, that's you. What's to do about it?

Sunburn: Prevent it via enormous brimmed hats, gradual exposure and reliable sunburn lotions or creams. Don't be fooled by those sunless, muggy days. They're treacherous. If you do over-tan your hide, slather on a medicated cream, keep in the shade for a few days and wear very non-scratchy clothes so that it won't peel.

Summer hair: Prevent it by wearing a bathing cap in swimming, no matter how hysterical you look in one. Wash every bit of salt water or (Continued on page 67)

BETTY GRABLE'S a softie. Way down deep. It kind of gets her when George trots up the front steps, arms full of little homely things like Kleenex and hand lotion. She wouldn't exchange 'em for a million orchids. (Hates orchids, anyway.) Born a real "St. Louis (Mo.) Woman," she keeps the boys "tied 'round her apron strings." (Y'know—those little mink things.) This dainty creature may look a fragrant blossom, but she devours onions and sucks pieces of garlic affectionately. Could be a connection with her missing wisdom teeth? Has no appendix, either, and her dancing in TCF's current "Footlight Serenade" was so hard on her anatomy, she spent days off in bed. Yearns to be a good actress—with those legs! Likes perfume, Dodgers, men. And don't those last two named return the compliment!

CESAR'S a Latin from Manhattan, running true to tradition! Gets around and knows more screen lovelies than any other two swells on Hollywood Boulevard. "Look" aptly described his position in café society thus, "It means as much to an actress to be seen with Romero as it does a piano to be seen with Paderewski." Amazing part is his apparent imperviousness. Says he's never been smitten or even faintly tied down. But we're wondering—what's about a certain sparkler stolen from his premises not long ago? And those reports of his furnishing that room strictly reserved for a missus in his Brentwood home? Folks at TCF (who certainly ought to know their favorite wolf) claim he's still up to his old tricks fascinatin' all the dames in sight in "Tales of Manhattan."

JEAN ARTHUR has come a considerable distance from the old two-reel funnies to her present prominence. On theater marquees her name is twinkling beside Ronald Colman's and Cary Grant's (in Col.'s "The Talk of the Town"). But it was a stubbled path upward . . . made more difficult by the lack of the usual fanfare. Jean had always been firm on the subject. Fanfare frightened her. She'd carve her niche with talent rather than tinsel . . . or else to heck with it. When Mr. Deeds came to town he took Jean with him. There was that wonderful rich voice of hers that turned dull lines into music . . . and her rare ability to be both forthright and feminine. They say she used gold-dust in her powder to give her face a glow. What she did to make her personality glow remains a secret.

JOHN GARFIELD used to be a problem child! Used to think he could swipe oranges and trample the teacher's tulips without anybody caring much, 'til famed understander Angelo Patri looked him over and set him on the road to correcting his boyhood speech defect, winning oratorical honors to boot. When John came to Hollywood after Broadway, he was dead set on not "going Hollywood." Made it practically a phobia, left his studio high 'n' dry when he thought maybe he was turning too fancy. It was off to the wars for him, until the film guys argued "Please." Now everybody's happy, with John going great guns in his "Dangerously They Live" role, which both he and Warners' agree is just what the doctor ordered. But nothing or no one's going to make him get a haircut more than once a month, even now!

5. Denny at the bat. Acknowledged champ of the town, he flabbergasted picnickers with 11 home runs (2 balls were batted to oblivion). "Like playing with Superman," they gasped!

6. Oops! Despite gallons of pop and milk, Julie quenched her thirst the hard way! When army caravan rumbled thru, she and Alex scooted up a tree, gave boys the glad eye!

11. "Ohhhh, he floats through the air—" After lunch they all sprawled out on Carson's blanket and screamed old-time favorites at the top of their lungs, under Denny's baton!

12. Come! After Craig trounced Julie and Alex at "Victory Rummy" he and A. (those love birds!) climbed a tree to woo, serenaded by Denny's "Don't Sit Under . . ." Later stole off and rode a wicked merry-go-round!

7. Fanning the flames! Dennis hadn't set an open fire since his Boy Scout days in Wis., tried to strut his stuff by starting it without paper. (It wauldn't catch!) Was unmercifully heckled by Carson who didn't lift a finger!

8. Knock! Knock! Dennis egged Alex on to crack hard-baileds an Craig's noggin'! Everyone was so chock full of weenies when they sat down, they horseplayed thru lunch!

9. Dennis and Craig crammed toasted marshmallows down starlet Julie's throat, hung their heads in shame when she came down with an acute tummy-ache. Later poor J. lay down far a few winks, awoke literally crawling with ants!

10. Mrs. Carson wiped Dennis' weenie-smeared puss off under a spigot, prior ta settling down to a chat an babies. His third's en route; her first (a boy) arrived last Fall.

13. Yum! Yum! Just before leaving, Carson and Denny pounced on an apple simmering in the coals. Despite menu of hat dogs, ralls, sandwiches and marshmallows galore, ravenaus Denny downed apple and pint of milk on the ride back!

14. Going home! Playing hard since 10 A.M., the crawd called it quits at 4 P.M., piled three deep in Carson's coupe, drove ½ hr. to H'woad from the 3800-acre park!

Oh, Mom! They're making eyes at her!

But Wild Indian Jane Withers won't surrender to the smoochers yet!

At sixteen, a girl leads a dub-dub-double life. She lives the honest-to-Pete existence of her gang, a very groovy gang of course, absotively hep. But she also dwells in a kingdom of dreams, a misty, enchanted land through which a knight goes riding on a curveting white horse.

She goes jitter-bugging with Pep, or night-clubbing with A C, but she comes home to leaf quickly through an enormous scrapbook of the doings of George Montgomery. She turns off the light and wanders into her playroom where moonlight splashes across the floor. From the playroom French doors, she can look down on the expanse of the U.C.L.A. campus and the glittering lights of Westwood. Next year at this time, she will be a co-ed over there. And George . . . where will George be? At war, perhaps? She has flashing visions of great deeds of valor—long newspaper stories with pictures that can be pasted in that scrapbook—and she hugs herself, shivering. Her eyes bright with unexplainable tears, she tiptoes off to her huge, satin-covered bed, to dream a jumble of parties and the rumba, of a shady bridle path and a lost earring.

Jane Withers was 16 on April 12 this year, but she had her first date, without her mother accompanying, on New Year's night, 1942. It was a triumphal beginning with a slim, courtly young man named A. C. Lyles, Jr. Everyone in Hollywood knows A C and likes him, and A C returns the compliment with gusto and fine Southern manners.

Jane first met him four years ago when he was an 18-year-old reporter sent out to cover the movie scene by the Jacksonville (Florida) Journal. He was escorted by a publicity man over to the Withers set where he met a black-haired (Continued on following page) Wasn't 'til near her 16th birthday that mom permitted unchaperoned dates. Jane and Buddy Pepper grinned at "Citizen Kane" premiere last year. Mrs. W., behind, grinned along, too.

Opening gun of Jane's freedom from chaperonage was fired by publicity man and heavy dater A. C. Lyles, Jr. They celebrated his birthday at the Mocambo, danced long, talked late.

After she finished work on Rep.'s "Johnny Doughboy," whiz-gal Withers appeared around town with none but the suave. Handsome Bob Cornell vied with Lyles for first place, lost out.

"Do you know the soup song?" she demanded.

Mr. Lyles did not.

"Consomme, My Melancholy Baby," shrieked Jane. "Do you know Chester?"

"Chester who?" asked the dutiful Mr. Lyles.

"Chester Song at Twilight," said Jane, uttering a sound akin to the triumphant blast of a locomotive rounding a downgrade curve.

"I'll be back," announced Mr. Lyles, "when you're grown up."

By January 1, 1942, one glance at Jane's magnificent pompadour (slightly hennaed by the studio for her part in "The Mad Martindales") and her blooming curves would have convinced any boy that NOW was the time to ask for a date.

A C—Southern gentleman to his finger-tips—telephoned Mrs. Withers and asked if he might invite Jane to go dancing New Year's night. Now Mrs. Withers has an X-ray eye for the virtues of potential friends of Jane. She said, "Surely, Mr. Lyles, just a moment and I'll call Jane." And when Jane hung up, Mrs. Withers said, "I like that young man. I believe I'll stay at home New Year's night, and you have your date alone, provided you're home at midnight."

Jane whooped, whirled and gave her mother a bear hug. "Mrs. Withers," she said, "you're a wonderful mother, my good woman."

Clothes, clothes. She rushed to the closet to make the astounding discovery that She Didn't Have A Thing To Wear. Mrs. Withers pointed out that the turquoise chiffon would be nice. Jane tried it on. "It's too limpy skimpy. No zing."

"How about this turquoise taffeta?"

Jane squirmed out the chiffon and into the taffeta. She scowled at the mirror. "Look at that skirt! Too fluffy-wuffy—I look like the Ides of March in a school pageant."

Mrs. Withers extracted a white starched lace dress. "There's always this lovely little number," she said with a straight face.

Jane's howl out-coyoted a coyote on a zero night. "How could you!" she yelped. The white starched lace dress has a history. The first time Jane wore it, she and Buddy Pepper, and a group including Mrs. Withers, went to Earl Carroll's. At the time, the producer of "Small Town Deb" was looking for a boy to play opposite Jane, and Jane had been in a brain-bust, trying to think of ways of getting the part for Buddy Pepper.

When the music started, Jane and Buddy made for the dance floor. As Jane entered the aisle between tables she spied her producer at a ringside seat. Clutching Pep's arm she hissed, "As we go by, I'll speak, and you turn and smile. Pack that grin with personality, Pal!"

Jane's starched white lace dress swished along the carpets and Buddy's eyes frisked the face of the producer for signs of being Pepper conscious. As the pair drew opposite the producer's table, Buddy misstepped, lost his balance, clutched Jane and PUT A FOOT STRAIGHT THROUGH THE SKIRT OF HER DRESS. The poised and pleasant smile never left his face. He and Jane, beaming upon each other, got themselves unconnected, swung around with great nonchalance and went back up the stairs. P.S. Buddy got the part.

But Jane had lost confidence in the dress. "No, something awful might happen to me if I wore it," she said. "Besides, it just doesn't have enough oomph for New Year's night."

It was then December 31st at two in the afternoon, but Mrs. Withers telephoned several of Jane's favorite shops to ask what sort of party dresses were available. Jane usually wears sample (Continued on page 72)

YOUNG MAN WITH A SOUL

Keep your eye on this '42 Ford. Glenn eats like a thresher and dances like a lug—but just watch this model shift into high gear with Joan Crawford!

Funny lad, Glenn Ford. He'd rather talk than eat, but he just won't give on one fascinating subject—Mr. Ford. What's he doing about the war, his current love-life—everything you're dying to know—is just what he's dead quiet about. By a little strategic quizzing here and there, we've finally gotten a pretty good picture of the mystery guy and, say, we kind of like him.

Every time you turn around, you see a picture of some movie cnap in an Army or Navy uniform. The lad you don't see is Glenn Ford, and what with his looking so terrifically draftable and all, you don't get it. Ask him about it, and he gives you the dead-pan. Well, he too has a snappy uniform, gals. He enlisted in the Coast Guard months and months ago. Why no pictures? Just listen.

Recently the photographer from an important Los Angeles newspaper was down at the harbor, snapping war preparedness pictures, and he happened upon Glenn in his elegant ensign's uniform. "Hey, skipper, how about posing for a couple of pictures?" he asked.

WHAT THEY EXPECT FROM A Date

Hollywood suitors will die when they read what tattle-tales Darnell, Withers, Alexis Smith and Janet Blair have to say about 'em!

Their names are Janet and Linda, Jane and Alexis. Their ages run from sixteen to twenty-one. All four said their dress-up dates are few and far between since we went to war. All four said they hardly ever keep the guy waiting. (When we questioned the guys a couple of months ago, all four said the girl is yet to be born who doesn't enjoy making a man wait!) Three hate crowded dance floors. None of them drinks. We didn't pick them that way, it just happened. Try picking four kids at random in your own town, see if you get as high a non-batting average, and don't throw bricks at Hollywood.

For the rest, their routines vary. Boil 'em down though, and you'll find that a glamour gal's evening out has a reminiscent flavor. If you can't think what it reminds you of, I'll tell you. Your own date the other night with Jim.

When Linda Darnell goes out dancing these days, it's often with Alan Gordon, the young publicist, and it's strictly for laughs. Whatever you may hear to the contrary, they're not altar-minded. He 'phones for the date three or four days ahead, and mostly they go to small places where people don't dress. But we'll take one of their rare Saturday formals at the Mocambo, just to see what it's like.

Linda allows an hour and a half for primping, lays out her clothes and picks the dress she wore longest ago. Two of her formals are black, four white, one flame-red, and there's one slim darling of red lace cascading over black. Red and white are her favorite colors.

After scrubbing her face and showering, she uses cologne. A powder base if they're going to one of those caverns where candlelight tends to wash you out. Then a film of dark make-up. For evening, her rouge is moist and darker than by day, her mascara a little heavier, her lipstick deeper. She wears her hair in a high pompadour with a bun at the back and sometimes slips a white Juliet cap of rhinestones over the bun. Moment Supreme is her pet perfume, and she carries a purse-size flaçon with her to freshen up. Alan brings her a red camellia—which she'd rather have than an orchid any old day—she fastens it into her hair, picks up her white fox wrap and they're off for some gala Hollywood celebrating.

Her own simple description of such an evening is, "I sit and stuff, and I dance my fool head off." As between food and the light fantastic, Linda couldn't choose. She dines lightly on seafood cocktail, green salad with a tangy dressing, the Mocambo's wonderful top sirloin with mushrooms and two desserts. Later on she'll have a parfait. She dances it all off, however. Alan's an artist at the rumba. And the waltz. The floor's too crowded for waltzing though, and Linda vows that if she ever marries and her husband's a producer, she'll nag him into a terrific ballroom scene for every picture and go floating alone over thousands of feet of film.

She dances only with Alan. After all, he paid the cover charge. "Good night, Little Bit," says Alan at the door and kisses her sweetly like a brother. She has her own method of coping with wolves who take kissing for granted. "Good night, thanks loads, had a perfectly lovely time," says Linda, and bang goes the door. (Continued on page 43)

When Alan Gordon and Linda Darnell go dancing, they come home promptly on the dot of 1 A.M. (She's usually exhausted by then.) Alan's running stiff competition to ace-cameraman Pev Marley!

Besides merry-go-rounding, Alexis Smith and Craig Stevens ice-skate, bowl, play badminton, spectate football . . . and romance!

Her dates with Eddie Albert are different. Each has proven a revelation to the other. Eddie marvels that a girl can be eighteen and have so much sense. Linda wonders how an actor can be so unactorish. Going out with Eddie, she wears slacks or a sweater and skirt, and her hair casual. "Hey, what are you trying to be, little Miss Glamour Girl?" he wanted to know once, when she had it fixed fancy. So she went back and combed it out.

They never go where photographers are. She doesn't even know if he dances. Come to think of it, of course he does, he danced on the stage, but he's never danced with her. He doesn't bring flowers, except that he may buy a gardenia if they go to Chinatown, but that's strictly for the sake of the kids who sell them. She was enchanted the first time he took her to Bublichki. He knows Papa and Mama Bublichki and he talks a little Russian, and very softly in the candlelight he sang those wonderful Russian songs to the gypsy music.

The best part of being with Eddie is the sense of her mind growing and stretching. Once he asked her to his house for dinner. The other guests included a geologist, an explorer, a mathematician. They talked about Chinese lyric poetry and the lost continent of Mu. She's never known such an exciting evening.

But mostly they go to El Cholo, a small Mexican restaurant at Pico and Western. Eddie knows all the Mexicans in town. They both speak Spanish, they both love Mexican food and they tackle everything in sight—tostados, tacos, fried beans, enchiladas, tamales. Eddie got his first jolt on discovering that Linda felt the same kind of interest in trilobites that most girls feel in movie stars. Geology's been a passion with her from childhood. She also has a thirst to learn. He tells her about the stars and how to catch octopods. When he heard that she planned to enroll at UCLA in the fall, he said, "Don't. With due respect to college, you'll get yourself into a clambake. Like it or not, they'll elect you the campus cutie. Read all the books at my house and listen to all the music, and you'll learn more in a year than in five at college."

They're both dreamers, so they sit and dream together. He does most of the talking, since he's been around more. She contributes her bit. About her mountain, for instance—the faraway hill in her mind which she climbs when things get mixed up. Up there she finds a truer perspective on people and problems, gets a feeling of peace. Sounds silly, she thinks, but it works. Eddie thinks it sounds like wisdom beyond her years.

If it's not too late, he goes home with her, they drink pot after pot of Mexican chocolate and listen to the gypsy and Mexican records he sends her. The chocolate comes in patties that have to be ground and pounded. "Woman," says Eddie, "your place is in the kitchen." So she pounds while he takes the easy job of stirring, the jerk.

Once he told her about John Northpole and his other Portuguese fishermen friends down the coast, of the strapping women and their lusty songs and how they drink wine out of goatskins. "I'd love to meet them," said Linda, and he kind of shut up. When she asked about them, he'd answer briefly and change the subject. At length she caught on. He'd have to know her a lot better before he took her down there. Palm off some glamour puss on his friends? Not Eddie! Now she's trying so hard to be good and smart, so he won't be ashamed to introduce her to John Northpole.

Romance? "Shucks, he's never so much as held my hand," says Linda.

Jane Withers has been allowed to go out with boys since her sixteenth birthday, but the Withers chauffeur drives them. Those she dates most are Freddie Bartholomew, A. C. Lyles, a young Southerner on Paramount's publicity staff, and Buddy Pepper, though he's been out of town lately. She and Freddie, AC and Jeanne Howlett, her best friend, often double-date. To split the use of tires, AC calls for Jeanne who lives nearby and drives her to Freddie's, who takes it up from there. AC stands for Andrew Craddock but even his mother calls him AC. He calls Jane Chuck.

It takes something superspecial for Jane to get out on week nights. Friday and Saturday she's free to make dates. Often it's a jive session at somebody's house—Tim Taylor's or the Lloyd girls'. Whoever takes her, she dances with all the boys. If you dance with just one, you don't get the news. She's strictly at the pal stage, thinks handholding's silly, and one nervy boy who tried to kiss her hasn't been out to the house since. (Continued on page 83)

Takes more than icy blasts to send chills tingling down leatherneck Johnny Payne's spine! And Sonja Henie's the gal to do it!

STORY The Marines had landed.

Private Slip Riggs jammed on the brakes, cursed slightly and brought the jeep to a stop two inches from the fender of the coupe that had turned into the line of march. The harsh Icelandic wind whistled down the streets of Reykjavik; snow dotted the roofs of the houses. Private Riggs glared at the coupe.

Then the girl stepped out of the car and the Private said "Oh, oh," to himself, straightened his tie and prepared to step out to meet the population of Iceland. The girl was blonde—definitely. Blue eyes? A little hard to tell because of the light. Figure? Yes. "Oh, oh," said Private Riggs to himself again; but just then the Corporal's hand tapped him on the shoulder and the Corporal's voice said: "I'll take care of this, Slip."

After years of soldiering with Corporal Jimmy Murfin,

ADELE (sweetly to Katina): "Oh, don't mind us. Jimmy and I are still practically engaged . . . (to Jimmy) aren't we, darling?"

PAPA (in alarm): "What's the matter? Is he angry?"
KATINA (not very convincingly): "Oh, no. He's tickled to death."

JIMMY: "You know, honey, at that, there's samething about getting married that's sort af sentimental."
KATINA (hopefully): "Yes, there is . . . if you make up your mind to do it."

KATINA: "Don't come near me."
JIMMY (repressing a smile): "Now isn't that nice? After all if you don't want your family to catch on, I'll have to pretend ta be a husband, wan't I?"

Slip had learned never to argue with him about steaks or girls. Jimmy got the best steaks, and Jimmy got the best girls. There was something about the way Jimmy crooked his finger at a waiter; with a girl he didn't even have to bother to do that. Quite definitely, there was something about Corporal Murfin, the whole (Continued on page 80)

PRODUCTION Ice-skating is really very simple, John Payne kept telling himself. You just put on a pair of skates, stand up, then move forward first on one foot, then on the other. Nothing to it. The secret of the whole thing, he decided, was rhythm. After work one day, he waited 'til everyone had left the rink and proceeded to put his theories into practice. Result: Three falls in three minutes, aching muscles and doubled respect for Sonja Henie's talent.

Jack Oakie, orchestra leader Sammy Kaye and Director Bruce Humberstone also suffered from sudden contact with the frozen H_2O. Oakie, cutting up a few touches between scenes, ventured out on the ice and fell flat on his happy, smiling face in literally no time. Enthused about making his first motion picture, Kaye wanted to try everything, including skating with the chorus. Wound up with bruises and skid burns.

The "Dangerous! Positively No Skating" sign didn't go up, however, until Director Humberstone made the mistake of running across the ice one day—his heels clicked two feet above the ground at the exact moment his noggin knocked the floor of the rink. From that day on, no one was allowed to set foot on the ice unless accompanied by a silver loving cup attesting to his ability on steel runners!

Total proceeds of Victory Night at Ice Capades premiere went to charity. Ann Sothern with Romero at Pan Pacific Auditorium.

Among the 28-ice-bound numbers were strip tease, jitter-bugging and comic cycling. Linda Darnell and Dick Derr watched Red McCarthy whiz by 50 m.p.h!

Milt Berle took the missus to Mocambo for "escape" from her war work. She's a sergeant in ambulance corps, and he's scared stiff she'll be called to service!

Merle Oberon and Fredric March created a stir at Mocambo when they waltzed in with a party. Merle (now Lady Korda since King of England knighted hubby Alex) constantly requested "Marle."

HOLLYWOOD DIARY

Mon., June 15th: Lunched with Jerry Asher at Warners'. Alex Smith stopped by en route to her Cynthia Miller interview. Poor Smith! Celebrating her 21st birthday and trying to look happy, in spite of an infected wisdom tooth. Spent her lunch hour having it lanced and couldn't eat any of the birthday cake presented to her by the cast of "Gentlemen Jim."

Set-visited with Brenda Marshall who's working with George Brent in "You Can't Escape Forever." Brenda insists that despite newspaper reports, she and Annie Sheridan will not live together when Brent leaves for his post in the air corps. Brenda's spending her evenings sitting for her portrait by Paul Clemens, who's just finished a miniature of Greer Garson.

Ran into Dennis Morgan, in costume for his role in "The Desert Song." Dennis was off to phone his wife, currently hospitalized awaiting the newest Morgan heir. The perfect husband, Dennis goes down to the hospital every evening to have dinner with his spouse.

The "No Visitors" sign was up on the Errol Flynn "Gentleman Jim" set, but Mr. F. let down the barriers, and we were invited in. First person we spotted was Ronald Reagan (pardon, diary—Lieut. Ronald Reagan) whom we had mentally placed in San Francisco. "How come?" we asked. "Transferred to the Public Relations department of the Army Air Corps," he answered. "Stationed at Burbank. I'm as surprised as you are." No, he doesn't think he'll be making movie shorts.

Talked to Alexis again. Her romance with Craig Stevens is taking a beating because of the tire situation. She and her father bought a house in Glendale close to Pop Smith's office. And Craig lives 18 miles away in Beverly Hills! They're busy trying to arrange an in-between meeting place.

Thurs., June 18th: Arrived at RKO's "Sweet and Hot" set just in time to watch Lupe Velez being introduced to Vic Mature. Everyone stood around waiting for something exciting to happen. Nothing did. Mature was polite. Lupe ditto. What no one seemed to know (and what Lupe and Vic are probably trying to forget) is that the two had quite a romance several years ago!

In the commissary at noon, Vic and Michele Morgan spent their lunch hour gazing into each other's eyes. However, Vic's real heart throb is Rita Hayworth, who makes her home about two blocks from his.

Met Mapy Cortes, RKO's little Mexican import. Mapy tells me Mature chases her around the set, corners her in back of a hunk of scenery, does nothing, then screams feminine-like, imitating her as he thinks she'd sound if she were being attacked. . She's used to those serious Latin lovers and doesn't appreciate Vic's clowning. Mapy likes 'Ollywood, says it's much more fun making pictures here than in Mexico, where you sometimes have to work 36 hours at a time.

Wed., June 24th: Whipped out to Metro for Ida Zeitlin's interview with Bob Taylor. Lunched with Bob in his dressing room. His hair was plastered flat on his head for a water scene in "Cargo of Innocents." Couldn't comb it, either, because it had to match the next scene. Ida and I ordered up lavishly, but Bob ate only a light salad. He always lunches like a sparrow 'cause he likes to be good and hungry for dinner.

Later watched Red Skelton working in "Whistling in Dixie" with Ann Rutherford and Diana Lewis. Diana was busily knitting a sweater twice as big as herself for her stepson, Bill Powell's boy, who just graduated from Hollywood High and is headed for Princeton.

Red still refuses to discuss the unpublicized shows he puts on for the boys in the service. But I've talked to some of the lads Red's entertained, and I know what a grand job he's doing. If he learns of some out-of-the-way anti-aircraft battery station where only three boys are on duty, he'll spend an entire evening with them going through the same routine he uses before an audience of 300.

Sat., June 27th: Over to Westmore's and met a close friend of Bette Davis. Understand Bette is wretched about those divorce rumors. It amazes her that anyone, in these times, would bother to create and spread such malicious gossip. There's nothing wrong with the Farnsworth marriage, and it makes Bette ill whenever anyone mentions the possibility of a separation.

Dinner danced at the Palladium. Saw Jackie Cooper and Bonita Granville, living contradiction of all that talk about their separation.

Stopped by Schwab's for midnight hot chocolate. Bill Lundigan was sitting around sipping a soda when in walked ex-girl friend Margaret Lindsay. Those of us who expected a dramatic outburst were disappointed. Bill and Maggie hadn't seen each other for a long, long time, but they just chatted merrily and then went their separate ways.

Rumors persist that Mickey and Ava Rooney will be pappa-ing and mamma-ing it. They're both Freddie Martin devotees, went to cheer him at the Grove. Ava's back from a visit to her sick mom in N. C.

Franchot Tone never fails to keep spouse Jean Wallace amused. They're house hunting for a nest with nursery. 'Tis reported they'll be three in Nov.

Bouncing to Harry James' superior boogie beat at Palladium—piano man Freddie Bartholomew and Jane Withers just before she left on bond selling tour. Freddie, 18, will register in the draft.

Wed. July 1st: To Republic for a look-see at "Flying Tigers." Johnny Carroll, in uniform for the picture, expects to be called for actual service within the month. Spends most of his free time working out with his huge gun collection, getting his own basic training. (Saw John later in a drug store. A cab driver stared at him for about five minutes, then turned to me and said, "Aw, I don't think that Victor Mature guy is so good-looking!")

John Wayne sauntered over and began to deny those divorce rumors before I even broached them. Since his wife went east for her sister's marriage, the gossips are having a field day. John's a new ranch owner, and he's exploding with enthusiasm about his hogs. Has the best grunters on the market and gets top prices for 'em! After describing the place down to its last thumb-tack and blade of grass, he confessed he's been working so steadily since he bought it, he's only spent one day there himself!

Gabbed a bit with an authentic Flying Tiger—Ken Sanger, who's acting as technical adviser on the picture. Sanger's on sick leave from the service having picked up a troublesome case of fever that blanks him out every now and then. His partner, Larry Moore, is in the throes of a torrid romance with Comedienne Judy Canova, who apparently has a weakness for uniforms and staunch, brave hearts.

Marjorie Woodworth felt to home at the hayseed Lum and Abner premiere with James Craig and Jane Russell. Has owned her own nag since she was a kid!

Rehearsing for Victory Caravan at Par.—Colbert and Boyer. She's renting a N. Y. apt., near hubby Pressman on Naval duty.

Fri. July 3rd: Stopped in at the Warner Bros. portrait gallery to watch Jack Benny, costumed as George Washington, and Ann Sheridan, outfitted as Martha Washington, posing for stills for "G. W. Slept Here." Benny sniffled pathetically all afternoon. Although he's spent months working opposite the torrid Annie, he's had head cold after head cold throughout the production. Says the day the picture is completed, he'll hie himself to Lake Arrowhead for a complete rest. "And when I leave the hotel, they'll probably hang a sign on the door reading 'Jack Benny Slept Here'!"

Mon. July 6th: Lunched in the Green Room with Kaaren Pieck and Joan Leslie, who looked very beautiful, dressed in a blue gabardine suit, and with hair elaborately done for "The Hard Way." As Joan stabbed into her roast beef, her jacket sleeve pulled up and I gulped at the sight of the high water mark just above her wrist. No, dear diary, Joan isn't afraid of soap and water. She had body make-up on and hadn't taken the time to wash it off anything except her hands.

That Southern hospitality stuff is no bunk when you're visiting Miss Janie Withers of Geo'gia! Had a wonderful time in Janie's playroom while Fredda Dudley popped question after question at little Miss W., who, incidentally, is one of the most interview-able people in the world. Jane's dark hair was encased in a snood, as it usually is these days. When she slipped on the set of "The Mad Martindales" several months ago, and banged her head, gobs of hair were cut away so the doctor could get at the injury. The snood helps conceal what Janie calls her "bald spot."

Sentimental Gentleman

He's a softie with the wimmin, but nothing melts him faster than a barrelhouse boogie or a triple-tongue trill!

Tommy Dorsey's the chap who ran a slide trombone into a million dollars.

He is an unpredictable, strictly individual guy who fights with his brother, arranges a benefit for a former colleague, orders his band out of a bus to walk, buys suits five at a time, and refuses to advertise in trade papers. He has his own music publishing company, wishes he could meet Joe Palooka, cheers the Yankees like a ten-year-old and likes his music straight, without funny costumes, fancy backdrops and quizzes sandwiched in.

He lays off eight weeks a year because, come March 15, seventy per cent of his income goes to Uncle Sam.

"The eight-week layoff isn't hard to take," says T.D. "We spread 'em through the year, and after a long run at the Paramount or a heavy schedule cutting records, it's good for the boys to take it easy for a week. Gives 'em a vacation. Keeps 'em fresh and in there sending."

Tommy's whirlwind romance, Lana Turner, blew in the night he opened at Palladium (below). Recently gave her a baguette diamond cross.

By Malcolm H. Oettinger

Dorsey isn't a Simon Legree with his band. As long as the teamwork is good while they're performing, he doesn't care what they do on their own, what time they get up or how many eye-openers are necessary. Ziggy Elman, his right hand man who leads the band when T.D. is table-hopping, can play pinochle until noon or spend the wee sma' hours using his candid camera in Fifty-Second Street hot spots. Buddy Rich, the kid drummer, can drive his special body Lincoln as fast through Park Avenue traffic as he likes; Tommy will even bail him out if the law catches up with him. Everything is on the upbeat as long as the music is sweet when the couvert is on.

Tommy is a high-liver himself. Admits it. Give him a thick steak, a bottle of Burgundy and a pretty girl, and he won't bother you. But the steak must be rare, or back it goes. And the wine must be room temperature or Dorsey will get temperamental. And the head must not wear a funny hat or too much lipstick, or she won't be asked again.

In Bernardsville, N. J., Tommy has a country estate that would make a movie mogul gasp. There is not one swimming pool, there are two. There are horses, show dogs, a private rehearsal hall from which he broadcasts upon occasion, and enough rooms to sleep his entourage of thirty any night in the week. There is a miniature movie theater and bar attached. There are buttons to be pushed for service, and there is service. T.D. lives high, wide and handsome.

Married young, divorced, Tommy has a boy seventeen and a girl a couple of years younger, who think Pop plays a mean trombone.

T.D. is known as a fast man with a buck. He doesn't gamble unless he's playing a dance at Saratoga or Belmont, and the horses run right past the bandstand. Or if the layout he's booked for has a game of chance room adjoining, he might risk a century on the red between dance sets. Or if those Yankees are in the lead in the seventh, and the opposition starts a batting streak, he'll still take the Yanks to win. But he doesn't gamble the way some of the boys in the money toss it away. However, he is still a speedy man with a bankroll.

His general factotum, Leonard Vannerson, had a couple of friends in the service, in California. One had been a cutter at Warners' and the other designed sets. On leave, they were anxious (Continued on page 68)

When Jimmy and Tommy were kids their pop made them practise until they were blue in the face. T. started on the sax, soon switched to trombone!

When Goodman opened at Meadowbrook, Tommy was on hand to heckle the King. Since making the strictly hep "Ship Ahoy" for M-G-M, he's signed for a repeat performance.

T. D.'s fans range from Mickey Rooney to Leopold Stokowski, who gave Tommy the thrill of his life when he requested 10 numbers at the Palladium!

Wear a new coif for fall! Here are the rules that will help you choose the style that will do most for you.

Before you buy your new fall bonnet, give some thought to the hair that will wear it. You don't want to go through life always looking like last year's snapshot. Help yourself to a new hair-do for fall, 1942!

Dancer Irene Castle revolutionized coiffure fashions during the last world conflict by having her hair bobbed. Her daring act started tongues wagging—and most heads of hair have been waving her fame ever since. Hairdressers are wondering now if history always repeats, and if some startling change in feminine hat racks is lurking on the horizon.

The latest news in hair styles is the short curly coif called by a dozen names—feather cut, three-incher, gamin, baby curl, windblown, and so on down the list. In the original, authentic version, every strand of hair is snipped off at the same distance from the scalp—between three and five inches—and usually cut with a razor. The feathery edges are turned into ringlets with a tight, close permanent, and the result, on the right face, is a bewitching, angelic picture! On the wrong face it looks skimpy and badly groomed—like a stray kitten caught in the rain. So look at your mirror carefully before you decide it's the type for you. Long bobs are flattering to some, short hair to others. Every girl for herself we say—and we're here to help her.

When you pick out your new fall hair-do, match it to your figure, your face and your hats (or the ones you are going to buy). Keep in mind, too, that your hair is your most adaptable feature, and you can move it around to suit a new dress, idea or mood of the moment. Learn to wear it more ways than one. Your friends get tired of seeing the same old haircomb every time you come around! Learn the basic principles of the proper coiffure for you, and then experiment within these limits for new ways and means to get becoming effects.

Choose your hair style in front of a full-view mirror (and the same for your hats of course). If you are tall and slender, don't make yourself into a bean pole with a pompadour set on top of your head. If you are small in stature, don't cut your height by hair flat on top and fluffed out at the sides. Add several inches to your five-feet-two or under, by piling your hair up high and walking around holding your head like a swan.

The amount of hair you show should be in proportion to the size of your face. If yours is large, give it a curly-locks fringe to bring it into balance; hair pulled straight back from ears and eyes makes it look out of proportion. If your face is small, don't wear complicated or fly-away styles or you will look top-heavy. Instead, be delicately young and appealing with hair close to your head. Show your ears if you have pretty ones, to add a couple of inches.

The shape of your face is the next thing to look at. The lucky lady with an oval contour should show it off with hair drawn straight back. But if your particular countenance is too round or too square, break up the outline with swirls or plump curls above the forehead and over the ears. Part your hair to the side . . . never in the middle. Wear it low at the earlobes, and build it up over the forehead. On the other extreme, if your face is long and narrow, don't add to its height with curls perched on top, and don't wear hair falling down limp and straight like a cocker spaniel's ears. Add width to your face with soft curls on the sides, and fullness at the ears. If you can put bangs on your forehead without looking coy or kittenish—swell. They help shorten and broaden the outline.

Now that the comb has done its duty and put your locks where they look best—what about the scissors? Wally Westmore, Paramount make-up director, says, "My plea, and that of every man I know, is for women to dress their hair to suit their age." Hair length has a lot to do with that. As a general rule—the younger set can get away with long, flowing manes, but the older woman slices a few years off her age when she cuts her hair shorter. The shoulder-length is fine on an ingenue, but incongruous on a sophisticated matron. What she needs is hair up and off the neck and slanted back at the sides, to give her face a younger look.

If you decide the new short hair-cut is best for your face and your age, you will want to curl your tresses with a very tight perm. The kind that performs its miracle while wrapped up in a turban and without the discomforts of any heat or heavy machinery, really gets close to the scalp and turns out a mass of ringlets. It's also a good bet for obstinate hair that doesn't like to curl. Its gentle process is kinder to the wig that's been bleached or dried-out or otherwise mistreated.

When you think of your crowning halo, there are two viewpoints we'll bet you overlook. The first is that all-important one—a man's! Most men are taller than you, but how much consideration do you give to the picture of the top of your head? Not enough, we'll warrant! Hair parts are pretty when they are neat and sharply defined—but a menace if they're crooked and straggly.

Be sure that yours travels in a straight line, and that it is scrupulously clean and white (cotton wound on an orange) stick and moistened with hair tonic will attend to that). To complete the pleasant scene for your partner on the dance floor, see that the hair on your crown lies smooth and untangled, without any bumps.

The other neglected point of view is the one that the people behind you look at. You have a hand-mirror, don't you? Then use it, my pet. Don't be the girl who never sees the back of her head except when the beauty operator proudly shows it off when she's finished combing a wave. The rear view of some heads looks like a plate of sausages—of others like a rag doll's hank of yarn. Comb and brush the back of yours as generously as the front, and then inspect your handiwork with a critical eye.

Once you get your hair in order, see that it stays that way. Hair lacquer is one of the secrets of many of the Hollywood stars' fresh-from-the-hairdresser look. And it comes in ten-cent bottles! Apply with fingertips or an atomizer, and it will give unruly hair body and sheen. Brilliantine will also help control drooping tresses and prolong their waves and curls. At this time of year, when hair is likely to be wilted by summer sun, it is especially helpful to hold rebellious ends in place.

If you use hair or bobbie pins to keep your coif coiffed, hide them under the ringlets so the public will think it's all done by magic. A great help for invisible hair-holding is a new comb-like retainer. It comes in innumerable shades and sizes, with split teeth which slip softly into place and hold curls, buns or pompadours in a firm but loving grip. This comb-like (Continued on page 85) chlorinated water out of it daily, and supplement the natural oils thus lost with oily tonics and pomade massaged in by night. Wear a turban or a hat if you're going to be in the sun for a number of hours. And if your hair's long and shaggy, for the love of Mike and the rest of the boys, put it up on bobbies or curlers every night.

CO-ED

Freckles: A smattering is cute. Don't touch 'em. If they're colossal and annoying, bleach them with lemon juice, then keep them from coming back by using a powder base and plenty of powder.

Split nails: Prevent them by drying your hands when you come in from swimming and rubbing a rich cream into the nail base every night. And don't forget to drink milk daily.

Girl Over-bored: Vacation is utter bliss for a while, but along about now it palls. You're surfeited with sun and blue skies and perpetual Saturday. Oh for something to do. Ideas!

1. Begin to keep a war scrap book. Devote the opening pages to maps so that you're clear on exactly where everything's happening. Then paste in an account of each day's developments. Think what a trophy the book'll be for your children to flaunt in history class some day!

2. Learn Spanish. If you had either French or Latin in school, it'll be a cinch. In fact, you'll be chattering like a muchacha after twenty-five one hour lessons, we've been told. Inasmuch as Spanish is becoming more and more the language both commercially and socially, learn it now while you have the time.

3. If you just haven't the strength for anything as brainy as the foregoing suggestions, amuse yourself by keeping a "him book." It's never too early to begin looking for Mr. Right, and your "him book" will help you spot him. Get a big notebook and allot two or three pages to each boy you go out with. Give his name, age, color of hair and eyes, height and weight, hobbies, outstanding characteristics—and, if possible, paste in a picture of him. Give the date, where you went and what kind of a time you had. Years hence, you'll treasure this volume, and your husband will scream over your analysis of him.

Out of Gas: Your dream guy's no sooner gotten his driving license when doesn't the government gang up on you and ration gasoline, trapping poor you in your back yard for the duration.

Any back yard worthy of the name has room for a badminton net and a miniature golf course. You can get a complete set of the former at any good-sized drug store for about $3. To make the latter, sink nine flower pots into the ground at five-yard intervals. Invest in a few inexpensive putters and golf balls.

And why not a couple of co-ed softball teams? You can play on the school diamond and it's indescribable fun.

Instead of whipping off places to dance of an evening, invent ways to have fun at home. Get one of the boys to dig a hole in one corner of your yard, fill it with charcoal, put a grill over it and voilà—a barbecue pit.

Have an old-fashioned ice cream party. You make the mixture beforehand and let the crowd take turns freezing it.

Have a second childhood for yourself this month with roller-skating parties, hay rides, charades—and bet you'll forget there ever was such a gadget as a car!

TO A FACE POWDER THAT FAILS TO GIVE YOUR SKIN COLOR-HARMONY
MEN THRILL to the touch of warm smooth skin. But how does your skin look? If your face powder is imperfectly blended—if noticeable streaks and blotches mar the color-harmony of your face—a precious moment may be lost to you forever.
TRY THIS TEST. Press out a bit of your present face powder against a mirror with your fingertips. See those little streaks of raw color? Sure as fate, he'll notice them . . . just when you want him to notice only you. Don't trust such a face powder.

to come East to have a celebration. But the short furlough meant train travel and was out. And flying raised the ante too high. So T.D. sent the boys round trip tickets on the T.W.A. He didn't know them. But they were friends of Van. That made it a deal for Tommy.

Last time Tommy went to the stadium to root for Dimag' and the gang, an orphanage had been invited. Treat of the year. So T.D. sent over a thousand hot dogs and a hundred cases of pop. Strictly for a laugh.

His worst extravagance is original in its conception. Tommy likes to buy farms. There are five scattered throughout the Jersey countryside, in addition to the Shangri-la at Bernardsville. One he hasn't even visited since he bought it.

Estimates run close to $200,000 a year for Tommy's end of the band. Less than a third of this is his, after the slice to taxes and alimony. He is loaded with insurance to take care of his old age, annuities and the like. But money is to spend, says Tommy. His manager keeps an eye on income and outgo, often scotching a happy idea of being too extravagant. But occasionally Tommy tells him to leap into the nearest lake. Then doesn't he spend! Tommy has a mind of his own.

There's a dance casino at Lakewood, near Tommy's home town of Shenandoah, Pa., but Vannerson only lets Tommy and the band play there once every five years because it costs the maestro more in handouts than the date nets him.

slip horn heaven . . .

Tommy has definite ideas about bands. Thinks the leader should be a musician; has no use for the vaudeville artist type who turns on the personality and shakes a baton at his men without being able to handle an instrument himself. If he had a dream band playing celestial swing he would start with Artie Shaw and his own Ziggy Elman, Benny Goodman, Gene Krupa, Claude Thornhill and brother Jimmy Dorsey. Ziggy he calls the hottest horn in the world. Benny he agrees is in a class by himself. Krupa shades his own Buddy Rich by a beat. Buddy he would carry in his all-star aggregation for extra wham. "Might as well finish the outfit," he remarked when we were mulling it over. Picking up paper and pencil he scratched for a few minutes, coming up with these additions to the names already mentioned:

Jack Jenney, Miff Mole and Jack Teagarden on the trombones.

Harry James trumpeting next to Ziggy.

Freddie Greene and Carmen Maestren on the guitars.

Artie Bernstein and Artie Shapiro on the basses.

Jess Stacey, Joe Bushkin and Teddy Wilson at the pianos.

Tommy is a hard man to work for when recordings are being made. That's where a band's reputation is made and held. When rehearsing for a recording, Tommy drops the carefree manner that characterizes his work on the bandstand. He turns into a stewing, steaming, fretting taskmaster with a talent for invective. Let someone hit a false note and the air gets blue.

One morning when the boys were returning from a suburban date in the Dorsey bus, an argument broke out, tempers grew short, and it wound up with T.D. stopping the vehicle and ordering the boys out. Five miles along the road he cursed himself for a prima donna, turned the bus around and started looking for his musicians.

After rehearsal mistakes are quickly forgotten. The only time Tommy bears a grudge is when he has been double-crossed. Then he remembers until the matter is squared.

He is known to be eminently fair with his men. If a member of the unit gets an offer to join another outfit, T.D. first has Vannerson try to meet the offer, within reason. This failing, he lets the musician go with his blessing, and to show that he means it, he takes him back later if things haven't panned out.

He isn't exactly a good mixer, but he carries off the role fairly successfully. At the Astor Roof Tommy makes it a practice of starting a number with the boys, then leaving the bandstand to visit. There will be an arranger for Victor records. Over there is a Broadway star. Back in the corner is a radio tycoon. Important stuff. Tommy makes each stop, orders scotch and soda, drinks a sip, moves on. It makes them feel that he meant to stay longer. It's an angle.

For his Astor engagement he added ten strings—violins—causing a trade paper to crack that he was employing every out-of-work musician on Broadway. "Let 'em have fun," said Tommy. "I like a lot of strings. For sweet."

Then there was the time T.D. and the boys were playing the Strand, and a theatrical trade paper criticized them editorially for horsing too much and not being serious enough while they were on.

"I can't run a Sunday school," says T.D. "The boys fool once in a while, sure. Buddy might tap Ziggy on the head with a drumstick for a laugh. Or Sinatra might get ribbed before he thrushes. But it's good for the boys to keep that light touch."

Ever since they were kids, the brothers Dorsey have scrapped with one another. When they had their own band, it was a case of who would hold the baton. Now that they have top bands of their own, it's a case of rivalry. Every once in a while this flares into fisticuffs. Not long ago Jimmy and his manager visited the Roof to felicitate T.D. on his opening. Before the sun had come up, the boys were throwing knuckles at each other. It has been a friendly feud with truces and brawls alternating.

When T.D. went to Hollywood to make "Ship Ahoy" for M-G-M, one of the cinema capital's most enthusiastic rug-cutters met him at the plane. Tommy didn't know her. He knew who she was, of course; had seen her picture here and there. It may be that the studio publicity department had sent her to the airport to cook up a front-page romance. It may be that the girl just had a feeling for bandsmen. However it happened, and your guess is as good as anybody's, T.D. was welcomed at the airport by Lana Turner.

It started out strictly as a laugh, gradually turned into a modest flicker and wound up in a five-alarm blaze.

Lana took him to her home and played some of her 500 records until dawn. They talked swing and jazz, sweet and hot. They were two rhythm lovers chinning about their favorite subject. Then at the studio Tommy would find his lunch hour coincided with Lana's. His evenings were free. What better to do than take the little Turner number out to Santa Monica for dinner? That's the way it went. T.D. says Lana is tops. Before he came East they gave each other watches. Most fun he had with her was when she came to New York recently, incognito (although a lot of people knew those legs weren't just an anonymous pair of legs) and stopped at his aunt's apartment in Brooklyn. They went sneaking all over town without being chased, Tommy in dark glasses, and Lana under-made-up to look like a regular Flatbush home girl.

Probably the most romantic part of their month in Hollywood was the moonlit nights that Lana would take Tommy in her sports coupe to the beach, and T.D. would play "Sleepy Lagoon" on his trombone against the sigh of the surf swishing against the shore. "Sleepy Lagoon" is her song. She introduced it to him, played an English recording of it the first night they met and sold him on what a great hit it could be in this country. Whenever you hear Tommy blowing sweet on "Lagoon" you can rest assured he is thinking of Lana. Other girls in his life are associated with other tunes. Not many guys can serenade a girl with five million people listening in. But T.D. can, has and still does.

While he was in Hollywood Tommy saw a lot of Bob Taylor and Barbara Stanwyck, Hank Fonda, Spencer Tracy and Bing Crosby. He thinks Bing is as good as the fans think him. And he would no more miss a Tracy picture than a Yankee home game.

Follow T.D. down Broadway. He's coming out of the Paramount. A flock of kids surround him for an autograph. Tommy handles a few pencils, kidding as he writes his name with a flourish, then starts for the Astor. The throng hangs about him, giving way to let him greet Howard Dietz of Metro. Conversation over, they eddy about him again, like a convoy. Farther on, Bob Weitman, manager of the Paramount Theater, stops to say "Hello," and the mob eases away. The tide sweeps in on Tommy as he starts to move on.

He is not popular with a lot of people, however, probably because he breaks too many rules and gets away with it. He is cocky, assured, satisfied with life and ready to have another portion. Time never means a thing to him. He will sit around the Roof until five or six in the morning kicking the ball around conversationally. He hasn't any use for swing sessions, pick-up style. He thinks the gutbucket style is outmoded, and he feels that too many third-raters get by on the jive and jitter stuff. First a man must be a musician for T.D., then if he wants to swing or blow sweet or get hot, that's his business. But first he should be able to do it straight and no kibitzing around.

He doesn't care what the reviewers write about him; the columnists don't bother him one way or the other. He doesn't care what rival band-leaders say about him, either, although his ears should ring occasionally. He doesn't believe in advertising his band; lets those records do the talking. The only thing he asks of a reporter is an echo of George M. Cohan's timeless request. "Write what you want about," says Tommy D. "Anything goes. But, for heaven's sake, spell the name right!"

Chin up!...

HOW can a girl deal with trig and trivialities when her brother's out there fighting for freedom? Today, especially, when you feel so dull and droopy you've half a mind to cut a class.

Half a mind is right! . . . you can almost hear Bud making a crack like that! "School's your job, Sis", he wrote. "It's part of the American way we're fighting for"!

Well, if he can fight—you can study! But why not organize an all-school treasure hunt for the scrap material Uncle Sam needs for his win. (Hey look—one worn-out tire makes 8 gas masks!)

So you tell Jill your brain-wave . . . that you're getting in the fight come Monday, when you'll feel better. And does she give you a look! "Why be so old fashioned?", she asks. "I thought every girl knew about Kotex sanitary napkins"!

Don't wait until Monday!

Jill explained you needn't wait—you can keep going in comfort every day of the month . . . when you choose Kotex.

Because Kotex is made in soft folds, it's naturally less bulky . . . more comfortable . . . made to stay soft while wearing. A lot different from pads that only "feel" soft at first touch!

Besides, those flat, pressed ends of Kotex keep your secret safe. And the "safety shield" means real "forget-about-it" protection.

No wonder more girls choose Kotex than all other brands of pads put together!

So now your chin's up—for keeps! And you'll be working for Victory . . . every day!

Because of its homey atmosphere, Victor's is a place where movie folks like to go with their families and friends to eat and relax.

FIND a restaurant that has an exceptionally large masculine following, and you can be pretty sure that its atmosphere will be friendly and informal, its food portions large and its cooking definitely on the simple side—with special emphasis on meats!

Should you set out to find such a place out here, in Hollywood, you might be lucky enough to come across Victor's, one of the most popular eating spots in town with folks actually in the movie industry, though not so well known to the fans.

Here, in a smallish room done in restful shades of brown, writers, directors and producers go into a huddle over double porterhouse steaks; family folk like Dick Powell and Joan Blondell drop in with their kids, friendly rivals from different studios join forces in demolishing huge orders of roast beef with Yorkshire pudding; and big name stars wander in, in make-up and sport clothes—happy in the knowledge that their meals will not be disturbed by autograph hunters. For here this pastime is definitely discouraged. In fact it is Victor's boast that the only person ever to be asked to give an autograph, in his restaurant, was Igor Stravinsky. Even in this instance the approach was an indirect one. A local musician dashed off the first few bars of one of this famous Russian composer's works on a menu and sent it over to him. Stravinsky obligingly corrected a mistake, signed the menu and returned it. Score up one for ingenuity.

A list of Victor's patrons would read like a veritable Hollywood Who's Who; while a listing of their food preferences would provide a culinary What's What in the line of substantial foods which men go for in a big way. Any night—right up to midnight—you might find there Ray Milland who usually orders a double New York steak, on which he dabs prepared mustard. John Carroll who prefers a Chateaubriand (that's a filet of beef with oomph!) And other well knowns too numerous to mention—including, of course, the three gentlemen pictured here who were caught by our rambling photographer, Bob Beerman, as they started to dine.

Take a look at their keen, anticipatory expressions, and you will understand why we are so pleased to have secured recipes for some of the very dishes that make such a big hit at Victor's. Now you, too, can dine Victor-iously right in your own home!

John Wayne, after a day on the "Flying Tigers" set, stops off at Victor's for a steak dinner and with Chef Goby's expert assistance, helps himself to a man-sized meal.

Mine host, himself, serves these hungry diners, Victor Killion, arch villain of "Reap the Wild Wind," and Regis Toomey who is in "The Man on America's Conscience."

Lamb Kidneys, Sauté

6 lamb kidneys
salad oil, butter
8 large mushrooms
¼ cup sherry wine
½ teaspoon salt, or more
¼ teaspoon pepper
⅓ cup brown stock or gravy*

Select fresh young kidneys, free of any discoloration. Scald, remove outside skin. Split, remove all trace of white centers, tubes and fat. Slice very thin. Sauté for 5 minutes in hot salad oil. Quarter mushrooms, sauté for 5 minutes in hot butter. Combine kidneys and mushrooms, add sherry and simmer gently for 5 minutes more. Add salt and pepper and the stock or gravy. Bring to a fast boil, remove from heat immediately. Serve on rye bread slices which, with crusts removed, have been fried on both sides, in butter, to a golden brown. Serves 2 or 3.

Canned bouillon, slightly thickened with flour and colored with a little Kitchen Bouquet, may be used, instead.*

Yorkshire Pudding

(Traditional Roast Beef Accompaniment)

3 eggs, beaten
1 cup sifted flour
¼ teaspoon salt
1¼ cups milk
beef suet or beef drippings

Beat eggs thoroughly. Victor's directions call for 20 minutes of beating! Only those who have an electric beater will wish to attempt this—but if you do own one, go to it—with indicator set at low speed. However, this recipe was tested —with excellent results—using a rotary egg beater and but 5 minutes of beating.

Sift together flour and salt, gradually add beaten eggs, then the milk. Beat again, this time for 2 minutes. Get your baking pan red hot, grease with suet or drippings and when they are bubbling hot add the Yorkshire mixture—giving it a final beating for good measure. Bake in moderately hot oven (400°F.) 15 minutes. Reduce heat and bake until done. Cut into squares for serving.

Pears, Speciale

4 Bartlett pears
½ cup granulated sugar
4 whole cloves
2 tablespoons lemon juice
cornstarch, to thicken
2 tablespoons rum or brandy

Pare, core and quarter pears and place in saucepan. Cover with the sugar, add cloves and lemon juice and just enough water to cover. Bring to a boil. Simmer 20 minutes, or until tender. Remove pears from liquid with slotted spoon. Place in individual serving dishes. Thicken remaining syrup with a little cornstarch, moistened with water to a smooth paste. Cook until clear, stirring constantly. Add rum or brandy. Pour over pears, chill.

All Washed Up!

JIVIN' JANE

frocks, size 13, and needs not one stitch of alteration. Having done some preliminary reconnaissance, Mrs. Withers and Jane breezed down to try on dresses and finally compromised on a white mousseline de soie trimmed with black lace.

So excited that her heart was pumping Mexican jumping beans instead of plasma, Jane started to dress at five o'clock on The Day, preparatory to an eight o'clock date. She applied a light pancake makeup, no eye shadow nor false eyelashes (although her eyelids have a naturally bluish cast) and a deep cardinal lipstick. In the midst of dressing, she realized that A C would come up to the playroom—she couldn't remember having dusted it for several days.

So she whipped out in dressing gown and spruced up the reception center—a dido that stopped Mrs. Withers dead in her tracks when she spied Jane behind a dust cloth at such a crucial time.

"What on earth are you doing?" queried the astonished mother. Jane has tried to teach her to say "What's cookin'?" but Mrs. Withers discourages too much slang. Jane, herself, long ago announced that the words, "Oh, nuts," or "Sourpuss" would never join her vocabulary. If you speak Withersiana, and you find something exceedingly sour, you say Half A Lemon. If it is sour beyond all reason or redemption, it is Completely Lemon and a goner.

"Just putting things to rights," announced Jane. "Just being pre-hostessy." She straightened and fixed her mother with an appealing eye. "How about wearing the white fox tonight?" she asked. "Please, let me strut it!"

The sumptuous white fox coat had been Jane's Christmas present—and thereby hangs a story. Before Christmas, Jane hinted with every innuendo she knew that a set of drums would be a gift right on the beam. She mentioned how neat she was on Freddie Bartholomew's percussions, and how Jackie Cooper had said, "You've got the beat, Janie." She tapped out rhythms with a couple of pencils on a table top and said, "Now, with a pair of flyswatters that would be 'Chattanooga Choo-Choo.'"

But when Jane charged in to open her packages in front of the Christmas tree —no drums. Her heart felt as hollow as a bass skin, and her hopes were as shattered as a sat-on snare. She slipped into the substitute white fox coat and wandered in to the mirror. "I look regal in a lonely sort of way," she observed.

"New Year's night would be a good time to initiate it," she told her mother, but Mrs. Withers couldn't see it that way.

"The white ermine jacket will do for tonight," she said. "We'll save the Christmas coat until a later date."

"Well, what good does it do me to have it hanging around the house without being worn?" demanded Jane.

"Jane!" said her mother, and that settled it, of course. The white fox coat eventually made its debut in April when Jane wore it to the Ice Follies, and very appropriate, too.

heavy date . . .

On New Year's night, A.C. arrived right on time, resplendent in dinner clothes, and carrying a florist's box sheltering an orchid. Jane pinned it in her hair and away they went to June Carlson's. From June's they breezed over to pick up Tim Taylor, and the foursome advanced on Sunset Towers to see Buddy Pepper who was too ill to go out, but not too limp to have plenty of company.

The gang put on records and danced. Their jitterbug routines include absolutely no backbreaking gymnastics. Jane first learned her fast footwork from Joe Brown, Jr., who took pity on her when she was at 20th Century-Fox. "You're either too young or too old for everything," he told her sympathetically. "Too young for the real hep-cats like Cooper and Granville and their gang, but too old for the real juves like Weidler and company. Guess I'd better take charge of you." So he taught her the intricate footwork and the time breaks of down-to-the-very-bricks jitterbugging.

A little later she learned a rumba that would make Katie from Haiti blink with approval. A C, she soon found, could jitterbug right in the groove, but he wasn't hep to the rumba. "I'll fix that," Jane promised. So she started the New Year right by giving him instructions in the beginning box steps.

At five minutes of twelve they were having such a good time that it seemed a shame to break up the party. "I'm going to call Mother and ask to stay another hour," Jane announced.

"Nothing doing," said A C "This is my first date with you, and I'm not going to let anything spoil my chances of taking you out again. Here's your coat, Janie; come with Papa and don't pout."

At the door, he tapped the tip of her nose with his finger. "You looked mighty pretty tonight, sugar," he said. "I was right proud of you." Then he rang the bell and, with hat in hand, told Mrs. Withers, "Happy New Year, ma-am. Here is your daughter, all safe and sound."

Two of the many things Jane admires about A C are his perfect manners and his offhand comradeliness. He never gets smoochy. After Jane had "endured" her first movie kiss, she told a studio friend, "That stuff is okay for pictures, but—so help me—I want none of it off the set. I can't bear to be touched. These boys who are always drooping around with moon eyes drive me loopy."

Boys usually describe Jane as a swell egg. "When you shake hands with a person," Buddy Pepper told her one day, "you don't leave any doubt about how powerful your grip can be on a tennis or badminton racquet."

Since their first date, Jane and A C have gone to Mocambo several times, to the Ice Follies and to the Military Ball. From the Mocambo at five minutes of twelve one night, Mrs. Withers received a call. "A C wanted to talk to you," Jane said, "but I told him I'd rather handle it. We're having such a lot of fun that I don't want to leave yet. Please let me stay just another hour."

Mrs. Withers thought it over swiftly. A wise movie mother knows that sometimes the tether has to be slackened or the colt is going to bolt. "All right, dear," she answered. "You may stay until one-thirty! I'll expect you here at fifteen minutes of two."

"You're the most wonderful mother in the world, my good woman," shouted

Jane, simply stunned by her hour's reprieve and her extra thirty-minute dividend. "I'll do something super for you some day."

While all this hotcha gay life was going on, Jane had time for another type of experience. During the period when she was making the last of her 29 pictures on the TCF lot, she met George Montgomery.

While having luncheon one day, she spied him in the commissary and demanded of her companion, "F'heaven's sake, who's that—my, oh, me!"

He was wearing chaps and a plaid shirt. He twirled a ten-gallon hat, and with one eyebrow lifted, coolly surveyed the spread of tables.

"That's George Montgomery, second generation Russian from Montana," Jane was told.

"Woo-woo," chortled Jane. Then, more softly, letting the sound die away in her throat as she watched him stride to a distant corner, "Woo-woo-oo-oo-o."

She started a new scrap book that night. Scrap books, collecting perfumes, and amassing earrings are the Withers' hobbies, but especially scrap books. She has a book commemorating every party she has ever given. Usually they were birthday parties, and she has the pictures taken and the hundreds of cards received, all neatly pasted page after page. She has a scrap book for every personal appearance tour she has ever made. And a scrap book about George Montgomery.

She went to the studio filing department and asked them to let her look through their George Montgomery data. There she found an enlarged snapshot of a tow-headed little boy clad in faded and torn blue overalls. He was staring sulkily at the camera. Behind him stretched the trackless Montana prairie. She rested a finger on the pictured tousle-head. "I'd like this one, please," she said. "Wasn't he a darling?"

News of this devoted fan reached George so he wandered over to the Withers set to meet the young lady. "I used to see her kid pictures," he told a studio friend afterward, "and expected a brat instead of a half-grown honey."

Jane stood there, smiling up at him, and wishing to heaven she could think of something to say. "I . . . I guess you're quite a rider," she ventured.

"Oh, sure. Brought up on a horse. How about you?"

"Well, I ride quite a bit. Tony Carrillo let me ride her horse once—she's Leo Carrillo's daughter, you know."

"How about going riding with me some day soon?" George asked.

Jane almost swooned with joy. She managed to say that she'd love to go riding sometime soon.

Several days later, George took her over to the small, unobtrusive academy where he was later to take Hedy Lamarr. He watched Jane carefully that first day.

"You're quite a horsewoman," he said, both impressed and pleased. "Just relax a little more. You're holding your shoulders sort of rigid."

Relax! While out riding with Sir Launcelot! Don't be like that, George.

They talked about Montana. George never tires of talking about Montana and the farm he is going to have there one day. He talked about his 12 brothers and sisters and their antics—a revelation to lone child Jane.

equestrienne bliss . . .

After that first ride together, he called occasionally in the evening. "May I speak to Jane, please," he would ask the maid, secretary or even Mrs. Withers if she happened to answer the telephone. "This is Jane's uncle."

One night he asked for a date. "Will you hold the wire a minute while I ask Mother?" she said. Her hands unsteady, she walked slowly into the other room and placed her question. Her heart waited in her eyes.

"I'm sorry, dear," Mrs. Withers said, "but George is too old for you. He's 24 or 25. Stick to your own little gang for regular dates, although I think it's nice for you to go riding with George in the afternoon."

Jane stood silent for several moments. Then she went back to her room and explained as gently as possible what she had to say. "Your mother's right," agreed George.

One afternoon George said, "You're so good I've decided to let you ride my horse this afternoon. You deserve a fine animal."

He gave her the leg up and she swung into the western saddle of one of the tallest horses she had ever seen. She was afraid of a horse for the first time in her life, but she would have died and been buried to long-hair music before she would have admitted it. She gripped the reins and gritted her teeth. And prayed a thousand prayers.

The horse, hep to what gave, pirouetted on his toes, snorted and flung his head. Jane made a valiant attempt to hold him, but he was off like a streak. She didn't try to stop him, she just stayed put. Down the road and over the bridge went the horse, headed straight for a walnut orchard practically swarming with low branches and fractured skulls.

Jane was getting ready to slip her stirrups and take a chance at sliding off onto the meadow when George's mount drew alongside and George reined up the runway. "Are you all right?" he demanded.

"Sure," panted Jane. "Some horse."

"Lamb, you're some rider," he said, cupping her shoulder with his big hand and shaking her gently.

"Only one trouble," Jane confessed. "I've lost one of my hearts."

"Come again?" said George.

She explained. She had been wearing a pair of tiny heart-shaped locket earrings. One was gone, so they dismounted and walked slowly back, scanning the ground. They didn't find the lost heart.

A week later Jane received a package from the jewelers. Inside was a new pair of heart-shaped locket earrings. In the old pair she had pictures of Buddy Pepper and Joe Brown, Jr. In the new pair she has snaps of her girl friends—and two blank spaces.

As for George, at this time a good many stories began to appear about "How George and Ginger Fell In Love." Dutifully, Jane cut them out and pasted them in her Montgomery scrap book. She even set aside a page for a series of gorgeous pictures of Ginger alone.

Jane's crush didn't pass politely unnoticed by her gang. Through the mail one day she received a toy six shooter from A C A week later he sent her a pair of miniature chaps.

Buddy Pepper did a Longfellow on the subject, to wit:

Another poem,
Another date,
Another corsage for a girl who's great.
I'm not George Montgomery or Cary Grant,
Just Pep who's taking you to "Charley's Aunt."

Jane had her tonsils taken out and George sent her a box simply bursting with gardenias. Jane couldn't speak, of course, but she wrote in a thrill-jerky scrawl, "I counted them — there are THIRTY-SIX!"

In the scrapbook the Ginger Rogers section was closed and a new department started: Hedy Lamarr. When the engagement was announced, A C rushed some versification over:

Feel not too sad.
There are many others to be had—
Your dancing partner.

A few days later, Jane was transporting a load of magazines, the scrap book, glue, scissors, pen and ink from her playroom to her dressing room where she could work undisturbed. As she was crossing her bedroom, chaos took over. Glue flew in one direction, scissors rampant, magazines far and wide. And the ink smashed onto the rug, broke like a bomb and spouted like a pinwheel. Jane collapsed onto the floor and began to cry. Then she inspected the scrap book. It was safe. No damage at all. The tears dried.

The curtains and bedspread had to be scrapped; the rug had to be processed—cleaned; one wall had to be repapered, but—oh, happy day—the scrap book was unharmed.

One of the minor things that makes the book so valuable is the TIME that has gone into its preparation. The other day one of her girl friends asked Jane why she hadn't done thus-and-so. "Because, pal," she said, "my time just comes in minutes."

working gal . . .

She's still deep in school, taking Spanish, American literature, social science, physiology, and hygiene and math. Also twenty minutes of terrific calisthenics. She's now 5 feet 5½ inches tall and weighs 118; she doesn't diet, but she does exercise.

On week-ends she really pours on the coal. Saturday morning she starts out in a station wagon to collect thermos jugs, cups and other empty containers from the army stations serviced with sandwiches and coffee by AWVS night crews. This round-up takes about 3½ or 4 hours, depending upon the amount of conversation she exchanges with uniforms and upon traffic. Once back at headquarters, she washes and dries all the equipment.

On Sunday mornings she goes to the Hollywood Presbyterian Church, where she is president of her Sunday School class. Usually she takes a few soldiers along with her.

Whenever she and her mother are driving anywhere, they pick up any uniforms along the way. One Saturday they collected three boys on leave from a rather distant station. Two of the boys were originally from Jane's home town —Atlanta—and the third was from No'th Ca'olina, ma'am. The Withers household expanded to take in the three for the week-end, and they accompanied Jane to church on Sunday.

There are 22 boys stationed directly across the street from the Withers home, so they are invited over at specific times to splash in the pool and to imbibe some of the terrific chocolate sodas or lime cokes that Jane concocts at her own soda fountain. She also has a miniature piano in her playroom, so one of the boys usually knocks out an alleged tune or so for dancing and harmonizing.

They argue happily about their favorite orchestras. "Glenn Martin has positively the hottest brass section in the world," Jane told one of the boys.

"Yeah? How about Goodman? Howcome you give him a dishonorable discharge?" demanded the army.

"Goodman's hep—don't get me wrong. So help me, the biggest thrill of my life happened when I was dancing at the Waldorf one night, and Benny recognized me. He called out, 'What will it be, Janie?' I said the 'Hut-Sut Song.' In spite of my thrill over that, if I had to take one orchestra to a desert island with me, I'd say, make it Cugat," said Jane.

Between entertaining the army, keepin a full-fledged career on the wing, going places with her gang, selling bonds, studying toward a High School diploma and keeping scrap books, Jane also finds a few moments in which to buy presents for her nine godchildren (8 girls named Jane and 1 boy named Jerry) and to knit.

She's turning out a turquoise sweater at present, simply because someone gave her a turquoise snood and she needed something to match it. Another friend matched the snood with a knitted bag, and Jane already had a turquoise suit. She went through the stores, searching for a turquoise blouse, but couldn't find it, so Miss Resourceful got out her own knitting needles. This antic proves one of the things all her friends know about Jane—she likes to have everything she wears match in color. If she wears blue, she insists on everything being the identical shade. Same with red . . . and turquoise.

"Only a sour potato," Jane told her mother, "goes around out of sync."

So there you have Jane Withers at 16 —a sweet potato definitely in sync. A gal who is going places and doing things strictly on the beam. A busy little brain on the upbeat—with a heart that is just beginning to wonder about waltz time.

One particular morning she had to do a very difficult scene. Jack Carson had died, and the camera picked up Morgan, Ida and Joan at his grave. The company rehearsed the scene several times in the morning, preparatory to final shooting in the afternoon, and Joan lost herself in serious rehearsal and wept bitterly.

Dennis was uttering a brief soliloquy over the rain-drenched grave. He was letting Joan know—or the character played by Joan—what a scurvy little beast she was. Joan cried harder and harder. He mentioned what a swell guy Jack had been, how happy-go-lucky, how good-hearted. Joan sobbed until she shook.

"Steady, ducky," Ida Lupino said, her arms around Joan's shoulders. "You mustn't wear yourself out—these crying scenes are killers."

Said Jack, from the sidelines where he was relishing his own funeral. "Who said dead men tell no tales? Have you heard this one about the . . ."

The rehearsal finished, Joan scooted across the set, her brow furrowed. The assistant director stopped her with a sympathetic hand. "You're great, kid," he said. "You're going to break plenty of hearts in that scene. Don't look so worried."

Joan came out of her fog long enough to thank him. "I'm not worried about the picture," she confessed. "It's that darned physiology test that I'm taking between scenes. I'm trying to remember exactly how to describe and give the functions of the alimentary canal."

In the front office at Warner Brothers' there is a large, prominently displayed calendar showing only the month of January, 1943. On this page, the 26th is circled in red. July 4, Labor Day, October 12 or Pay Day are nothing as compared to the promise of January 26, 1943. On that day, Joan Leslie becomes 18 and is freed from that old ogre, the Los Angeles Board of Education.

Until she is 18, Joan leads a life bound round with restrictions, red tape and protective custody. Her presence at the studio is allowable for a maximum of 9 hours a day; of that time, 3 hours must be spent studying with her teacher; 1 hour must be devoted to luncheon, and 1½ hours are necessarily used by the make-up department. By simple mathematics—which Joan can work for you in much less than the twinkle of her brown eyes—that leaves just 3½ hours for acting, for still picture-taking, for being interviewed and for all the rest of the time-taking business of being one of the screen's sub-deb darlings.

Because of Joan's time limitations, Warners' have found all manner of short cuts to save precious moments. For instance, until recently, Joan's older sister, Mary, (known around the house as Bunny) gave Joan's interviews. She answered all questions about her baby sister, while attired in that baby sister's navy blue slacks, blouse, matching blue sox and shoes.

The three sisters (Betty is the middle Brodell) exchange clothes left and right. They are all near enough the same size so that they can and do trade everything descending to and including shoes. They have just one rule, no one touches another person's brand new things until the owner gives her official okay. At present, Joan has a new blue suit, frilly white blouse and blue-and-white spectator sport pumps that are specials. Nobody dares touch them. When she leaves the house in the morning, she is likely to shout, "No matter what you wear, don't you dare touch my gold lamé dress or my navy formal with red dots. And that's positive."

modish miss . . .

The navy formal with red dots is an off-trail outfit for the titian-headed destiny's tot. Because her hair is red, she has never worn red—just stayed true to blues, browns and greens—and because she couldn't wear red, she hated it. Quite a dodge. However, the studio shot some fashion stills of Joan wearing a dress designed without her color consent. She liked it so well in spite of the red dots that she ordered a duplicate for her personal wardrobe. She wore it, let it be noted, at the most recent Loyola formal to excellent advantage.

Of Joan's three favorite foods, (chop suey, beef stew or ice cream), about which the family tease her, she can have all she wants of the first two. She is now five feet five inches tall and weighs 122 pounds. She doesn't exactly diet—just watches her calories. She drinks a quart of skimmed milk a day, a private stock of which is kept at the studio for her.

Another time-saver the studio has devised is the dodge of washing and setting Joan's hair at night before she leaves the lot. Her head covered with pin curls, she knots a bandana under her chin and

WIN $5.00 in WAR STAMPS

Are you giving up an extra ice cream soda for a War Stamp? Saving up the shekels from mowing lawns for War Bonds? USO-ing? Victory Bond vending? WE WANT TO KNOW ABOUT IT. Write us, and the best letter will win $5.00 in War Stamps. Address your letter to MODERN SCREEN, 149 Madison Ave., New York, N. Y. The brightest idea this month came from someone who signed his/her letter "Sincerely American." No name . . . no address . . . no nothin'. If "Sincerely American" wants it that way, O.K. We'll donate the money to the USO. Otherwise, please do write, and we'll forward the reward for the winning letter, below.

"For our annual Junior-Senior high school banquet and prom the admission fee was one twenty-five-cent defense stamp. These stamps have been changed into a bond that will be left in the hands of the school until it matures. At that time it will be cashed, and the money will be used to buy a plaque on which the names of all our boys fighting in this war will be placed. In the next few months, thousands of school dances will be held all over the United States. My plan is that the admission to these be war stamps or even bonds. If this plan worked here in our little town it ought to work in thousands of other towns, schools and universities."

hurries home to let her thick, auburn mop dry. The color is strictly a Joanie special—the studio adds no tint or rinse of any kind. The Leslie special hairdresser has perfected her technique to the point where she can set Joan's thick head of hair in 8 minutes. The hairdresser says, "Joan times me, and sort of cheers for me in the stretch. She yells, 'Gee, look at your hands—they almost whurr!'"

The Brodell family life is an especially happy one. They are extremely "sympatica" and have the usual running family gags. Since they first came to Hollywood, the girls have been teasing their mother to buy herself a closet full of knockout clothes. Regularly, she agrees to a purchasing spree, so one day a few weeks ago the three girls and Mrs. Brodell started out with the best of intentions.

Mrs. Brodell looked at this and that, yet nothing seemed to be quite right. Meanwhile, Mary saw a suit that was just what she had been wanting—she made the purchase. Betty noticed a blouse that was exactly what she had been needing for ages. Joan saw a pair of white slacks that gave her that buy-buy feeling.

When they got home in a cloud of chatter, they dropped down to rest, kicking off shoes. Mother Brodell had ONE package—a pair of gloves. Joan rushed over and slid her arms around her mother's neck. "Why do you let us do it?" she burst out. "Why don't you buy the pretty things instead of standing back while we grab everything in sight?"

"I want my girls to be neat and lovely; I don't matter," she said in the voice of most mothers.

Joan said fiercely, "When my allowance gets to be more than ten dollars a week, I'm going to buy you every gorgeous thing I see. You've sacrificed for us so long that you can't break the habit, but I'm going to be extravagant for you."

bankbook blues . . .

Joan's ten dollar allowance clearly cramps her style. According to state law, half of Joan's salary is set aside in a trust fund; from the remaining half, all the legitimate operating expenses of a star are deducted, plus a sum allocated to Mrs. Brodell as guardian, plus the price of a war bond a week . . . the remainder is free and clear, but it isn't very large.

Not only is her mother going to benefit by Joan's generosity, but there are others she's bearing in mind. She has a mental note book into which she engraves little wishes of those about her. She heard a script girl say one day that she'd love to own a pair of blonde cocker spaniels. Joan confided to her school teacher, "I'll buy her those dogs one day."

She is planning to splurge her ducats for one personal boon. The Brodells have bought the house they rented for so long, and they have redecorated it according to the Early American theme. Joan came running in one day, all out of breath, with a fraction of her petticoat showing. She told the wardrobe mistress, "I thought lamps for our place was our most important problem, but I've changed my mind. As soon as I've saved up enough, I'm going to buy a simply sumptuous full-length mirror, maybe two or three, and put them on doors where a girl can do a last minute check-up."

Just as she has plans for an epidemic of spending, she has a pet economy: she goes around the house turning off lights, "because, if I'm not careful, our house looks as if we're having a party all the time."

Actually, while she is working in a picture, her social life is nil. Between pictures, she and Betty go on a spree of badminton, ping pong and movies. On Saturday night they stand in line at Grauman's Chinese along with half the town, and she is never recognized.

The very first time she went bowling she rolled a 115 score, but she has never done so well since, hence dropped the sport. "But ping pong," she tells everyone who passes her on the set, "now that's another story."

Another athletic event at which Joan excels is dancing—any old kind. She can jitterbug, waltz, conga, samba or rumba. When the company reached New York recently on Joan's personal appearance tour, a professional male model was secured to pose with Joan, who was showing off a series of dance dresses to be photographed. During camera adjustments, a studio representative looked around to find Joan and the handsome picture partner in a far corner dancing happily; she was teaching him a series of rumba breaks that were strictly from Samoa.

Fred Astaire wanted Joan for "Holiday Inn," the picture he is making with Bing Crosby, because he says she is the best dancer he has ever lead through an intricate routine with the single exception of his sister, Adele. However, Warners' had her scheduled to dance with Jimmy Cagney in "Yankee Doodle Dandy" so she couldn't be loaned out, an occasion that brought forth tears from Joan. However, Fred is still determined to make a dancing picture with her some day.

He telephoned Joan on the set one day, but was told that she couldn't answer at that time because she was busy studying for an English quiz. He turned from the phone in despair and lifted an eyebrow at Bing. "My longed-for leading lady," he explained wryly, "can't talk to me because she's still in school. I guess that will settle me for awhile."

readin', writin' and rhythm . . .

School restrictions or no, Joan is mentally far advanced for her years, possibly because she has been entertaining the public with her songs, dances and impersonations since she was eleven, although her first stage appearance occurred at the delicate age of 2½. Hanging to the arm of a five-year-old male escort, she sang "Let A Smile Be Your Umbrella."

When the Brodell family was on the road, traveling from one date to another, they always took an apartment in the town in which they were playing. (Their dog, Mike, had an aversion to hotels and vice versa.) While Mother Brodell was preparing dinner, the three girls practiced their orchestrations: Mary played the banjo, Betty the sax, and Joan the accordion.

If music palled, Joan would practice her impersonations. One of her first was the Luise Rainer telephone sequence from "The Great Ziegfeld." In order to be able to reproduce this perfectly, Joan spent an entire day in a continuous run theater, watching the picture over and over again. "When we finally left, it was dark outside and our eyes were so tired that we saw everything in jagged lines," she confessed to her mother.

Nowadays, her repertoire of impersonations includes Hepburn, Gary Cooper, Jimmy Cagney, Jack Carson and Ida Lupino, among others. Someone told Ida that Joan had perfected a wonderful imitation of her delicious British intonations and the slow manner in which she uses her wonderful eyes, so Ida asked Joan to repeat the performance for the original. Joan nearly went through the floor. "It's meant as a compliment to you," she explained, "but I still can't do it. I'd die of embarrassment."

the hard way . . .

The keen insight that makes it possible for Joan to understand and imitate the pantomime of the people with whom she works, also prompted one of the sagest remarks ever to be uttered by a 17-year-old girl blessed by motion picture fame.

A group of studio people were discussing the antics of a new starlet on one of the major lots. "The girl is nothing but a four-star brat," someone said. "She makes me want to strangle her. Never have I seen such airs, such rudeness, such conceit."

Joan said slowly, "She shouldn't be blamed too much. After all, she had the bad luck to have her very first picture selected as an outstanding success."

In that simple sentence was Joan's realization that all the years of setbacks and disappointments, of screen tests that bore no contract fruit, of juicy parts she failed to get, had stood her in good stead. Her early reverses had planted humility deep in her heart. Today, she is just as sweet, as unassuming, as thrilled by little things as any High School girl in Wabash Bend, Indiana.

At home, she sets the table, always makes her own bed and occasionally "gets to mow the lawn or squirt the hose," as she puts it.. At such times she has trouble with Mike, her wire-haired terrier. His wife is named Cammie, short for Camera, and they have six new pups named as follows: Close-up, Longshot, Montage (he's all mixed up and frustrated) S.T. for Sound Track, Set (the lazy, fat one that had to be coaxed to eat his dinner) and Wardy, short for Wardrobe, the elegant pup with white spats.

Outside of this menagerie, her second best enthusiasm is her victory garden, planted mainly with radishes and carrots, because—as she told the studio gardener, "they come up fastest and look prettiest."

She doesn't care particularly for bangles and jewelry. The only ring she wears is a worn signet of gold bearing the initians A.O.H. This memento was given to Mrs. Brodell by her brother when she made her first communion. The initials stand for Agnes O'Hearn, Mrs. Brodell's maiden name. When Joan's older sister, Mary, made her first communion, the ring was her commemorative gift from Mrs. B.

Then, when Mary was married and wore her engagement and wedding rings on the third finger of her left hand—where the signet fits—Mary passed the ring on to Joan. When Joan is before the camera, she leaves the ring in her dressing room, but the instant she washes up for luncheon, she slips the ring on again in spite of the fact that it has to fight for space on her slim finger with a prop wedding ring—necessary for her role in the picture.

"Some wedding ring!" Joan told Jack Carson. "Look—" The wedding band is divided at the back so it can be made to fit any actress' finger. "A universal joiner, you might call it."

The other trinket she values is a topaz daisy set in gold leaves. Her sisters gave Joan this pin to wear with her gold lamé dress when she went to one of the Loyola dances. She gets scolded, now, for wearing the pin on everything. Betty said, "That gold dress needed a touch, and this was it. But why?—on this blue suit?"

"Like it on everything," retorted Joan immovably.

Most seventeen-year-olds are busy having dates, planning for senior proms, ambling to the corner drug store for a coke with the football captain, and otherwise mingling with males of the species.

As for Joan, she has attended practically every formal Loyola College has given during the past two years. Loyola is the outstanding Catholic college in Los Angeles, and Joan met her escorts through their sisters who were her classmates during the year she attended Immaculate Heart High School.

Outside of these widely-spaced events, her only other fling was with Harry Lewis, a Warner Brothers' fellow employee, with whom she attended the Warner party at the Biltmore Bowl. Afterward, someone asked her if she wouldn't like to go to a lot of parties—see the town—maybe, huh?

"It sounds corny to say this," Joan explained quickly, "but I just don't have much time to go places. I have been, and I still am, working pretty steadily."

She could have added that it was difficult for her to meet boys who would have courage enough to ask her for a date, but that situation is going to be corrected—but promptly. Beginning Sunday, May 17, she was enlisted to help entertain service men at the Beverly Hills USO canteen. Although there are strict rules prohibiting any of these USO hostesses from giving their addresses or telephone numbers to their guests, you can imagine what that flock of lonely uniforms is going to do when it meets up with a dancing doll like Joanie.

Even this activity, of course, will be supervised by Joan's mother or teacher.

Yet, comes now January 26, 1943, great changes are going to be made. The butterfly is scheduled to shed her chrysalis and to spread her wings. We'll keep you posted on further developments, of which we can guarantee you plenty!

I SAW IT HAPPEN

As you know, this summer Olivia de Havilland spent two weeks at Snow Inn on Cape Cod. I was staying at a hotel a few blocks away, and I witnessed a very amusing scene between Miss de Havilland and a grocery boy.

The boy was delivering groceries and whistling as he came down the walk. Miss de Havilland evidently thought he was whistling at her because she turned, looked, then winked and whistled back. No one was more surprised or flattered than the boy, when he realized who she was.

ICELAND—STORY

six-foot-two of him. Slip Riggs watched glumly while Jimmy stepped out to look over Iceland.

The Corporal apologized for his driver's bad manners and worse ability. The Corporal said how pleased he was to meet the people of the town in person.

"Well," said Slip when Jimmy came back.

"Her name's Katina Jonsdottir. Her father runs a coffee shop."

"Married?"

"Just waiting."

"What's the situation?"

"The Marines have landed, haven't they?" Jimmy said.

Slip said: "Oh, oh."

"They're dancing at the hotel tonight—she and her ex-beau."

"Ex-beau?"

"Did you ever see me do the Iceland Lindy, pal?" said Corporal James Murfin.

murfin-on-the-spot . . .

The Jorg Hotel was small, colorful and featured a jazz band and smorgasbord. Smorgasbord is Scandinavian hash in small doses; put enough of it together, and you have a hot dog. But Jimmy Murfin wasn't interested in food when he barged into the café; nor in the music or the crowd—British and American soldiers and Marines, some native Icelanders, bright-cheeked, laughing girls. Jimmy was looking for a blonde with wide, innocent eyes. Katina.

She was dancing with her beau, Sven, when he came in. He crossed the floor slowly until she saw him. The music was a low, soft background, and he cut in on the dance hardly looking at Sven.

"I'm glad you came," she said.

Then they were twirling slowly past the other dancers, toward the door at the back of the café. It opened on a small empty room that looked out on the bleak, snow-filled Icelandic scene. It was quiet in there and dark. From the café room outside came the sound of music and laughter, the shuffle of feet.

They hardly heard it; they heard nothing at all. Looking up Katina could see the light glints in his eyes and the soft curve of his mouth smiling down at her.

Bending swiftly, he kissed her.

She said simply: "I wanted that."

He was laughing now. "Did you? You're a funny kid."

"Am I?"

"You're the kind of girl a guy could really go for."

"Am I?"

The music came in again, loud and fast this time, and a girl's voice rode out over the background of trumpets. They danced back into the room, and as they twirled, Jimmy saw a girl on the stand. A girl named Adele whom he'd jilted back in the States. He stiffened. "Come on, Katina, I'd better get you back," he said. "Your beau'll think you're lost."

"He's not my beau," Katina said.

"Besides, I've got to get back."

"I'll see you again?" Katina said.

"Just keep looking," Jimmy said. "I'm the guy with the light in his eyes."

Outside, Slip was waiting for him, bundled up against the chill, driving wind. When Jimmy came out, Slip grabbed his arm. "Did you see her?"

"Who, Adele? Yes . . . but did you see Katina? She's wonderful. Where did they ever get the name Iceland with a gal like that around?"

"Never mind the Iceland popsicle.

More important, Adele's singing here."

Jimmy groaned, "Why did she ever have to leave Brooklyn."

"Maybe you had something to do with it," Slip said.

"I don't know where she got the idea I'd marry her."

At the Coffee Shop the whole family was waiting for Katina and Sven. They had been waiting that way for weeks, waiting for Sven to propose to Katina, waiting for Katina to accept. As soon as the door opened, Papa called: "Well, is it all settled? Are you going to wed?"

"Oh, yes," Katina said happily.

"Wonderful," said Helga, Katina's younger sister. "Now Valtyr's father will let Valtyr and me get married. You know how old-fashioned he is. He insists that the older sister marry first."

"Wonderful," said Aunt Sophie. "Now Valtyr's father will save the coffee shop from bankruptcy."

"Sven," cried Papa. "My future son-in-law. Come have a drink."

"It isn't me," Sven said glumly.

"Not you!"

"It's an American, I think."

"Who? An American? Katina!"

"His name," said Katina gaily, just before she closed her bedroom door, "is James Aloysius Murfin."

So the next few weeks were happy. Didn't Jimmy tell her that he liked home comforts and home cooking; and couldn't she make fifty different kinds of smorgasbord? And didn't Jimmy tell her there was no one else like her, and that some day he wanted a little home with a girl like her around to call herself Mrs. Jimmy Murfin?

Of course he seemed to jump a little every time Papa spoke about setting a date; and he didn't seem to like Herrn Tegnar, the Justice of Peace very much. But then men were strange.

There was a celebration that week in honor of the Marines. Around the pond the native Icelanders gathered in gay costumes; soldiers mixed in the audience. A band played gayly at one side.

let's face it . . .

And on the ice, Katina skated. Behind her swooped a troupe of native boys and girls, but it was Katina that held their eyes. She was like a beam of moonlight, weightless, graceful, romantic. She swooped past them in long, effortless glides, she spun like a shimmering icicle.

"Brother, she's good," Slip said.

"Yeah," Jimmy said.

"Everybody thinks you're going to marry her."

"I never said—"

"Well, that's what they think."

"I was going to talk to her tonight," Jimmy said. "I don't want her to get any ideas."

He was waiting for her as she came off the ice at the end of her final number, breathless, flushed, looking for him. He bent to untie her skates and not meeting her eyes, he said: "I've got something to tell you."

"Yes, Jimmy?" she said.

She bent to help him with the skates and her hair brushed against his face. "Jimmy," she said. "I love you so much."

Down in the village the bells in the church steeple began to sound softly through the night air. "That's St. Olaf's," Katina said. "There's a custom in our country for sweethearts to get married on his day."

"That's swell," Jimmy said absently.

"Would you like that, Jimmy?"

"I'd like nothing better," Jimmy said. "Only—"

She rose happily. "Then we'll set it for then," she said.

"Listen—" Jimmy said desperately.

But before he could say anything more, she cupped his face in her hands and kissed him. After that, for a long time, there was nothing he wanted to say.

Going back to the barracks that night, Slip said to him, "Is it all settled?"

"I couldn't tell her," Jimmy said.

Slip stopped outside the Nissen hut. "You can't do that, Jimmy. She's just a kid. She's sweet. She's innocent. She's—"

"You try telling her," Jimmy said harshly. He ripped into the Nissen hut.

Slip stood there a moment silently. "You asked for it, pal," he said softly.

So the blow-out at the Jorg Hotel was Slip's idea. It took a little doing, of course. Adele? Adele was on a boat back to America, he told Jimmy. There was nothing to worry about. Old Slip just wanted to treat everybody to a good time. They were all there at a table that night—Slip, Jimmy and Katina.

out of the frying pan . . .

But Adele hadn't left. She came out on cue and when she sang her song, she sang it straight at Jimmy. Everybody could see it. At the end of the number she crossed the room to their table.

"Hello, Jimmy," she said.

For a while Slip thought he'd arranged to hit too hard. It was a good idea to have Adele tell Jimmy off in front of Katina; that would tell the whole story. But it was like murder. You could see the kid's heart was breaking; it was there in her eyes.

But she stayed through it all. She listened while Adele spilled everything. How Jimmy had run out on her at the last minute, how he'd given her a song and dance about moonlight and roses and love . . . and marriage. It all added up to nothing; it was just his line.

She sat through it all until Jimmy, to shut up Adele, took her out on the dance floor away from Katina. Only then with no one to see her but Slip, the tears came to her eyes and her shoulders moved slightly as if she were crying. Even then she didn't say anything. She got up and started to the door.

"I'm sorry," Slip said. "It was the best way. You had to find out.

Jimmy followed her, of course. He told her he loved her. But later he got mad when she had the marriage license filled out by Herrn Tegnar with his name. He said he loved her, but he wouldn't marry her. He said he was no good at all for her.

Then when he didn't come for a week, she went to see him at the barracks and found him marching off to the docks with a detail of Marines. It was all for the best, he said; he'd bring her nothing but grief. Maybe he was right. But seeing him march off, all she knew was that she loved him and missed him.

She wanted to be alone then. But the kitchen was full when she got back to the Coffee Shop. The family was there —Papa, Helga, Aunt Sophie, Grandma.

"Ah," Papa said when she came in, "everything is fine. Valtyr's father was here. Helga will be married right after you. And I've already sent out the invitations for your marriage."

"No," Katina said.

"No?" Papa said. "No?"

"Yes. I'll never get married now," Helga cried bitterly.

"Quiet!" Papa roared. "I have sent out invitations. There will be a marriage. If it is not the American, it will be Sven."

little white lie . . .

"I won't marry Sven," Katina said.

"You will do as I say," Papa shouted.

"I can't marry him," Katina said wildly.

"Can't?" Papa said. "Can't?"

"I'm married already," Katina said.

"Married!"

"I'm Mrs. James Aloysius Murfin."

"And where is your husband?"

"He's gone with the Marines." She was in her bedroom, leaning against the door before they could ask her anything else.

"Well," Papa said, "a marriage is a marriage. How soon can you arrange for yours, Helga?"

So Helga and Valtyr were to be married at last. Papa explained gravely to Valtyr's father that Katina had been married by the Army Chaplain. It was all regular, in order; the records were with the military officials. And how was the herring business—good enough to help out a little Coffee Shop, perhaps?

It would have worked. It was only a little lie Katina had told so that Helga could get married. Let Helga, at least, be happy. Katina kept herself busy helping with the arrangements for the marriage. On the set day she helped with the food and with the flowers. She helped Helga with her dress. Anything to keep her hands busy.

"Katina!"

Like that! She could almost swear she heard him and if she looked up—

"Jimmy!"

He was standing in the doorway, holding a bouquet of flowers, smiling at her. "They didn't send me away after all, baby," he said. "It was just dock detail."

Before she could move, her family had surrounded Jimmy, pumping his hand, clapping him on the back while he stood there bewildered.

"Welcome back," they shouted.

"Did you bring the certificate of marriage with you?" Papa said.

"Papa," Katina cried sharply. "I want to be alone with Jimmy."

"That's natural," Aunt Sophie said.

When they were alone, Jimmy said suspiciously: "What's all this about a marriage certificate?"

She explained it to him shamefacedly. She had thought it would do no harm. He was leaving, and no one would ever know. It was just a little story so that Helga could get married.

"A little story!" Jimmy yelled.

"It was only because I love you," Katina said softly. "They wanted me to marry Sven, but I couldn't. . . ."

"So we have to play Mr. and Mrs. until Helga is married tonight?"

"Will you, Jimmy?"

"All right," Jimmy said. "Strictly as a favor."

They were together when the musicians played "Here Comes The Bride" for Helga and Valtyr. They watched the dancing. They even danced the Lover's Knot together. But it was only play acting. . . .

Or was it?

At the end of the evening, it was the Icelandic custom that the bride and the groom be serenaded to their bridal chamber. Blushing and giggling, Helga and Valtyr were led off while the musicians struck up something gay and romantic.

But then Papa returned with the musicians. Aunt Sophie smiled mischievously from a corner. There would be a serenade for Katina and Jimmy, too, Papa announced. There was a bridal chamber made ready for them.

"But we're married already," Katina said desperately. "We shouldn't be serenaded to a bridal chamber."

"It sounds like a swell idea," Jimmy said blandly.

They danced them down the hall, the warm friendly voices singing. She didn't dare object. And Jimmy, grinning, only paused once on the way to whisper something in Slip's ear.

In the bridal chamber Katina stood whitefaced against the door. Outside the music of the serenade floated in the air. They could hear Papa boasting to Valtyr's father. Katina eyed Jimmy cautiously. He started toward her.

"Don't!" she said.

"Why, honey," Jimmy said. "We're married, aren't we. You said so."

"I'll tell them. I'll tell them everything. I warn you, Jimmy Murfin!"

Without stopping, still laughing, he swept her into his arms.

"Break," said a voice from the window.

It was Slip. And behind him, climbing into the room, was Herrn Tegnar, the Justice of the Peace. He was a little startled, Herrn Tegnar, but then . . . .

"Why did you bring Herrn Tegnar here?" Katina whispered.

But Jimmy didn't answer her. Instead he said "I do" at the right place in the marriage service. That was answer enough; that was answer for everything. That, and a few kisses. Tomorrow there would be music, dancing, skating, eating, sixty kinds of smorgasbord. . . .

At that, kisses and smorgasbord were alike; you never got enough of either.

WHAT THEY EXPECT FROM A DATE

Sometimes the gang gathers at the Palladium. Jane's latest yen is to start a dancing class for service men. After all, it was she who taught AC to glide, wasn't it?

She wears formals only to premieres—otherwise a print or tailored suit. She likes her clothes brilliant in color and simple in line—red, royal blue and fuchsia being her current favorites. The night before a date, she tries on every dress she owns and sticks every pin up against it to get the effect.

Mostly she has dinner at home, runs out to play with the dogs for a while to allow an interval between eating and showering, then goes upstairs. Until lately, her mother had to pick out the evening's costume and help her dress. Now she's on her own and, being a little new at the business, takes Rex, the Belgian shepherd, along for company. He flops on the dressing room floor and watches the rites, which take between thirty and forty-five minutes, depending on how fresh she is from the beauty parlor. If her hair's just been done, it's easy. Sometimes she wears it in a pompadour and behind her ears, sometimes parted in the center with a long bob. The first makes her look older; the family prefers the second.

A little powder, a little lipstick, a touch of mascara for formals, a drop of light perfume on her handkerchief. Once she dabbed it self-consciously behind her ears. "That's sophisticated," she confided to Rex. "They do it in the movies."

When she's ready—before the boy comes, because promptness has been preached at her all her life—Mrs. Withers gives her a strict once-over. Then she comes down to pirouette before Daddy. But if her escort compliments her, she goes shy and turns it off by telling him how keen that tie is with that suit. Freddie kids around. "If Louis B. Mayer calls, tell him I'm busy, will you?" Mrs. Withers has some flowers for AC's mother. "They'll be wrapped and waiting on the table when you get back." Then she sees the young ones to the car—the sedan, by Jane's choice, so they can give waiting soldiers a lift. "You all be good," says Mom, "and be home by twelve."

"Got any gum?" That's Jane, as they drive off. She's made a deal with her mother, says she won't ever touch a cigarette, if Mom please won't fuss at her about chewing gum.

After the dance or the movie they stop at Simon's Drive-In for a bacon and tomato sandwich and a lime freeze. Jane gets in by twelve and would gladly spend the rest of the night telling all to Mom. What thrills her most is seeing stars. She's as movie-struck as your own adolescent. Mrs. Withers finally shoos her off to bed and sees that she's in it. Else she'd spend an hour or two writing up her date-book and straightening her dresser drawers, which were last straightened that afternoon. Miss Withers is known to her folks as "the old maid."

To celebrate his birthday, AC coaxed Mrs. Withers into letting him take Jane to her first night club. She went wild with excitement, but wouldn't it cost too much? She knew what. The Mocambo had little tables over at the side, where you didn't have to pay a cover charge. "It's my birthday," said AC. "We're having the works." So the works it was.

She wore a white dress with a row of fuchsia flowers, casting longing glances meantime at the black her mother won't let her wear till she's seventeen. By that time, Mrs. Withers hopes, it'll be out of style. She doesn't know why she let Jane heckle her into buying it. But didn't Mom think it was just the thing for tonight. Mom didn't.

She wore silver slippers, a silver ribbon in her hair and a short white ermine wrap. AC brought baby orchids, which she fastened to her shoulder. After dinner at Gail Patrick's, they proceeded to the Mocambo, whose decor includes birds in cages. Jane worried about the birds having to sit up all night, enjoyed her lime freeze till she found it cost eighty cents, craned her neck for movie stars, spotted Deanna Durbin, Dick Powell and Joan Blondell, and when AC asked her to dance, said she'd rather sit and look if it was all the same to him.

At eleven word went abroad that Mae West was expected. Jane would die if she couldn't see Mae West. They phoned Mrs. Withers, leaving the door of the booth open, so the wonderful music and stuff would break her down. Mae arrived at last with four escorts. "Gee," breathed Jane, "if I could only get her autograph!"

Janet Blair's the kid with the big brown eyes and chestnut hair who hoofed with George Raft in "Broadway" and still can't believe she's my sister Eileen. She promised her mother she'd never bleach her hair, but for a part like Eileen, what mother wouldn't release a girl from her promise?

She shares an apartment with her sister and goes out with several boys, especially John Howard who calls her Punk'n. Their activities are diversified and informal. Ice-skating, roller-skating—if she's had a hard day, dinner at a drive-in so she won't have to change from slacks. Or they go to his house. John's parents must be fun. Hedy Lamarr used to love spending evenings there, so does Janet. She and John sing for the recording machine, or they all play records or darts or silly little house games or poker for stakes that can lose you as much as fifty cents. There's always homemade ice cream, and Janet gets the big dipper to lick.

For dancing, she prefers the Cocoanut Grove. Partly because the floor's so huge that, even when crowded, you can move, not wriggle. But mostly because of happy memories. She used to sing there with Hal Kemp's band. She knows all the waiters and the lady in the powder room. She knows Freddie Martin, whose orchestra's playing there now, and she knows the boys. Going back to the Cocoanut Grove is like Old Home Week.

She's probably the world's quickest dresser, can make it in ten minutes flat. Shower, underwear, dress. Peasant clothes in summer, or a light suit, her favorite color being red. For make-up, mostly lipstick. Then a comb through her hair, which is always in good condition because it's naturally curly and she's bugs on brushing. A do-gadget on her lapel or round her neck. She's got drawers full of the junk bought at the ten-cent store, which lures her as Tiffany's lures other women. A dab of Cobra or Breathless on her bra and wrists, behind the ears, at the nape of the neck. Not too much—she hates to reek. Mostly no hat, unless she remembers that mother'd like her to be a lady and wear one.

Where they eat doesn't matter, so long as the food's foreign—Chinese, Russian, Hungarian, Swedish. She's a healthy eater and prefers to have the man order for her.

Still fresh as a daisy at two, she likes to drop in at the Bar of Music to hear a couple of wonderful pianists, then to the Brown Derby for coffee and eggs, and so home, harmonizing all the way.

Back in her room, she turns on the radio, scrubs her face and brushes her teeth—with a guilty sense that mother would know if she didn't—hangs up her clothes, goes through the apartment closing windows and doors—she can't stand a closet door standing ajar—opens the bedroom window, turns off the radio and gets into bed, still humming. At twenty-one, life's a song to Janet. She can't be sure, but she thinks she sings in her sleep.

Alexis Smith isn't engaged to Craig Stevens, the goodlooker who's getting a build-up at Warners', but she doesn't date anyone else. Craig isn't engaged to Alexis, but he travels the eighteen miles from Beverly to Glendale just to take her bowling. "I'll pack a lunch," he phones, "and be right over."

For bowling she wears slacks and pigtails which her mother braids and ties with bows. She used to be one of your never-on-time girls. Craig didn't beef, but there was a look in his eyes which told her she'd better mend her ways. Now she's ready when he comes.

They drive to the Sunset Bowling Alley, play three or four games and wind up at a drive-in for a strawberry milkshake which has to be so thick that you can turn it upside down, and it won't run out. Otherwise they send it back.

Not more than once a month they go out fancy. Alexis makes a four-thirty date at Westmore's to have her hair done. Not washed, since the studio takes care of that when she's working, and she's been working steadily in "The Constant Nymph" and "Gentleman Jim." So it's just combed and lacquered, pompadoured in front, swirled up behind. To keep the creation intact, her mother once had to rip the back seam of the dress she'd worn to the beauty parlor. Now she's careful to wear one that buttons down the front.

Then comes the production number of getting a shower cap on and off. With that, the worst is over, she's earned a rest, wraps herself in a robe and runs down to gab to her mother. "You'll be late, Alexis." "Oh no, there's loads of time." But suddenly there isn't, and the rest is a scramble, with tops left off jars and powder all over the bathroom.

Make-up in moderation. A base to hide the freckles. Rouge. Mascara and eyebrow pencil because she's very blonde, and if she didn't use them, she says, any resemblance to Alexis Smith of the movies would be purely coincidental. Most of her clothes are black—because there's nothing smarter, because it's most flattering to her, and because her only fur coat is a silver fox which looks best against black.

She wears little round pearl or rhinestone earrings and a small flat black velvet bow in her hair, unless the dress is too sophisticated. Since she can't afford real jewels, she'd rather have none, so buys clothes that don't need a lot of dressing up. Any perfume that's light. If the dress is new, she goes down to show herself off. In their old house, where she'd grown up among the neighbors, she had to be ready fifteen minutes ahead of time and go running around back fences and kitchen doors to give them all a look. She doesn't know the new neighbors well enough for that.

Craig's ring usually finds her at the dressing table, a blouse that's ready for the laundry over her slinky evening gown, fingers fussing with her hair. She runs down, forgetting her wrap and bag, runs back, changes things over from day to evening bag, grabs up her wrap and flies. Craig has a mystery gardenia for her shoulder. She can never remember which shoulder it goes on, so it won't be crushed while they're dancing. "The right," mother tells her for the hundredth time.

"Come home early," says Dad. "You're still a growing girl."

They go to the Players, where the atmosphere is restful and conducive to relaxed dining, order fruit cocktail, consommé, chef's salad, steak, french fries for her, baked potato for him, tea for her, coffee for him. The pie on the menu looks wonderful when they start out, but by the time they get there they settle for sherbet. There are plenty of windows, so the air never gets stuffy and the floor's never crowded. They dance between courses. The rumba's their favorite. Like Linda, they dance their appetites back and fill up on hamburgers and milk at a drive-in on their way home.

One night, what with tires and taxes, they decided to see how much fun they could have on how little money. Seventy-eight cents did it. Twenty-four apiece to hold hands in a fourth-run movie house, fifteen each for milkshakes. Nothing for laughs. The soft sweet night and the moon thrown in. As for what goes with such nights and such a moon, "Let's skip that," said Alexis. But you can't be sued for what you imagine.

WHAT'S NEW UNDER YOUR HAT

creation can also be had with a safety pin attachment for holding flowers, bows and—hooray!—hats, too, on your head. Pin one of these precious gadgets into your sailors and beanies, and put an end to that unhappy gesture of walking around with one hand clutching your head.

As to your hat—here are a few important don'ts. No pill-boxes with long bobs, please. And no cover-up hats with brims if your hair is short. No hat should hide all the hair that's under it. If you have a long narrow face, tilt your hat. Don't wear it perched on top. If you wear glasses—buy an off-the-face hat—and comb your hair up off the forehead.

Rosemary Lane has a word for the wise we'll pass on to you. She recommends as a good looks aid that you "learn to be your own hairdresser." Train yourself to take your hair-dos apart and put them back together again. You can't run to the beauty parlor every time a ringlet slips. Watch the operator while she is pinning your curls, and be your own repair shop. While you're dressing for a big date, dampen loose ends or wisps with lacquer, brilliantine, wave-set or what-have-you, turn 'em up on hair or bob pins, and leave them to dry while you go about other business.

One more rule, my chickadee . . . hands off your hair when you're out and around the town. Don't ever touch your comb while you are sipping a soda at the counter or meeting a friend on the corner. Do your hair right behind closed doors, and you won't have to do it out in the open for all the world to see.

"Married— to an Iceberg"

HOW A YOUNG WIFE OVERCAME THE "ONE NEGLECT" THAT OFTEN RUINS A MARRIAGE.

1. At first, we were the most romantic couple! Happy as larks. But little by little, Dick grew neglectful of me. I couldn't think why his love had cooled off so soon.

2. Then my nerves cracked, and Dick's uncle, who's a doctor, guessed the truth. "Poor child," he comforted me. "So often a devoted wife is guilty of this one neglect. She's careless about feminine hygiene (intimate personal cleanliness). Now if that's your case . . .". And understandingly, he set me straight.

3. He told me how, today, thousands of modern women use Lysol disinfectant for feminine cleanliness. "You see," he explained, "Lysol is a famous germicide. It cleanses thoroughly, and deodorizes, as well. Just follow the easy directions on the bottle—it won't harm sensitive vaginal tissues."

4. Today, I use Lysol disinfectant regularly for feminine hygiene. I'm thankful it's so inexpensive, so easy to use, too. But best of all, Dick's kisses aren't icy—not any more!

Check this with your Doctor

Lysol is NON-CAUSTIC—gentle and efficient in proper dilution. Contains no free alkali. It is not carbolic acid. EFFECTIVE—a powerful germicide, active in presence of organic matter (such as mucus, serum, etc.). SPREADING—Lysol solutions spread and thus virtually search out germs in deep crevices. ECONOMICAL—small bottle makes almost 4 gallons of solution for feminine hygiene. CLEANLY ODOR—disappears after use. LASTING—Lysol keeps full strength indefinitely no matter how often it is uncorked.

97's used by the little brown men were almost exact copies of our Ryans, so no major changes were necessary . . . Biggest problem was to locate five of these particular ships. Owners of the 10 known to be in this country were contacted, and five agreed to fly their ships to Salt Lake City, where the scenes were filmed . . . No accidents occurred. Residents of Utah were informed by radio to ignore planes with the insignia of the Rising Sun . . . Marine scenes were shot at Salton Sea, 250 feet below sea level, the lowest point on Continental United States. Because of climatic conditions, Cameraman Dyer had to lubricate his equipment with whale oil of low density . . . Dyer had the two large side doors of a giant DC-3 transport plane removed, so he could photograph the dogfight scenes . . . Every move had to be plotted with toy planes on a table top before shooting for the day could begin. The pilots and Dyer spent hours huddling around the blackboard, until every problem that might possibly arise was ironed out . . . During the bombardment of Wake Island, Filipinos, hired to portray Japs, "died" at the first sound of gun-fire. Nothing would induce them to keep advancing. Finally about 40 of the 150 agreed to act brave, but their hearts weren't in it—they felt they weren't really in character.

PRIDE OF THE YANKEES

He was gaunt then, incredibly weak and thin, on that July day in 1939 when 60,000 people jammed the Yankee Stadium to do him honor. There were tears in his eyes but, oddly, they were tears of happiness and, husky-voiced, he whispered into the microphone that he thought he was the luckiest person in the world—this man who knew he was going to die soon. New York roared its farewell to this son of its streets, the "Iron Man" of baseball, to the gentle-faced and great-hearted Lou Gehrig.

It was more than good-by to a baseball hero; at the end he had become a symbol. Not all the great and good Americans are in the history books; you can find them sometimes on farms, in factories—clerks, laborers, seamen, mechanics and baseball players. For there is a pattern in American life which can make the common man heroic beyond conquerors and dictators. In life and in death, Lou Gehrig was a symbol of that.

It's a simple story, and "Pride Of The Yankees" tells it lovingly and with a wealth of ordinary detail that was its flavor and meaning. The Gehrigs were just another family on the East Side of New York; Pa, who somehow could never keep a job very long; Ma, intensely proud and strong-willed; Lou, serious, a plugger, but still playing ball in the junk-littered lots on the street corners, hoarding the baseball player pictures that came with Sweet Caporal cigarettes.

Ma Gehrig saw her son through high school and into Columbia—on his way to being an engineer, an "educated" person like Uncle Otto whose gilt framed picture hung in the place of honor in the parlor as an incentive to young Lou. But fate and America had different plans for this chunky son of an immigrant family.

When a crisis arose, and the family needed money desperately for an operation for Ma, Lou turned to the one thing he knew well to earn the money—baseball. The rest of the story could have happened only here; for Lou went on, you know, to become a member of the Yankees, key man in the "murderers' row," setting incredible records, earning more money than the "educated" Uncle Otto had ever dreamed of.

But "Pride Of The Yankees" is more than a picture of a pattern of success. It's a love story, too, tender and great-hearted as the man who is its hero. It's the heart-warming story of Lou and Eleanor Gehrig, their meeting and marriage, their years together building a sweetly happy life. That part of the story is no hero's tale; it's almost too simple and ordinary to be dramatic. But because it is so simple, it touches depths beyond many a more high-flown romance.

Gary Cooper and Walter Brennan are teamed again in "Pride Of The Yankees"; Gary as Lou Gehrig and Brennan as a sports writer who was his intimate friend. Teresa Wright, whom you last saw in "Mrs. Miniver" and "The Little Foxes," got the coveted role of Eleanor Gehrig. Elsa Jannsen plays Lou's mother in a role beautifully drawn and detailed; Ludwig Stossel, his father. Dan Duryea, Virginia Gilmore, Ernie Adams and Hardie Albright round out the cast.

It's a Goldwyn production which means that the picture has been produced imaginatively and with all the craftsmanship that Hollywood can afford. "Pride Of The Yankees" is a picture full of the sweet flavor of life despite its tragic ending. Throughout there are scenes that will catch and hold your eyes and your heart. It's a picture for everyone and a fitting tribute to Lou Gehrig, baseball player, American and a man.—RKO.

P. S.

Samuel Goldwyn arranged the first showing of "Pride Of The Yankees" for Mrs. Gehrig alone. She emerged from the projection room with tears in her eyes and confessed she could hardly bear it the first few minutes the picture was on the screen. Gary Cooper was a fine actor, she told Goldwyn—had Lou's mannerisms and gestures exactly. Mrs. Gehrig also praised Teresa Wright (who is Mrs. G. in the picture), saying, "There isn't another actress in Hollywood who could have done as well" . . . Gary trained for the baseball sequences with Lefty O'Doul, former big-league slugger . . . Goldwyn pleaded with Irving Berlin via long distance phone for weeks before securing permission to use "Always." It's Berlin's favorite ballad, but he finally gave in . . . No one but Babe Ruth could play the Sultan of Swat, so the Bambino came out to the Coast especially for the picture. Mr. Goldwyn winces every time he thinks how much he had to pay the guy! . . . 110 sets were constructed for the film—18 more than were used in "Gone With the Wind" . . . Most complicated and expensive set was the duplication of the Chicago World's Fair. Two complete sound stages were used . . . Cooper wandered around for weeks before production began, talking to scripter Paul Gallico, practicing batting left-handed.

THE LOVES OF EDGAR ALLAN POE

Everybody knows Edgar Allan Poe whose Raven has been croaking "Nevermore" in the classrooms of America ever since that moody genius first put him on paper. But not everyone knows that his life story was as tragically romantic as the most delicate of his love lyrics. In a life, disappointing and poverty-stricken, he found his only brief, personal happiness in the love of his wife, Virginia.

Played against a background of the America of the eighteen hundreds, "The Loves of Edgar Allan Poe" parades some famous names across the screen; Washington Irving, Charles Dickens, Thomas Jefferson, Robert E. Lee appear briefly. The story swings upward from Richmond through New York, Philadelphia and Baltimore. It was a time when America was expanding her frontiers, rough, conscious of her power.

Against this drop of a teeming, hurrying world was played the bittersweet tragedy of Poe's life. In a treatment remarkably free of bunk, Hollywood tells the simple, direct facts of his life. It carries him from the wild days at the University of Virginia when he tried to adapt himself to the life around him by playing fast and loose with the world, piling up huge debts at poker, drinking, cursing and loving with the southern gentlemen who never understood him; it takes him to West Point where Poe, never meant to be a soldier, was bitterly unhappy and completely unfit for the life. And it brings him finally to the quiet all-consuming love of Virginia Clemm and tragedy of her early death.

It was a love story that was lived in all the back alleys of the great cities of the East. Tales, poems, editorials, criticisms flowed from his pen, never earning quite enough to keep them from the thin edge of poverty. He fought with his publishers, struggled against an unfair copyright law and tried to find a place for his genius and his talents. "The Raven," "Lenore," "Annabel Lee," the stories of mood and murder which have made his fame were sold for mere pennies.

"The Loves of Edgar Allan Poe" teams Linda Darnell as Virginia Clemm and John Shepperd as the poet; as an extra bonus, Shepperd reads several of Poe's poems during the picture. Virginia Gilmore, Jane Darwell, Mary Howard and Frank Conroy all carry important roles.

It's a curious coincidence that the same month should bring the "Moon and Sixpence" and the story of Edgar Allan Poe to the screen; for one is the story of an artist in paint and the other the story of an artist in words. The artist of "The Moon and Sixpence" flees the world; Poe stayed with it to the bitter end. And ultimately, neither of them was defeated, for their poems and pictures were immortal.—TCF.

P. S.

Director Harry Lachman was tempted to have his pet talking Minah bird flit through the picture croaking "Nevermore!" . . . Research brought to light the fact that Poe used his manuscripts in the same manner the modern man-about-town employs etchings . . . Release of the picture will undoubtedly stimulate a terrific sale of Poe's works . . . Arthur Caesar wrote additional dialogue for the script, characterized Poe as a "man who would walk up stairs to buy a suit with two pair of pants." Caesar is a student of Poe from 'way back, knows most of his poems by heart . . . John Shepperd (Poe) used to play parts at M-G-M under the name of Shepperd Strudwick. Though taller and heavier than Poe, Shepperd greatly resembles the famous writer . . . Linda Darnell gives her mother a present every time she makes a picture. This time it was a diamond ring . . . Director Lachman and his beautiful Chinese wife, Chia, own one of the most unusual shops in Beverly Hills featuring patio furniture designed by Mr. L. himself . . . Producer Bryan Foy got the idea for the film after a talk with Edgar Allan Poe, III, a lawyer who's a descendant of a collateral line of the Poe family . . . While the picture was in production, Linda broke her last material tie with Texas when she sold her house in Dallas. She had spent only 14 days there during the past four years . . . Note of irony: One of the scenes in the picture cost more than Poe made during his entire life!

FLYING TIGERS

Over the fabled Burma Road, that thin, winding strip of precious road, East meets West. They meet in the air, twisting over the jagged peaks and cliffs, machine guns spitting. Even before December seventh there was a group of American aviators flying over the life line, diving on the massed Japanese bombers, working with the Chinese Armies that fought and died, undefeated, on the battlefields below. They weren't a regular army group then; they were volunteers, gathered from everywhere —old China hands, transport pilots, youngsters who came across the Pacific from the states, former Army and Navy flyers, old timers who had learned flying by the seat of their pants. The A. V. G. —American Volunteer Group—the Flying Tigers.

Of their exploits Republic has fashioned a picture. Perhaps it leans too heavily on other and older air pictures, but the locale is new and the formula sure and effective. At Kutsing, air base for the Tigers, were gathered a tough and lean-figured group of pilots who took the air daily against overwhelming odds. They flew for money, for ideals, for China and some just for the hell of it.

You would have found there Jim Gordon, the squadron leader, slow-spoken, serious; Hap Davis, his eyes going bad; Blackie Bales, out to redeem himself; Alabama Smith, McCurdy, Tex Norton, Reardon, Dale. Some of them marked for death, some of them for glory—all of them itchy-fingered for the planes with the rising sun on their wings.

To Kutsing, too, comes Woody Jason, talking big, flying big; on the make for money and on the make for any skirt that crossed his path. The main current of the story follows the triangle between Jim Gordon, Woody and the lovely, efficient Red Cross nurse, Brooke Elliot. It had been Brooke and Jim until Woody turned up; Woody always ready for a good time when Jim was struggling with the paper work of a squadron leader. Woody with his gags and laughter where Jim was slow and serious. You couldn't really blame Brooke for falling a bit for his line; you couldn't really blame anybody, because it was a very good line.

Or perhaps you might blame Woody. For Woody had his eye out only for the number one man—Woody Jason. That might have been all right on the ground. But in the air, it meant death. It meant death for Blackie Bales when Woody failed to cover his tail, and it meant death for Hap Davis when Woody failed to turn up on time and Hap took his place.

It all works up to the climax of December seventh and a dangerous flight into enemy territory—a flight the group couldn't undertake; only a single plane. And in that single plane Jim and Woody find themselves dependent on one another. In the crisis Woody sends Jim to safety and carries through the assignment alone. He makes it back alive, too.

You'll find John Wayne as Jim Gordon; it's a good role for Wayne who's on his way slowly but surely to stardom. There's another Gary Cooper hidden there and coming up the same way, out of the horse operas and the quickies. John Carroll is the swashbuckling Woody Jason and Anna Lee plays Brooke Elliot. Paul Kelly, Gordon Jones and Edmund MacDonald have important roles; and don't miss Mae Clarke, returned to the screen in a minor role. It's an action picture with all the trimmings and the never failing excitement of wings slashing across the screen. —Rep.

P. S.

The six P-40 canvas-and-plywood planes built especially for the picture took a staff of workmen exactly six weeks to build. Perfect duplicates of the real thing, they're equipped with obsolete motors so they can do everything but take off. Every studio in Hollywood has put in a bid for their use, but Republic has them bedded down on the home lot surrounded by more guards than Fort Knox . . . Special scenes were shot at Curtiss Aircraft Co. in Buffalo. The United States Government gave the studio permission to film both aerial and ground scenes there . . . Outstanding in the cast of over 200 men is Anna Lee, the lovely blonde widow of "How Green Was My Valley" . . . Technical advisers were two honest-to-goodness members of the Flying Tigers—Ken Sanger, radio technician, and Larry Moore, who was staff secretary to Col. Chennault . . . Actor Gordon Jones has a brother serving as a Captain under General Joe Stillwell. Jones plays a pilot with the Group . . . Included in the picture are several thousand feet of film showing Jap planes in actual combat over Burma and China. Pictures were culled from Japanese propaganda files . . . The prop department made exact copies of the signs all "Flying Tigers" wear on their backs. The Chinese characters, translated, read "This American has come to the aid of the Chinese. He should be respected by all and by all persons of military rank." . . . Mae Clarke is used to playing in war pictures. Got her start in them starring in silent version of "Waterloo Bridge."

PIERRE OF THE PLAINS

What with tourist travel cut to the bone by transportation priorities, and vacations likely to be back-yard affairs in these days of war, "Pierre of the Plains" jaunts up to the Canadian Northwest to catch a few fish in the backwoods, away from the world and its worries. Maybe a few of the fish it catches aren't quite fresh, but the boys are in there casting away all the time.

It's a triangle story among the towering pines. Up there in the Northwest, Pierre, trapper and guide, is in love with Daisy Denton, but Daisy hasn't decided yet whether or not to marry a chap named Jap Durkin. Now you know and I know that no girl in her right mind is going to marry anybody named Jap these days. But it's a tight squeeze for a while before Daisy declares for Pierre and the Free French.

The whole thing is complicated by a murder and a couple of fights. A trader named Clerou is shot deader than a mackerel which somehow wandered up into that trout stream country, and Pierre has a tough reel or two setting things right. The chase takes him backwoods with a comedy tenderfoot and finally ends in a slam-bang fight near an abandoned mill.

Such first rate actors as John Carroll, Bruce Cabot and Ruth Hussey are involved in these shenanigans, and they are, reading from left to right, capable, handsome and beautiful. You'll find Henry Travers dropping a dry joke or two in his accustomed manner. It's a bit surprising to find the svelte and sophisticated Miss Hussey tussling with trout, but as was stated above this picture is strictly a vacation number.

"Pierre of the Plains" is a harmless double-biller, but this is no time for business as usual. They're not making any more pleasure cars in Detroit; out Hollywood way there are still plenty of Mrs. Minivers and Wake Islands waiting to be made. Entertaining, too. It may be a good idea to bring the single feature back; there are still Bingo and free dishes to fill out the bills.

As for Pierre, did we mention that he gets Daisy, who, you remember, is Ruth Hussey . . .

Ah, zat lucky Pierre!—M-G-M.

P. S.

Producer Edgar Selwyn was the original "Pierre" in the New York Stage version . . . John Carroll spent his free time at home, working in his Victory Garden, preparing one room of his house as an air raid shelter for the kids who go to school just 200 yards the other side of his property. He owns 1000 chickens; each one has a separate nest. Says John: "No egg for three days—fricassee" . . . the fight scene was saved for the last, so the ooys could really rough each other up. Both of them (Carroll and Cabot) rolled in and out of the river during the brawl without mishap, then nearly caught pneumonia doing a couple of scenes in a tank of warm water on a sound stage . . . Company went on location to Sonora, about 76 miles southeast of Sacramento . . . A special fish-hook had to be made for Evelyn Ankers—one that she could swing over her head and catch in her clothing with a minimum of practice . . . Between scenes, Cabot and Carroll kept on playing the game of gin rummy actually called for in the script . . . Jack MacVeigh is a former lawyer who walked out on his practice one day and enrolled at the Pasadena Community Playhouse. Studio execs saw him, gave him a swell break in the picture, made plans to pick up his option. Uncle Sam beat 'em to it, and Jack is now in the service of his country after a quick career.

TOMBSTONE

Richard Dix sets his jaw . . . lays his gun aside . . . and starts thinking. It's the era of sprawling western towns and two-gun racketeers, but Dix feels that "Tombstone" should be built with brains and fists, and then .22's. The yarn is based on true incidents taken directly from the yellowed tomes of Tucson and the filming is done in the piney outdoors of California and Arizona.—Par.

ICELAND—PRODUCTION

before beginning "Iceland," she long-distance-phoned ace publicity man Jack Cooper at the studio. The most popular number in the show, she told him, was a Hawaiian hula; how could they work it into a picture with an "Iceland" background? The next day an item appeared in the columns stating that Sonja would do one super-colossal number based on the dances of all the peoples our soldiers were pledged to defend—among them, of course, the Hula!

Funniest sight during production was a small, stocky muscular gent togged out in dainty tulle ruffled costume, pirouetting and twirling on the ice. He's Bert Clark, Sonja's "skate-in."

Most stars would complain, but loud, if the attention were taken away from them, even in comedy scenes. Not the Henie. "The better they are, the better I like it," she says. Besides, Sonja knows that when she steps out on the ice—well, that's all, brother!

The day the red line of Los Angeles' official thermometer zoomed to 99, the "Iceland" company was shooting scenes on the back lot. Sonja was trigged out in heavy Winter clothing, complete to a fur-lined hood. Johnny Payne had on a regulation uniform, coat collar turned up, and a 30-pound pack on his back. After a couple of hours, the final "take" was okayed. Henie made a quick dash for her dressing room, locked the door, and peeled off her costume. Payne strip-teased down to shirt and trousers, dived into the canvas wind-tunnel and yelled for the crew to turn it on full force.

"Lucky" Humberstone, fortified himself with another aspirin and made his way to the mouth of the tunnel.

"Will you please get out of there? You'll catch cold. Know what will happen then?" said Humberstone.

"You mean I'll die?" answered Payne, not budging.

"Die! Die!" screamed 'Lucky,' "Who said anything about dying? If you get pneumonia, you'll hold up the entire production and cost the company thousands of dollars!"

Quickies: Adeline de Walt Reynolds, who graduated at 70 from the University of California, is taking a course in shorthand and typing. Wants to answer her own fan mail, so she can urge folks to buy more War stamps and bonds. . . . Sonja's new skating partner is 20-year-old Eugene Turner, a local boy she saw skating at the Polar Palace. . . . Sterling Holloway averaged 20 hours of work per day, entertaining in a touring camp-show every night for the small units of soldiers stationed in the Hollywood hills; slept the other 4 if possible.

sunlight. "If you don't mind," he said, the Ford jaw beginning to show its lines. "I'd rather not be photographed just now. I'll be glad to pose for all the pictures you want if you'll come out to the studio tomorrow when I'm working."

"No can do," said the photographer. "Besides, I want to get you in uniform."

Glenn's forehead furrowed into that photogenic frown of his. "I'm darned sorry," he said, "but I've got a funny feeling about this uniform. See, my dad was in the diplomatic corps, and I know that if he were living now, he'd be sort of proud of my pitching into this thing without making a fuss. My work here is important to me, not as an actor, but as a person. I think it's corny for a guy to show off his patriotism. You see what I'm driving at?"

The reporter saw. Afterward he said to a friend of Glenn's, "Ford is okay. That is one guy without a drop of phony blood in his system."

mom's eye-view . . .

You just don't get phony around a mom like Mrs. Ford. "I really can't believe he's famous," she says. "To me he's still just a nice youngster with Sir Galahad manners and a healthy dose of Marx Brothers." He loves to charge into the house, swoop "Little One" (his name for his mother) up off her feet and carry her around under one arm. On the Sir Galahad side, he bought her a stunning Kolinsky coat—the last one in Beverly Hills—for which extravagance she's still scolding him in a tickled-to-pieces voice.

What's he like around the house, you pump her. She looks amazed that anyone should care; but he's like this.

When he's working, he rolls out at six, bright as brass, and eats a hearty breakfast. He can eat like a thresher without gaining weight. He puts on, after shorts and shirt, a burgundy tie—he never wears any other color—and burgundy socks. While he is dressing and eating breakfast, he keeps half an eye on his watch, a Longine—because he has a phobia about being late. He walked out on a governor who had promised him a job several years ago, simply because the governor was thirty minutes late for their appointment. The last thing he does before leaving the house is to brush his teeth—with paste, because powder makes him sneeze.

Mama Ford further divulges that his favorite beefs are hats in general, men who wear scarves and the high cost of dating in Hollywood. Seems that he took a girl to Ciro's not long ago for a sandwich and such. The check was $17.50, and his burning thought as he blasted a twenty was that he could have bought three complete symphonies with the dough. His extravagance never takes him to swank spots but to music stores or book shops. He owns about 175 albums of symphonies, and he has lost count of his reading library. "He's crazy about dogs and boats—and, well, he's really no different from most boys his age," says Mrs. Ford, not meaning a word of it, you can tell. She may think it, but there's none of this he-ought-to-be-president stuff out of her. That's Joan Crawford's line.

She probably knows Glenn better than any other girl in Hollywood, and when she gets talking about him, you wonder why the heck he doesn't axe his agent and put her on the payroll.

They have dinner together two or three times a week, sometimes at her house and sometimes in an inconspicuous booth back in the shadows at Dave Chasen's. When Joan reads a book she likes, like Paul Gallico's "The Snow Goose" or Mildred Cram's "Forever," she passes the story on to Glenn. He reads it, then they rehash it and spend hours casting the characters.

Occasionally they go to Mocambo, but they seldom dance. Joan may be the original dancing daughter, but Glenn rarely touches the stuff. "If a girl dances with me," he says, "she has to put up with a waltz or the Ford special."

"I've tried 'em both," grins Joan, "and now I've seen everything. Somehow, though, you don't hold those two left feet against him. He's such a spellbinder of a conversationalist, you can even sit out 'Jersey Bounce' without a pang. Whether he's telling you where he went for lunch or about his trip to Canada, he makes it sound like something out of Jules Verne."

That trip to Canada was pretty wonderful.

This spring, Glenn and his mother decided to return to Glenford and Port Neuf, where they used to live, for a visit. "When we pulled into the station," Glenn says, "there were about five thousand people milling around. And, drawn up at attention, was Father's World War I regiment. That hit hard. I looked at Mother, and she looked at me. Neither of us could choke out a word, but we were both thinking, 'If only he were here.'" Glenn's father died suddenly of a heart ailment in 1940.

After the gala reception, the Fords left the city of Quebec for Glenford in Quebec Province. There he rediscovered his own family. The aunts, uncles, cousins and great-greats of his line. He told Joan, "I found that we are very simple people."

his silent love . . .

It was in Canada that Glenn fell in love. He has never told anyone the girl's name, because she belongs to one of those aristocratic old families that wouldn't understand even the friendliest kind of American publicity.

And it was a love affair doomed from the beginning to a zero-zero ending. The girl was a member of the Canadian Woman's Auxiliary Army Corps, which lives in barracks and constitutes the clerical and nursing force of a regiment. Glenn told a close friend, when he returned, that he had asked her to marry him, but she had convinced him that, for the time being anyway, her place was with the army.

"So for the duration at least," he told

Joan (theirs is one of those rare boy-girl relationships where they can even discuss their romances), "I'll settle for my first love, the sea."

When he heard that his best friend, Bill Holden, was going into the service, he grinned from ear to ear, whammed him on the back and just as a matter of routine said, "Navy, of course—"

"Army," said Bill, giving him the wanta-make-something-of-it leer. Glenn did. They pro-ed and con-ed for hours and finally stalemated somewhere around dawn, not seeing eye to eye at all, but still swell friends. And when Bill left for his training a week or two later, something pretty important went out of Glenn's life. The night before he left, Glenn called him up, racking his brain as he dialed for something smooth in the way of good-bys.

"I just called up to caution you against trying to play the violin in an army show," Glenn said. This harkened back to the fact that Bill's first part was that of the prize-fighting, fiddling "Golden Boy," and that he had learned one piece of music rather shakily for the picture. Not too funny a crack, but Bill guffawed in that determinedly jolly way you do when you feel more like bawling.

"At least," he said, "the notes will be sweeter on land than on sea."

There was a long silence while each tried to think of something to postpone the good-by. "They feed you much better in the Navy," Glenn finally observed.

"Considering my stomach's objection to waves, it's continuity, not quality, that interests me," said Bill.

There was another pause. Glenn finally said desperately, "Take care of yourself, fella."

"Same to you," came back fervently from the Holden phone. "And keep an eye on Ardis, won't you?"

Ardis, of course, is Brenda Marshall Holden. Since Bill has been away, Glenn hasn't had a chance to do more than telephone occasionally, but when he is free, he'll see her only in a group. Reason: He profoundly distrusts the gossip mills in Hollywood. In rapid succession he has been reported that way about Jinx Falkenburg, Judy Canova, Carmen Miranda, Michele Morgan, Pat Morison, Patti McCarty, Laraine Day, Martha O'Driscoll and Evelyn Ankers.

false rumors . . .

"Boy, the gossips kept me hopping," Glenn told a Columbia publicity man. "No tête-a-têtes for Ardis and me. We'll get ourselves chaperoned by the Ray Millands or the Fred Macs or someone."

Next to the Holdens, they're about Glenn's greatest chums. When he spends a day with the MacMurrays, he and Fred talk sports or guns. They exchange rumors about the Springfield versus the Garand, and argue happily over who'll win the pennant this year.

With Ray Milland, Glenn discusses world affairs. Ray took his seventeen thousand dollars, inherited from a deceased relative, and went on a trip around the world in his pre-Hollywood days. He's been in almost every country where the war is going on.

Another pal of his is Pat O'Brien, with whom he usually talks pipes. Both of them have extensive collections (Glenn's now totals 140), and the latest addition to the Ford group was an O'Brien gift. This one consists of a bowl and stem carved out of an honest Irish shillalah.

There's a rugged look about it that goes with the rugged Ford puss. And the puss, incidentally, is the tip-off on the whole guy. He can take the bumps. No Model T, this Ford. He's strictly A1!

during blackouts. . . . That Greer Garson is an expert on wines? Learned all about vintages when she was a university student taking summer tours through France. . . . That Gypsy Rose Lee is an air-raid warden?

That Hattie McDaniel is an inspiring sight in her AWVS uniform. . . . That Flyin' Bob Taylor, too old to be a fighter pilot, will probably join the Ferry Command. . . . That Myrna Loy met new hubby, John Hertz, Jr., at a party she and ex-hubby Arthur Hornblow tossed several months ago?

Change of Hearts

Bang! With the expectancy of a Kansas tornado, came the startling announcement that Hedy Lamarr had returned her engagement ring to George Montgomery. Overnight, what had been the town's most idyllic romance, turned up its toes and died. The reason? Apparently no one knows, except Hedy—and she isn't telling.

As usual, there are plenty of rumors afloat. Most persistent is the whisper that the whole affair was nothing more than a high-powered publicity stunt. But this should be squelched by the fact that Hedy bought gobs of bridal linens and had each piece monogrammed with her were-to-be initials. Still another tale has it Hedy discovered George isn't the even-tempered lad he's cracked up to be.

But then, who knows? Perhaps it's nothing more than a lovers' spat, and by the time this gets into print the pair will be seeing heart to heart again!

Lord Louis Mountbatten

If Hollywood moguls are wise, they'll whip up a nice, juicy contract and wave it under the aristocratic nose of Lord Louis Mountbatten the minute this war is over. Even before he became the leader of Britain's dashing, heroic Commandos, Lord Mountbatten's handsome six-foot-plus had feminine hearts thumping throughout his native land.

As far as we know, Lord Louis has never had any commercial contact with the movie colony. However, he has known individual movie stars. Back in the twenties, he visited the United States with his beautiful wife, and at a public function watched approvingly, as his lady went through the contortions of the Charleston with Fred Astaire.

Not until the Mountbattens returned to England did they discover they were in disgrace. Queen Mary, three thousand miles away in Buckingham Palace, had heard of Lady Mountbatten's exhibition. And, expressing her disapproval of royalty who dances with movie stars, had had Lord Mountbatten barred from his swank Royal Yacht Squadron!

Every Knock a Boo

Maybe his unsuccessful wooing of Gene Tierney still rankles. Maybe he never liked

DO YOU KNOW THAT

Apollo-like Vic Mature discovered, through experimentation and interesting experience, that he looked most like what his publicity agents said he looked like when he was photographed standing next to wisp-like blonde maidens! Accordingly, in one year, he had himself spotlighted and photographed standing next to no less than eighty such wisp-like blonde maidens. Nice work, if you're qualified.

GOOD NEWS (Continued)

Hollywood anyway. But whatever the cause, when Richard Watts, Jr., New York drama critic, summed up the 1941-42 theatrical season, he couldn't resist taking a few swipes at Movietown and its personnel. Wrote Richard Watts in his paper:

Actor the season did best without: Victor Mature.

Film actress who is wisest to confine her acting to the screen: Bette Davis.

Sight I could least stand to see: George Raft in the Lee Tracy role in the movie version of "Broadway."

Mr. Watts paid Hollywood some left-handed compliments, too. Supplementing his barbs were the following:

Film actress this department admires despite its better judgment: Veronica Lake.

Film actress who would probably be most successful on the stage: Ida Lupino.

Comedian the season most missed: W. C. Fields.

Home Front

Jeanette MacDonald's in a dither over that story going the rounds about her quitting her career. Seems she's supposed to be trailing husband Gene Raymond, First Lieutenant in the Army Air Force Combat Command, the world over, wherever his job takes him! Started by a Southern newspaper who failed to check for confirmation, the tale was sent over the country's wire-service and caused no end of distress for poor Jeanette.

"On the contrary, I have no such idea. Now is the time for all women to stand by their jobs and work harder than ever to make those jobs count. With our men fighting for victory, the Victory front at home is every woman's responsibility. Our men expect us to shoulder that responsibility bravely!"

Since Gene's been in the service, Jeanette's spent every available moment between pictures, trotting to army camps and singing her head off for the boys. In Hollywood she's continuing her "Date-Leaves" entertainment, the same hospitality initiated by her and Gene last September.

Last we heard, Gene was in England, and Jeanette was playing a six weeks concert tour of the army camps in July and August.

Good News About Ray Middleton

There's usually at least one woman behind the success story of every man, but Ray Middleton has had so many to cope with he's not figuring 'em any more. We asked Ray just about how many times he'd been in love, and when he ran out of fingers he looked up dreamily and smiled that he'd

I SAW IT HAPPEN

In high school here in Los Angeles, Marie Wilson stole the show when she had one word to speak in the Senior play. Even that wasn't a real word. It was just "uh-huh." (She was the maid.) Everybody roared at the way she said it, and most of the boys and girls attended all three performances just to see Marie shake her giddy head, hear her utter her one "word," and bring down the house. Not one of us was surprised to see her name in lights about ten years later.

simply "lost count" . . . He did admit to having a secret crush on Greta Garbo, but for that woman-on-a-desert-island setup, Ray would choose the whole Ada Broadbent dancing troupe any day . . . Long before the present rush of events, he started a personal precedent by sticking to a rigid rehearsal routine . . . locking himself in his apartment and playing a game of "nobody's home" whenever the phone rang or the buzzer buzzed. Nevertheless, Fate and the famous Chicago Opera Company said him nay when he said "Please!" in 1930 . . . but both repented, and six years later Chicago was on the asking end of the line, and Ray finally consented to become their star attraction . . . In the same streak, he remembers his stage days in New York when frantic women fans almost mowed him down after every performance of the musical show "Roberta," in which he had the male lead, and another good scout, Fred MacMurray, was his understudy! 'Course Hollywood held out its arms pronto to Broadway's pet glammer singer, but when Ray saw the results of his first screen test, he felt like an ostrich just before it runs away and buries its head in the sand . . . The men on top disagreed, though, and sentenced Our Man Middleton to a long stretch of pleasing the public . . . It worked, too . . . fact is, one woman fan from the Middle West was so thrilled that she sent him a bow tie, asked him to pose in it for her . . . said her husband refused to wear them, claiming only sissies wore bow ties . . . and she wanted said husband to see how a real he-man looked in one of the darn things! . . . At present, as far as Ray's concerned, only rule for his unknown missus-to-be is, "Don't be a scat singer" . . . He doesn't care if she's a goddess or a G-girl, just so long as she's "poised, well-groomed and attractive" . . . she can smoke, if she wants, but she'll smoke alone, 'cause he lays off to keep his warbling channels clear. . . . In case you've been wondering what Ray Middleton's real name is, we'll let the secret out here and now—it's —s-s-sh—Ray Middleton.

he can count and with more variations than any other three words in the International Butlers' Language. It's all in the angle of the eyebrow, the dilation or lack of it in the nostrils, and the stiffness of the shoulders. Or so Alan Mowbray will have us believe. Though he's butlered some of our best heroes into background insignificance, Alan himself has never bothered with bright lights and fancy billings. He's thoroughly evasive about his love life, too . . . when questioned closely he withdraws quietly with, "Careful! I'm married!" . . . refuses even to commit himself on advice for future would-be missuses . . . tells us we should ask the missus . . . but he blossomed out when we asked him if he liked women who smoke, wear red nail polish, etc. . . . countering satisfactorily with, "I just like women." Sounds like an example of what Alan calls his worst stage habit . . . "Kidding during the show. I'm still trying to cure it," he fibs. How did he feel when he first saw himself on the screen, we wondered . . . his one-word answer, "Sick!" . . . may account for his not having seen himself on the screen for the past seven years . . . refuses to see his completed pictures . . . refuses in fact to gape at himself in the mirror before he starts work on one, doing his "rehearsing" strictly on the set as the cameras are about to take over. Seems to work, though. The most interesting fan letter Alan's ever received? "The first one!" he smiles back at us. Hopes some day to play the role of Cyrano de Bergerac, the 17th century ultra-schnozzled poet and would-be Romeo . . . which would take him out of the class into which he's fitted like he was born there . . . gentlemen's gentleman and all that . . . but Alan's not diddling his thumbs until that role comes along for him . . . life's too busy . . . and his favorite director is always waiting. Favorite director? "My next one," he jibed, "always my next one!" Any achievement that London-born 6-foot Alan is secretly proud of is completely overshadowed by his two greatest . . . a growing son and daughter, who are, after all, not entirely his own doing, ex-actress wife Lorayne Carpenter having had some say in the matter. The future for Alan Mowbray? All he wants in the future is to look like the person he thinks is the best looking guy around . . . you're right . . . it's his son!

Olivia Goes to Town

The war has caused Olivia de Havilland to do something long years of prosperity could not. It's made her move out of the Los Feliz home she's stubbornly clung to since the first day she arrived in Hollywood. For ages her boy friends have screamed about having to trek way out to the suburbs to fetch her for a date, but like Scarlett O'Hara, Livvy's refused to desert the old manse.

When her telephone stopped jingling a few months back, Olivia figured she was in for one of those no-date spells all girls go through. Then her best friend told her. Her beaux still loved her—but they loved their tires more. That was enough for Olivia. Fast as fire she hunted up a new house. Now she's quartered in the heart of town, blissfully justifying her title of Hollywood's Most Popular Bachelor Girl.

Meet Gene Krupa

Surprisingly the King of the Drums is not the slappy, swing-happy music man most people imagine. Of course he's no long hair. But neither does he spend his youth beating his brains out in jive-dive jam sessions.

Serious about his work, he once wrote a book on drumming that outsells every other tome of its type . . . When he lectured at the New York Museum of Natural History on the subject of primitive drums, museum authorities pronounced his talk one of the most learned ever delivered under their roof . . . He practices three hours daily on a specially-built rubber pad, keeping his hat on all the while to get the tune sound . . . Learned to write and eat with left hand so his left wrist will stay supple . . . He loves to play along with symphonic records.

Devours A. J. Cronin and Thomas Wolfe, but didn't learn to read music till a few years ago. In the old days with Red Nichols' band, he used to get the melody from the trombone player, one Glenn Miller, who'd play the tune to him during rehearsal . . . Yearns to play baseball but doesn't dare endanger his wrists. Contents himself listening to the Daphnis et Chloe Suite by his favorite composer, Ravel, and to Cosy Cole of the Duke Ellington crew, in his opinion, the top drummer in the business . . . Must eat five meals a day to keep his weight up . . . Benny Goodman used to pay him $500 weekly. As his own boss, he's made as much as $1000 nightly.

GOODBYE DANDRUFF

Don't let dandruff spoil your beauty! Keep your hair shining with natural life and color, antiseptically clean, AND COMPLETELY FREE OF DANDRUFF by using Fitch Shampoo regularly each week. GOOD NEWS (Continued)

Strictly Dishonorable

There's a tall, handsome Hollywood leading man whose career story could well be titled Portrait of A Heel. Fourteen months ago, said leading man was just another small name on the studio payroll. Today, thanks to his shrewd maneuvering of romances with leading glamour girls, he's one of the most important stars in the business!

His practice of "using" famous women as stepladders to fame first attracted notice when he fell into the habit of lunching at two different studios with two different stars, on the same day. Instead of concealing his double-timing, he encouraged reporters to publicize both dates!

Later, he went after and wooed another top feminine star who was so bewitched, she made him her leading man. After brushing that romance out of his life, he launched himself on another amour. This time he became engaged, to the accompaniment of reams of publicity in every newspaper and magazine in the country.

When he grew too possessive, even to the point of charging items to his fiancée's department store accounts, the girl faced the bitter truth. She returned his ring—but at his request!

His most recent leading lady (who happens to be happily married) can't understand it all. Why, she asks, do glamorous beauties, who have known every type of man, let themselves in for broken hearts at the hands of this particular punk?

"It's their own fault," she charges. "They should realize that anyone who kisses the way he does can't be a gentleman!"

I SAW IT HAPPEN

One of my school teachers went to the University of North Carolina with Kay Kyser. It was just after Kay had started his small college band which played for dances, etc. His teachers had warned him that if he didn't get to work and improve his grades, he would be forced to give up his band.

Kay was a favorite among all of the students, so that night before his final exams, the students got him into a room and crammed into him everything he needed to know. The next day he passed the exams with flying colors. He's really a swell guy, and I appreciate his being a fellow North Carolinian very much.

Without Painful Backache

Many sufferers relieve nagging backache quickly, once they discover that the real cause of their trouble may be tired kidneys.

The kidneys are Nature's chief way of taking the excess acids and waste out of the blood. They help most people pass about 3 pints a day.

When disorder of kidney function permits poisonous matter to remain in your blood, it may cause nagging backache, rheumatic pains, leg pains, loss of pep and energy, getting up nights, swelling, puffiness under the eyes, headaches and dizziness. Frequent or scanty passages with smarting and burning sometimes shows there is something wrong with your kidneys or bladder.

Don't wait! Ask your druggist for Doan's Pills, used successfully by millions for over 40 years. They give happy relief and will help the 15 miles of kidney tubes flush out poisonous waste from your blood. Get Doan's Pills.

Hayes Fever

Jeffrey Lynn's a busy boy in Uncle Sam's Army so we don't think he'll have much time to brood over the sudden elopement of girl friend, Margaret Hayes, with Tarzan-hulked, Leif Erikson. Just in case Maggie couldn't squeeze all the details of her romance into the wire she sent Jeffrey, here for his information is the story of how it happened.

Maggie went to the movies one night and in the middle of the picture got to sneezing. Leif, sitting behind her, tore out of the theater and was back in a flash with an aspirin tablet and a cup of water. When Maggie recovered, Leif introduced himself and returned to his seat. Next day, Maggie got to thinking about what a nice guy he was and wrote him a note of thanks. That was the beginning. Two weeks later Leif was in Reno dissolving his marriage to Frances Farmer, and six weeks after that, he and Margaret met in Minden, Nev. and were wed.

From our agents in the East, we hear that Jeffrey, far from being the jilted suitor, is spending his leaves very happily in the company of a New York thrush named Rosalie Gibson. Only thing that burns him, according to our informant, is the fact that Maggie eloped in his station wagon!

Lonely Cinderella

Here's a story that's never been told. The story of a beautiful little girl who came to Hollywood and rose to be a great big movie star. At her studio she was treated like an adult. At home she was treated like a child. Her parents, hoping to shield her from the wolves of the town, sternly restricted her dates. When suitors refused to be discouraged, they invented the tale that their daughter was engaged to a childhood sweetheart, living in faraway Mexico.

The ruse worked. It kept the wolves away. But as the girl grew older she realized something else. It was keeping the nice boys away, also—the boys she wanted to date. She asked her family to deny the whole story or to announce that the engagement had been broken. But the parental thumb was down. The family refused and the deception continued.

Recently the star left home. Behind her she left the shackles she felt deprived her of normal womanhood. Now she will live alone and be free. In confiding her story to a few friends, she asked that they try to understand her parents' viewpoint as well as her own. "I love them," she says, "but I have my own life to lead." Okay, Linda Darnell. We hope it will be a happy one!

"Amateur" Night

The big moment in Sammy Kaye's night-spot floor show always occurs when Sammy steps to the mike and announces his sensational feature, "So You Want To Lead A Band." Repressed baton-wavers leap from every corner of the audience, clamoring for the privilege of holding the stick over Sammy's boys. The results are generally brutal, but everyone has fun.

The other evening Sammy stepped to his mike as usual, and had hardly completed his speech when a huge man lumbered up and demanded to be first. Sammy obligingly relinquished his baton and waited. Two minutes later he was plugging his ears.

The next night the big man was back. "And do you know who he was?" asks Sammy. "Otto Klemperer, the symphony conductor! He apologized for his bad performance and told me he'd been practising all day. Then he begged me for another chance!"

Follow the Leader

Speaking of Sammy Kaye—he and producer William LeBaron are developing an idea that may give you and you and you a chance to get into the movies!

Sammy told LeBaron about "So You Want To Lead A Band," and the producer liked it so well he's going to use it as the basis of a picture. Sammy will act as unofficial casting director and, in his next swing around the country, will be on the lookout for boys and girls with special talents who will be brought to Hollywood to appear in the picture with him. So—be on the lookout for Sammy!

HIGHLIGHTS ON HAIR BEAUTY

helpful hints . . .

Your hair beauty starts where your hair does—at the scalp. Invigorate and loosen it by frequent massage. Pinching is a dandy toner-upper. Grasp a sizable portion between thumb and forefinger, and pinch for all you're worth all over your head. With all ten fingers, knead until your head tingles. This nourishes the countless little hair cells from which new hairs grow and helps oil glands to function properly.

It's the wise lassie who doesn't let her old permanent run out to the very end before having a new one. These busy days leave little time for a nightly "put-up" job. Don't bargain hunt for your permanent. Once you have it you can't send it back. It's yours to keep until you outgrow it. Go to a reliable shop that has a reputation to uphold and have several test curls so you'll know in advance how your hair will look.

You launder your undies and wash your face when they need it, and we're of the school that says treat your hair the same. Oily hair tends to soil quickest because oil is a magnet for dust and dirt. Shampoo with a special oily-hair cleanser at least once a week—even twice weekly when you want to be especially glamour-ful and posy-fresh. In between shampoos, oily hair can be cleansed and refreshed by rubbing a drying tonic over scalp and hair with a bit of cotton or an inexpensive toothbrush. Wipe with a towel or cleansing tissue and both tonic and excess hair oil will disappear! With a little practice at this waterless cleanser, you'll always have your hair looking shampoo-fresh.

bring out the brush . . .

Oily hair is in dire need of brush exercise, for over-oiliness shows an unhealthy condition. Brushing stimulates circulation, makes the hair and scalp vibrantly lovely and helps remove daily accumulated dust and excess oil. Along with brushing, massage a corrective tonic into the scalp at least three times a week. Part the hair into sections, apply tonic, massage well. Then press waves back in place, don curlers or bob pins and a hair net—you'll be all set for the night. Simple?

If you have dry hair, you, too, must brush, brush, brush! Daily, at least—more often, if possible. Dry skin needs rich softening emollients and dry scalps do, too. Before you shampoo your dry brittle tresses, give them a hot oil treatment. For best results do it the night before. This lubricates every follicle of hair and makes your topknot gleam and glisten. When you wash off the oil, dunk your hair first in cold water. Then proceed with your shampoo, and you'll be surprised how easily it lathers in spite of the oil in your hair. After every shampoo, and often in between, spray or smooth on brilliantine— It's a perfectly wonderful hair-shiner and helps your coif keep its well-groomed appearance.

Dandruff is a mean old beauty-stealer. Those bothersome little flecks can deglamorize the loveliest hair style (the prettiest costume, too). Send them scampering away! Massage with a dandruff tonic nightly and wash with a special dandruff remover shampoo. If your hair and scalp don't respond to your own home treatment, consult a reliable hair specialist or dermatologist to help overcome the trouble.

A final touch for glamour is a vegetable rinse to pep up your hair to a brighter, more flattering shade. Rinses merely coat the surface and won't harm the texture. In fact, many have extra nutritional value. Their ingredients also help cut any remaining vestige of soap and make your hair behave better and set easier.

There ought to be a law against curling sopping wet hair in tight little rings and leaving it that way to dry. Before hair is set, it should be aired and exercised. Rub it briskly with a big fluffy towel for several minutes. Remove tangles and snarls with brush and comb (we hope you haven't forgotten to clean them thoroughly, too—if you have, it's not too late to do it now). Then shake your hair and let it become at least partly dry—in the open air or sunshine, if possible—before you get busy with hair and bob pins.

You probably know that your general condition affects the quality of your hair. If your system lacks proper nourishment, your hair will be dull and lifeless. After an illness, particularly, it craves reconditioning, for a systematic upset tends to hamper hair growth. Eat the proper foods, drink plenty of water and fruit juices. These are important to make hair the "thrilling-to-touch" kind.

Follow the rules faithfully . . . Don your perky hat, your festive flowers or gaily-colored bows — with a shining foundation of lustrous, gleaming tresses, and you'll be the belle of that USO dance you're planning to attend.

* * *

Fitch's Hair Pomade is a new product introduced by an old and reliable company. It gives your coif a healthy, lustrous look, and at the same time is beneficial to dry hair and prevents brittleness. To overcome the effects of summer sun or a frizzy permanent, massage Fitch's Hair Pomade into your scalp at night or whenever you want your tresses to look especially smooth and glamorous.

* * *

For a truly successful permanent, treat yourself to a Turbanwav. This modern curling method leaves hair soft and flexible, and is especially kind to dyed, bleached or mistreated locks. Turbanwav does its job with no discomfort, no heat and no machinery. A fashion-bright turban covers the feather-light gadgets that miraculously give you a wave at the same time you are doing your marketing, meeting a friend for lunch or attending your First Aid class.

"Glamor-Girl, You're Kissing Your Career Good-bye—

LIBRARY OF CONGRESS
MOTION PICTURE SOUND RECORD RECEIVED
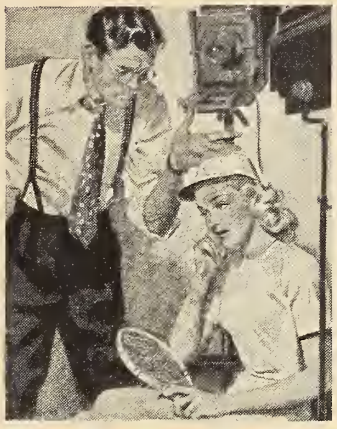
SEP 8 1942

There's no future in a smile that ignores 'Pink Tooth Brush'!"



"It doesn't make sense, Lady! With your looks, you're a natural for the Magazine-Girl-Of-The-Year—and what happens! 'Pink tooth brush' puts your smile in shrouds. It's oblivion for you unless you do something about that dingy smile!"

"Look at the glamor girls in any magazine. Their bright, sparkling smiles spell charm! And that's the kind of smile you can check up to healthy gums as well as sparkling teeth. I'm making your next booking—with the dentist!"

"Young lady, sparkling smiles depend largely on firm, healthy gums. And today's soft foods rob gums of natural exercise. They need more work." (Note: A recent survey shows dentists prefer Ipana for personal use 2 to 1 over any other dentifrice.)

"That photographer really was my friend! Ipana and massage each day—brighter teeth already—sparkling smile on the way! And when I massage my gums that stimulating 'tingle' seems to say, 'Your smile will soon be a picture for any magazine!'"

And sure enough, there came a day—

"O.K. Mr. Camera Man. Now let's see if you can really do justice to my sparkling new smile. And orchids to you and that dentist of mine for helping me win the honor of Magazine-Girl-Of-The-Year. Yes, and a great big credit line to Ipana Tooth Paste and massage. Without that beauty treatment for my smile, I might have been minus a career."

Help keep gums firmer, teeth brighter, smiles more sparkling with Ipana and Massage!

"PINK" on your tooth brush calls for immediate action. It means —see your dentist at once.

He may tell you our soft, creamy foods have denied your gums the natural exercise they need for healthy firmness. And, like many dentists, he may suggest "the helpful stimulation of Ipana and massage."

For Ipana Tooth Paste is specially designed, not only to clean teeth thoroughly but, with massage, to help make gums firmer, stronger.

Each time you brush your teeth, massage a little Ipana onto your gums. That invigorating "tang"—exclusive with Ipana and massage—tells you that circulation is speeding up within the gum tissues—helping gums to healthier firmness.

Let the regular use of Ipana and massage help you to have a lovelier, more appealing smile through healthier gums and brighter teeth.

The greatest star of the screen!

We're hearing on all sides that the motion picture industry is doing a great job—producing marvelous training films, morale films; the theatres are selling stamps and bonds day and night and the stars are everlastingly on tour or on the air.

★ ★ ★ ★

Meanwhile in the Metro-Goldwyn-Mayer corner two feature films have bobbed their heads up with considerable bob. Like Tennyson's brook "Mrs. Miniver" goes on forever. The other picture deals with another "Mrs".

★ ★ ★ ★

It is "The War Against Mrs. Hadley". This tale of a Washington diehard has already captured its early audiences. It brings a lump of laughter to the throat. A lump of laughter is the kind with a tear in it.

★ ★ ★ ★

The "ten-best picture" game, started with "Mrs. Miniver", spread quickly to the four corners of all newspapers. If the game was a strain on you, we are afraid you're in for more of the same. For "Random Harvest" is coming (advt.).

★ ★ ★ ★

"Random Harvest", as you all-knowing readers know, is the best-selling novel by James Hilton. The James Hilton. The Goodbye Mr. Chips James Hilton, the Lost Horizon James Hilton.

★ ★ ★ ★

But above all, the Random Harvest James Hilton.

Ronald Colman, Greer Garson—Random Harvest stars. Mervyn LeRoy, R. H. Director. Sidney Franklin, R. H. Producer.

★ ★ ★ ★

In a column entitled "Picture of The Month" which runs in Good Housekeeping, McCall's, Woman's Home Companion, Collier's and Newsweek, "Seven Sweethearts" is the choice.

★ ★ ★ ★

Many are screened but few are chosen. Congratulations "Seven Sweethearts". And Metro-Goldwyn-Mayer for thus bringing to the fore three promising stars in Kathryn Grayson, Van Heflin and Marsha Hunt.

★ ★ ★ ★

I'm head over heels with joy at the crop of new films coming.

Wobbly Prince

Bambi

"Flower"

It took them five years to come out of the woods with "Bambi," and the wonder is that they came out at all. For Bambi's forest ranks with Shangri-la and the other hidden paradises of this sad world; having found the place, the wonder is that the Disney Studios didn't move to it lock, stock and barrel and disappear forever and live happily ever after.

"Bambi" is pure Disney. There's not a Prince or a Witch, not even a Dwarf on the scene; the male animal is put in his proper place—in the audience. And from your seat in the theater you can look enviously on a world delightful, natural and real as only Disney can create. If, before the final fadeout, you find yourself wishing you were born a deer, a rabbit or even a skunk, that's only fair tribute to the Disney magic.

There used to be a rhyme about what little girls are made of; they were made, it said, of sugar and spice and everything nice. But the little girls will have to take a back seat now that Disney's here. "Bambi" is made of trees and flowers, birds and meadows, the sun in the morning and the moon at night. It's made of snow and rain, clover and grass. That's what "Bambi's" made of.

Does it sound dull? Ah, you don't know Disney. For there isn't a moment of it that doesn't charm the eye and soothe the ear. It's full of Disney's daily miracles of small details; a daisy from Disney's hand will make you forget Lana Turner; a twist of the brush is good for a belly laugh worthy of Chaplin himself. Dull? They evolved eyes back in the days when the world was still evoluting, because someone had a suspicion Disney was coming.

Nor is "Bambi" all just a woodland idyll. It's freighted with suspense and drama, and I suspect it may be the love story of the year. The world of Bambi, the deer, and Thumper, the rabbit, and Flower, the skunk, is an enchanted world; but it's real for all of that. The summer lightning plays like a gigantic spotlight among the tree-trunks; and winter is a time of sleet and ice. More, there's a full-dyed villain: Man. Strictly speaking, as noted above, man doesn't appear on the screen. He's characterized by a short, ugly, realistic device; the sound of his guns.

"Bambi" is the story of a year in the forest; it follows Bambi from birth to maturity, from fawn to buck. Bambi was Prince of the forest, but a Prince at first without much dignity. As Thumper, the rabbit, remarks irreverently on first seeing him: "Kind of wobbly, ain't he?" Kind of wobbly he was, too; and bewildered. Just when he had a couple of things down pat, birds, say, or flowers, what should turn up in a bed of violets but a skunk. And Bambi grinned and was sure he knew just what it was and said: "Flower."

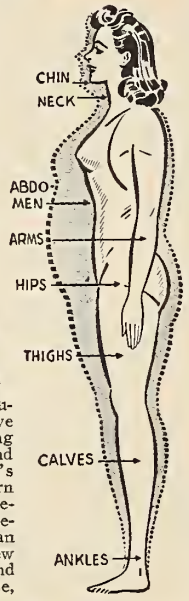
He learns, though. He learns about the meadow—a dangerous place, far too open and flat. He meets the bucks, thundering through the forest, (Continued on page 8)

REDUCE FAT

Pounds Off Hips, Etc.

No Danger

Science now shows that most fat people don't have to remain overweight any longer. Except a comparatively few cases, every one of these thousands of persons can now reduce quickly and safely — without unwarranted exercise, discomfort or diets.



Something New Safe, Easy, Quick

Are you one of these thousands, most of whom have tried to reduce by following food fads, menus, etc. — and failed? If you are, here's something new, what modern science has discovered on reducing foods, drugs and devices. Here's how you can reduce scientifically, with new health and attractiveness—and without unnecessary exercise, dieting, massage, etc.

making incredible bounds and leaps; and he meets the magnificent stag who is his father. He learns about food and water, and the safe runs of the forest. And he learns about women.

For there is one in the picture, of course: Faline, the doe. He falls in a pond the first time he meets her and like any self-respecting male he just glares and chalks it up to experience. But he's a year older, the second time he meets her; older, wiser, sadder and no longer a spotted fawn but a buck sprouting antlers.

And "twitterpated."

You'll have to talk to Friend Owl for an exact definition of "twitterpation." It's got something to do with spring and a young buck's fancy. It leads Thumper, straight as an arrow, to a Lady Thumper and it sends Flower skittering down the landscape, for all things like a love-sick skunk. And it leads Bambi to Faline.

Building from there with steady intensity, the picture follows the adult life of Bambi. Faline is his but he must fight to claim her. And he must fight again to save her when the hunting dogs come on her trail and corner her against the rocks. In the roaring climax of a forest fire Bambi and Faline flee to final safety. When Spring returns again to the forest, he takes his place as the Great Prince, guarding Faline and the new Prince who, like he once was, is "kind of wobbly."

Technically, the picture is not quite perfect. There are times when the color and the line are not what we've come to expect of Disney. But Bambi was five years in the making, and some of it was surely done before other Disney releases. And don't let that spoil the fun. For Bambi is the best of Disney in spirit and touch.

Don't miss the great scene of the bucks fighting in the dimly lit woods; or the twitterpation sequence, sharply observed and hilarious. The music, as in all Disney productions, is enchanting, brightly melodic and a constant counterpoint to the action. Thumper, Flower and Friend Owl are worthy to stand beside Mickey, Pluto and Dumbo. The smaller animals, as a matter of fact, are each and every one a joy from the blue birds to the chipmunks. Bambi, of course, is in a class by himself.—RKO.

P. S.

Studio workers ditched their jobs the day the two tiny deer models arrived from Maine. Everyone gathered around the specially built pens, and those standing too close lost coat buttons and dress ornaments to the hungry little animals. Their regular diet was goat milk, limewater and a little fresh fruit, but they ate anything they could get. . . . Thousands of feet of film and hundreds of stills were shot for study by the animators. Toughest problem was making the animals move convincingly. Bone structure and muscle placement had to be studied. Furry bunnies have well-covered anatomy, but the minute a deer moves, his skeleton is visible under the tightly drawn skin. . . . Disney first began thinking about "Bambi" in 1936, but didn't actually assign writers to develop the story 'til 1938. . . . Director Sidney Franklin owned the screen rights and at one time wanted to produce the story himself. Disney finally convinced him that the cartoon medium only could do justice to Felix Salten's beloved story. . . . The picture became the pet project of everyone working at Disney. Those actually at work on "Bambi" were constantly being kidded by their fellow-animators, who were busy turning out "Pinocchio" "Fantasia" and "Dumbo" and used to find cartoons left on their desks, showing old men with long beards, still working on "Bambi." . . . Disney gave the film a special preview, inviting 700 young people between the ages of 18 and 26. The response was so overwhelmingly favorable, Disney discovered he had turned out a perfect picture "for young people in love!"

MY SISTER EILEEN

Eileen's sister happens to be a gal named Ruth. Ruth is level-headed, pretty enough, hard-working, ambitious, thrifty and talented. Eileen is—well, Eileen.

Eileen had a bus driver go three blocks out of his way to pick her up. Eileen got prime salmon and potato salads from the manager of the lunch counter in the local drugstore. Eileen had a cynical Manhattan newspaperman make passes at her and then matched it up with passes from a Greenwich Village janitor-artist. Eileen had six Portuguese merchant marine cadets chase her through the front door and out the back. And all Eileen did was smile occasionally.

Adapted from the Broadway success that had New York audiences rolling in the aisles for a year or so, "My Sister Eileen" is a scatterbrained story of the local gals who come to the big town to make good. The stage version was hilarious and paced fast as Whirlaway on a good day. The screen adaptation follows the play faithfully and adds a few furbelows of its own.

The Sherwood sisters, Eileen and Ruth, are the belles of Columbus, Ohio. Looking for greener pastures, they hit on New York—Eileen for a stage career, Ruth for one in writing. Arriving in the big town, their first worry is for a cheap place to live. And they land eventually, not in Brooklyn, but in Greenwich Village. Their apartment is one of those cellar arrangements with a window opening on the sidewalk and impressionistic blobs on the ceiling. Regularly there is a thumping sound; that's the blasting for the subway they're building just under the foundation.

They find the big town a little less than enthusiastic to welcome their talents but more than willing to make a play for Eileen, who attracts men like a moth and a flame. They find life in the village a little bewildering. Strange men wander in and out of their apartment; their janitor is a thwarted genius of the canvas; the man upstairs practices football in the backyard and does the washing and ironing for his wife who works to support his pleasant existence. The Sherwood sisters didn't make any money, but they certainly had a lot of fun.

They do, finally, achieve a modicum of success. At least Ruth does. She gets some of her pieces into a magazine called "The Manhatter" and some of her charm attracts Tommy Baker, the editor of the magazine. She's doing fine until Eileen sees Tommy and then it's one long, mad, merry chase to final fadeout and clinch. Ruth gets her man; Eileen gets the other three million four hundred and eighty-six thousand men in New York.

Rosalind Russell plays the part of the long suffering Ruth with Brian Aherne as the magazine editor love interest. Janet Blair is the beauteous Eileen. Allyn Joslyn, George Tobias and Gordon Jones act the slightly addled admirers of Eileen and her Village apartment. The Portuguese cadets are by courtesy of a conga line.—Col.

P. S.

Roz Russell, impressed by cinema sister Janet Blair's ability, insisted their names get equal billing as stars of the film! . . . The main apartment set was built on rockers and wiggled wildly back and forth by crew members during dynamite sequences. Five copies of each "prop" were made as extras in case of breakage . . . George Tobias slowed up proceedings in the Ladies' Make-Up Dept. every day he worked. Gal hairdressers had to curl and adjust the special hair-piece he wears—a full one-hour job . . . Xavier Cugat came over from the set of the Rita Hayworth-Fred Astaire picture to teach the "Eileen" cast the latest in Conga kicks . . . Director Al Hall has a standing order with a local confectioner to whip up birthday cakes on a few hours' notice. He celebrates every natal day that comes along during production. Score on this one: 14, including Miss Russell's . . . Brand-new-movie-actress Jeff Donnell was born in a Boys' Reformatory at South Windham, Maine. Her papa was superintendent there . . . Richard Quine and Gordon Jones, both of the original stage play, wangled their current movie commitments so they could repeat their roles for the Columbia version . . . 11 players left to join the service the minute they finished their parts in the picture . . . Max Gordon, producer of both stage and screen "Eileens," thinks the movie will be much funnier than the play. Bases his opinion on the fact that close-ups of players' reactions to gags—possible only in the film medium—makes for stronger comedy.

GIRL TROUBLE

There's a honey of an apartment on the market just now, in case you're interested. Rent—$500 a month. That, of course, rules out ribbon clerks and average guys. Matter of fact it rules out practically anyone except North American millionaires and South American rubber magnates.

It's the South American rubber magnate that gets the apartment in "Girl Trouble." And besides the apartment he gets June Delaney (Joan Bennett) as the maid of all work. Don Pedro (Don Ameche) doesn't know that the apartment once belonged to June herself; the war froze her English securities, and June put the apartment on the block.

June burns the toast and scalds the coffee. Not only that, she fails to wake him up for an important business appointment. To top it all, she hands over his best suit of dress clothes to a war charity. As a maid, June is strictly a girl with pretty ankles.

Well, ankles are something and truth to tell, Don Pedro finds himself no little attracted by the girl who's wearing them. For her part, June decided from the very first that Don Pedro was the man for her. But things are a little complicated by social registerite Helen Martin (Helen Reynolds) who also has an eye for South American security. And June, after all, is only the maid. To make things worse, Helen knows that June is masquerading and threatens to spill the beans if June queers things.

But love will out, and one night Don Pedro corners June for a date. They make the rounds of the town's dance palaces, cut a few rugs, have themselves a time and then end up on the balcony of the five-hundred-dollar a month apartment. There's only one way to end a night like that. Don Pedro kisses his maid good-night.

DANDRUFF HAD ME WILD!

My wedding day was only a week away! And my hair hung dull—lifeless—and worst of all, thickly sprinkled with ugly dandruff! I was frantic! Then on Sunday evening, I heard the Fitch Bandwagon* over the radio. The announcer said, "Fitch Shampoo is sold under a money-back guarantee to remove dandruff with the first application. This guarantee is backed by one of the world's largest insurance firms." I bought a bottle of Fitch Shampoo that night. I found that even in hard water it is effective. It really goes into the tiny openings of the scalp. And it certainly rinses out easily! I believe it actually reconditions the hair! "The season's loveliest bride!" they said of me. And today, my husband says Fitch Shampoo keeps my hair as lovely now as it was the day we were married!

Meanwhile the rubber deal he has been promoting has not been going at all well. The Flint Rubber Co. (Frank Craven) just isn't interested. Mr. Flint is more interested in antique guns and war trophies than he is in Don Pedro's rubber plantations.

And what do you think June has locked up in an old trunk? Nothing else but a priceless antique blunderbuss, which is a weapon of war men used before they got around to tanks and dive bombers. That's June's ace in the hole. And before the picture's over, she needs it. For Helen finds out about June's romance with Don Pedro and tells her little story. She accuses June of queering the rubber deal for her own interests. Seems June owns a guayule ranch out in Arizona and next to natural rubber, guayule is the thing.

Out comes the blunderbuss. But June doesn't use it to shoot Helen. Instead she carts it down to Flint and passes it under his nose a couple of times. Flint lights up like a neon sign when he sees it. But June isn't selling unless Flint meets her terms. And her terms, what with love and everything, are that Flint go through with his deal with Don Pedro. So Flint gets his gun, Don Pedro does business and June wins Don Pedro. With the rubber money all in the family by then, June can afford to hire a maid. Which solves everything, all around.—20th-Fox.

P. S.

Don Ameche's toughest chore was denying rumors he was moving to the Middle West. Received wires from hotels, saying his reservations were all taken care of, and when did he plan to send his baggage on? Newspaper clippings poured in, speculating on the probable choice of land he'd make when he settled in Oklahoma. Representatives haunted the set, wanting to know how much he'd take for his Hollywood "farm." It was no gag. Just one of those things . . . Joan Bennett has always refused to do scenes reclining on a couch. Insisted a woman in full-length profile doesn't look attractive on the screen, (horizontally, she meant). Director Schuster persuaded her to try one scene that way, and Joan was so pleased, she had three more written into the script . . . Whiskey, the dog, is known as "One-Take" Whiskey. Replaced a Great Dane, who didn't seem to have a feeling for the cinematic art. "Whiskey" pays an enormous income tax, lives luxuriously in a special home built for him by his owner, trainer Carl Spitz . . . Joan had to do so many scenes in bed, she ordered her own triple-mattress job brought from home. Felt she could emote better in familiar surroundings. Only drawback was going home at night and bunking in the guest room (one mattress less) . . . Dave Anderson was the man in charge of stars (sky ones, that is). Has to work hard to keep them from looking phony, especially if they have to have a moon alongside.

ORCHESTRA WIVES

The next time you're out dancing to the sweet strains of a big name orchestra, give a thought to the girl who married the trumpet player. You're out front in your best bib and tucker, hep to the jive, cutting a rug and out of this world. She's probably home reading a good book and wondering why she ever married a man who made music.

Or else, as per "Orchestra Wives," she's cutting a few touches with the wives of the first trombone, the bull fiddle and the drums. The first trombone, for some reason, is catty and carries enough gossip around to equip three or four back fences for the summer. The gossip, needless to say, is about the saxophone's husband or some other instrument not then present. Throw all these wives together on a band tour, and you've enough material for a movie.

Connie Ward (Ann Rutherford) was just one of the girls out front until she married Bill Abbot (George Montgomery) one of the mainstays of Gene Morrison's band. It was a whirlwind romance beginning at a one night stand in Dixon and ending a night later at Elgin, forty miles away. Connie had to make up her mind fast because the band was on tour, headed straight for California in hundred-mile jumps.

For a gal who was Queen of the local Juke Box, you'd think traveling with Gene Morrison's band would be heaven. Especially since the crew hiding under that movie name is none other than Glenn Miller and his orchestra. But there are a few disappointments waiting for Connie just around the corner.

For one thing, Bill doesn't dance. He

I SAW IT HAPPEN

In the show-window were cakes, rolls, fudge brownies and a pot of steaming coffee. I WAS HUNGRY, and I had just one dime that would have to take me to the job beginning the next day.

A plump girl came up beside me. "They should not be allowed to display this tempting food," she said.

Impulsively I turned to her. "I have a job beginning tomorrow, and I'll get paid by the day. Will you have supper with me tomorrow night?"

Then an amazing thing happened. The curvaceous girl opened her purse, pulled out a roll of bills, handed me a fiver and said:

"You poor child, I thought you were dieting voluntarily as I am." Then she smiled, dimpled and twinkling; and through my grateful tears, I recognized Joan Blondell.

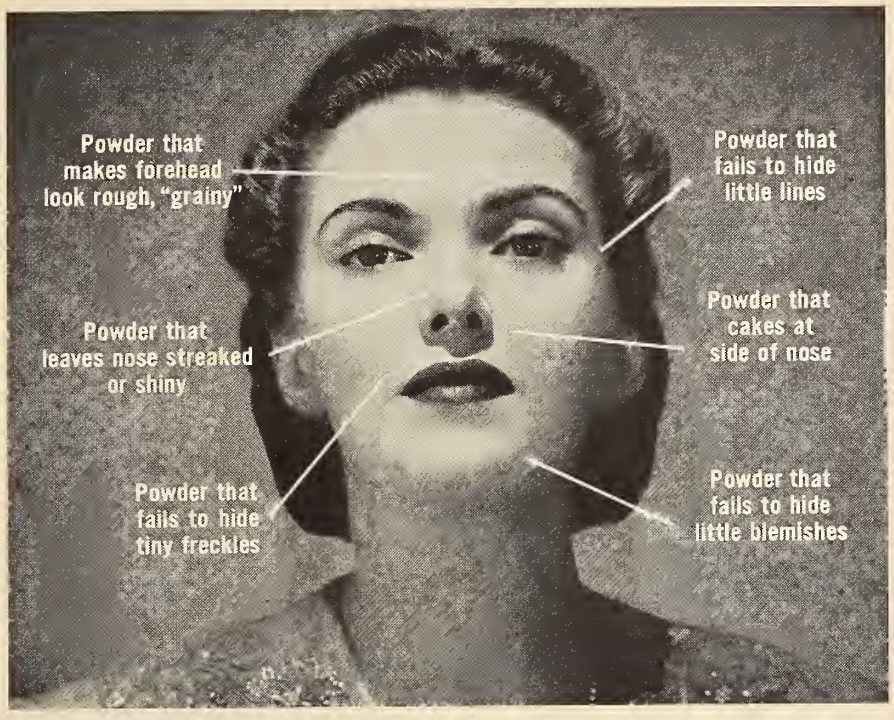
Which of these 6 "FACE POWDER TROUBLES" do You have?



Powder that makes forehead look rough, "grainy"
Powder that fails to hide little lines
Powder that leaves nose streaked or shiny
Powder that cakes at side of nose
Powder that fails to hide tiny freckles
Powder that fails to hide little blemishes

New-texture powder helps end these troubles—makes skin look fresher, younger!

WHAT DO YOU SEE when you re-powder your face? Does your skin look smooth, fresh, appealing? Or does the powder look caked on your forehead and chin? Does your nose look streaked or shiny? Do tiny lines around your eyes and mouth seem emphasized?

Don't blame your skin for what you see in the mirror: blame your face powder! For these are "face powder troubles"... and now you can quickly help end all these 6 troubles, just by changing to the amazing new-textured face powder!

Here is the secret of this new face powder

What is its name? Lady Esther Face Powder! Why is it so different? Because it's made differently! How is it made? It isn't just mixed in the usual way—it's blown and reblown by TWIN HURRICANES, blown until it's smoother, finer by far than powder made by ordinary methods!

Women who use this new-texture face powder for the first time are thrilled to see what a "baby-skin" smoothness it gives their skin. They say this new, smoother texture seems to hide tiny lines and blemishes, and even little freckles! They say this new-texture powder seems to change the whole appearance of their skin—seems to make it look smoother, fresher, and often years younger!

Here's a new season! Meet it halfway? In coffee lingo, old bean, no drip, no grind—perk up and git goin'

Suddenly, out of a clear sky, it's September, and as you pull beautiful, carefree August off the calendar, you discover you've got eagles in the tummy and Gene Krupa's drum for a heart. This is the month things start happening again. College, maybe—or a brand new job. But most likely another year of school. No matter what, it's the beginning of something, and it's exciting and challenging. You want to get off to a really special start. Well, all right.

S'pose it's just down the street to the big brick high school. Home room 202 again. Same old gang. Same old stuff. Don't get right smack into the rut you vacated last June. You know—a couple of minutes late every day, writing notes to Janie all during study hall, a 40-minute siesta in the infirmary come every Latin quiz. This year don't see how much you can get away with, but how much you can get out of school. Stop thinking that fun begins at 3:00.

Your required Spanish takes on all kinds of glamour if you think of it as step one toward an elegant job when you graduate. Take pains with your accent, and get teacher to prescribe some supplementary reading.

Instead of thinking of your American history as a dreary conglomeration of dates and names, color it a trifle with your imagination and make it the most complete and exciting historical novel you've ever read. Try to realize that the Nathan Hales of yesterday were just earlier editions of Colin Kelly. If one particular phase or person fascinates you, read up on it or him in the "libe." Here's a gorgeous chance to really learn something about the country.

If your schedule can stand it, why not take a flyer at a completely new course? Art or Typing or Current Events. Something you don't absolutely have to have for graduation, but which sounds like fun. Try to work up a real thirst for knowledge, and you've no idea what it will do to enrich your whole life.

Last year you feigned sprained ankles till you developed a chronic hobble just to get out of gym class. If you ever did venture into the pool, it automatically meant cutting French on account of your hair looking so atrocious. Now, don't start that again. You're a year older and a year smarter. Get yourself a strip of chamois and wrap it around your head turban-wise. The bathing cap goes over that, and your hair-do is practically hermetically sealed. Go out for basketball and softball and soccer. Make a team or two. And even if you don't, the exercise'll make you feel and look like the proverbial million.

Have extra-curricular activities been leaving you cold for years? Dramatic Club, Camera Club—do the whole tribe of them cut no ice atall with you? Then start one that does. If you're mad for dogs, instigate something canine. Study up on blood lines. Know how to take care of an injured pup. Read what amazing things dogs are doing for defense. Write the nearest S. P. C. A. for first aid advice, and ask the American Kennel Club, Fourth Avenue, New York, to give you the names of worthwhile dog books.

Why not a music club? Concentrate on either classical or swing, and make the meetings kind of festive by having them at various members' houses one evening a week. Each member can take turns conducting the meetings. For instance, one week the Beethoven addict can take over and discuss B.'s life and work, and you can play one of his symphonies. Inveigle the head of your school music department to give you a general introductory talk explaining the origin of music and a bit about its evolution. You can have a circulating record library, occasional trips to concerts, local authorities as guest speakers. Fabulous fun!

You might start a Latin-American Club, studying the culture and history of the South American countries. Or an Aviation Club. Learn to tell a Messerschmitt from a Piper Cub. Take inexpensive flights at your nearest airport. The world is so full of a number of things—take your pick and have a swell time doing them. (Continued on page 62)

SILKIER, SMOOTHER HAIR...EASIER TO ARRANGE!

So romantic—this lovely new "up" hair-do, designed around a center part. Before styling, the hair was shampooed with new, improved Special Drene containing hair conditioner!

Improved Special Drene, with hair conditioner in it, now makes amazing difference! Leaves hair far more manageable . . . silkier, smoother too!

Would you like the man of your heart to find you even more alluring? Then don't wait to try the new, improved Special Drene, which now has a wonderful hair conditioner in it! For if you haven't tried Drene lately, you just can't realize how much silkier and smoother your hair will be, because of that added hair conditioner. And far easier to manage, too, right after shampooing!

Unsurpassed for removing dandruff!

Are you bothered about removal of ugly, scaly dandruff? You won't be when you shampoo with Special Drene! For Drene removes that flaky dandruff the very first time you use it—and besides does something no soap shampoo can do, not even those claiming to be special "dandruff removers". Drene reveals up to 33% more lustre than even the finest soaps or soap shampoos!

So, for extra beauty benefits, plus quick and thorough removal of flaky dandruff, insist on Special Drene. Or ask for a professional Drene shampoo at your beauty shop.

Avoid That Dulling Film Left By Soaps And Soap Shampoos!

Don't rob your hair of glamour by using soaps or liquid soap shampoos—which always leave a dulling film that dims the natural lustre and color brilliance! Use Drene—the beauty shampoo which never leaves a clouding film. Instead, Drene reveals up to 33% more lustre! Remember, too, that Special Drene now has hair conditioner in it, so it leaves hair far silkier, smoother, easier to manage—right after shampooing!

Sothern's the name, but it doesn't matter what they call her, she's always "Maisie" . . . fluttery . . . lissome . . . slightly daft. Or is she? Robert Sterling or, say, Hedy Lamarr would tell you those harebrained roles are only a medium for her Puckish spirits. Actually her thinking is straight as a plumb line. Her tastes are slightly pedantic. Russian history, for example. She takes it straight . . . in large swallows. She also throws Scandinavian and French around . . . and makes music in a lilting treble. The wide-eyed morsel really owes her career to Florenz Ziegfeld, who plucked her out of anonymity for a stint in musical comedy. Currently she's cuttin' up in M-G-M's "Panama Hattie."

John Wayne is 6′ 4″ of shoulders with a folksy kind of pan. Started in movies accidental like when, as a prop boy, he strolled on-scene casually holding up a 2-ton table. Director hollered "My man!" and he was an actor. Fired when he refused an affair called "Girls Deserve Excitement." (Title made him awfully sick.) After which he went on to Westerns and fame. Pop owned a drugstore, which makes him a real drugstore cowboy. He's currently in Rep.'s "Flying Tigers." Mrs. W. is Jo Saenz of L.A. and the Social Register, which lists them as Mr. and Mrs. Marion Morrison (his real name). They've 4 children, one of whom frankly prefers Gene Autry!

Ingrid Bergman's face gives her away. There are dreams in the corners of her mouth, and her smile holds all the wonder of a new springtime. A bit of a lovely melody, this Mrs. Lindstrom. Sometimes she's a tousle-haired school kid, and you gaze at growing daughter, Pia, in disbelief. Then she's a barmaid, a blackmailer or a richly wise woman. For she's a fine actress, the magic Bergman. And a popular one, although the only people to recognize her in '39 were the waiters in the Swedish Pavilion at the World's Fair. Now in Warner's "Casablanca," she's coaching Humphrey Bogart in Swedish, 'tween scenes. And where's the man who wouldn't bring an apple for the teacher?

LANA WEDS!

By IDA ZEITLIN

Linda said she felt like weeping when Lana and Steve said "I do." "Lana looked so gorgeous. There was such an expression on her face—she's so-o-o in love!"

A juke box played "Lohengrin" and Lana smiled through tears. This time she knew it was playing for keeps.

Linda Darnell had a dinner date that Thursday night with her friend Alan Gordon, the young publicity agent whom the papers are trying, in vain, to marry her off to. He phoned at six. "We're joining Lana Turner and Stephen Crane, if that's all right with you."

"I'd love it." She hadn't seen Lana for quite a while, and she'd never met Crane. She'd heard about him though, and wondered, as she slipped into her purple dress and tilted the black hat over her pompadour, just how serious this was.

Alan called for her, and they picked up the other two at Crane's apartment. Lana wore powder blue under her cape of natural fox, with a tiny blue-gray hat and, whether it was love or what, looked particularly luscious. Linda was struck by the height of the young man, introduced to her as Stevie—six feet he must have been. His eyes were brown, so was his wavy hair, and he seemed awfully sweet and considerate and rather on the quiet side—or maybe it was just by contrast with the bubbling vivacity of America's favorite sweater girl.

It was love all right—the way Lana hung on his arm, the way they looked at each other, and their voices caressed each other, and every second word was darling and baby. Linda, older at eighteen than Lana will ever be, smiled at them like an indulgent aunt.

While Steve was in the other room, trying to get his mother on long distance, Lana told all—anyway, the high spots. The minute she'd laid eyes on him, she'd known this was her guy. Not wanting the papers to get hold of it and maul it, they hadn't gone out much together. She'd seen him at home. They were going to be married in Las Vegas on Sunday. Her mother knew. So did Louis B. Mayer. He'd patted her head and said, "Bless you, my child—"

That's why Steve was calling his mother. They wanted her to know. Lana was nervous as a witch. What'll I say to her? I won't know what to say."

"Honey," called Steve.

When they came out, she was giggling.

"Well, what did you say?"

"I feel so silly," she wailed. "All I could babble was, 'Oh thank you.'" (Continued on following page)

On band tour, Lana changed costumes 5 times a day, wore jewelry made of war stamps, kissed everyone who bought 50-grand worth. Wore down this sailor's resistance, made $5 sale!

Playbay Alexis Thompson vied with Howard Hughes, T. Dorsey, Bob Stack, Buddy Rich, etc., for Lana. Only few months ago, she winged cross-country, met him at Stork Club for Sun. night date!

"For Steve?" Alan wanted to know.

Steve grinned. "Mother told her she was the most beautiful girl in the world. So she's blushing."

They went to André's for dinner, danced and held hands. Flushed and laughing, the impulsive one suddenly leaned toward him across the table. "Oh, honey, why do we have to wait till Sunday? Sunday's so long to wait."

"Well. Why do we have to?"

She'd been half kidding. He was wholly in earnest. Her face turned thoughtful, then lit up like a thousand-watt lamp. "Yes," she echoed, "why do we? Linda, will you come along and be my bridesmaid?"

Linda'd be glad to. Alan was dispatched to find out about planes and came back with reservations on the eight o'clock next morning. They'd meet in his office at seven and have breakfast at the airport. That meant getting up at six. They'd better turn in early. But Lana was much too excited to sleep. So they went to the Mocambo and saw the floor show.

At one-thirty Linda broke it up. "Look, I'm no bride with stars in my eyes, and I need some sleep. See you kids at seven."

She didn't, though. Alan called her at six. "Hey, you up yet?"

"Mm, vaguely."

Just the same she was on deck by ten of seven. The bridesmaid wore a blue, pin-striped suit, white sailor perched on the crown of her head, silver fox draped over her arm. Alan was making last-minute phone calls, leaving instructions with a kid on his staff. Came seven and seven-fifteen, and no sign of the others. They called Lana's house. She'd left. They called Steve's apartment. No answer. Steve's brother arrived with orchids done up in brown paper, so no one could guess they were flowers.

"Where's Steve?"

"Search me. He phoned me to pick these up and bring them here."

By seven-thirty, half the polish was chewed off Linda's nails. "Maybe they forgot. What'll we ever do!"

"Take it easy, Bit." Little Bit, Alan calls her, but clipped it in sheer nervousness. "After all, it's their wedding."

The bridal pair tore in at seven forty-five. Fifteen minutes to get to Burbank, pick up the tickets and make the plane. No time for breakfast or explanations. Lana had changed her clothes and told her mother of the change in plan. She wore a two-piece beige dress with big dolman sleeves, beige shoes and bag, white gloves, a little white straw hat trimmed with lilies-of-the-valley and one huge red rose. Steve carried her baum marten coat.

They made the plane by one minute. Most of the other passengers were army officers who, because they were sleepy or engrossed in their own problems or just didn't give a darn, paid the movie queens no heed. For all the stir they created, the girls might have been Jane and Maggie Smith. Which was okay by them. They hadn't been able to get seats together. Steve and Lana were way down front, Linda and Alan near the back. They communicated only once. When the stewardess appeared bearing coffee, Steve turned round and grinned.

By the time they reached Las Vegas, the news had already broken in Los Angeles. Some eagle eye must have spotted them at Burbank, and a nine o'clock broadcast released the flash to a gaping movie colony. Phones started ringing and tongues wagging, and what most of them wagged was who the hell's Stephen Crane?

The bride's party, meantime, were having their own troubles. They couldn't get transportation to town. A photographer friend of Lana's met them at the airport. Knowing the story would have to be covered, she'd let him in on it, and he'd driven up the night before. But his little coupé was filled with equipment, and they couldn't all ride in the front seat.

The waiting room was hotter than blazes. Uniformed kids kept breezing in and out. Not having the dignity of officers to maintain, they went "Whee! Lana Turner!" Lana was going mad, jumping (Continued on page 72)

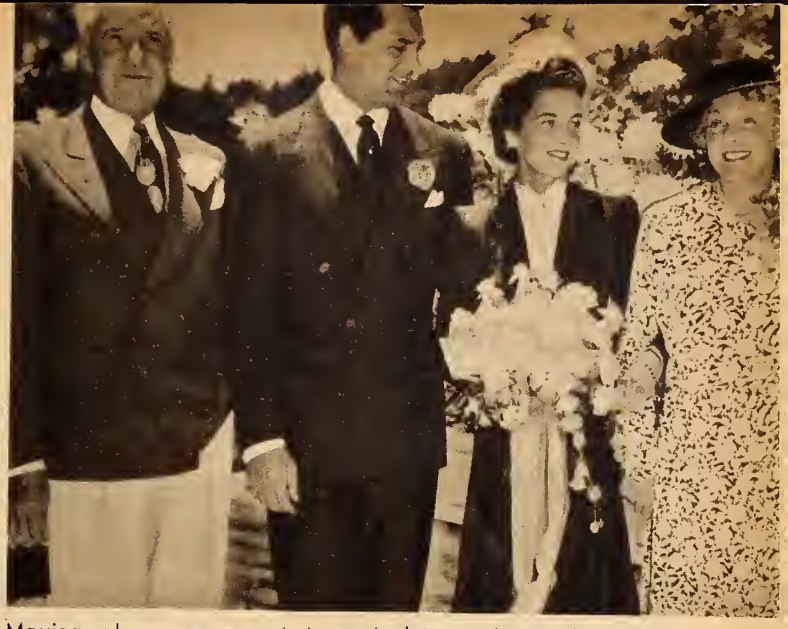
"I, Cary, take thee

License gave his age as 38; hers as 30. He became citizen in June. Marriage ta Grant will nat restare her citizenship, but makes passible her applicatian withaut filing first papers, cutting time wait fram 5 ta 3 years.

Barbara..."

Modern Screen gives you a parson's eye-view of that incredible Grant-Hutton marriage!



Marriage plans were deep, dark secret; date wasn't set till night before, altho they'd had license since previous week. Mgr. Frank W. Vincent was best man and Mrs. Madeline Hazeltine, matron of honor.

Couple will live in Brentwood till he leaves for the Army this Fall. Day after ceremony, Cary was back at studio for work. Above, with Jean Arthur and Ronnie Coleman in "The Talk of the Town."

Barbara Hutton has come home to happiness. After years of searching, after hundreds of heartaches, dozens of mistakes and a quest that has taken her all over the world, she has found the right man at last. A man who will never, never be known as "Mr. Barbara Hutton." A man who will be the head of his house. A man to depend upon, honor and love.

Immediately after their wedding ceremony at the mountain lodge of Mr. Frank Vincent, one of the guests said to Barbara, "I wish you all the happiness in the world, Mrs. Grant."

"Thank you so much," she answered. Then she thought over that salutation. "Mrs. Grant," she repeated to herself. "Mrs. Cary Grant. Isn't it a nice name? I'm going to love getting used to it."

When the news that Cary Grant and Barbara Hutton had been married at high noon on July 8 hit the news wires, there were a flock of astonished people in Hollywood as well as throughout the world—but they had absolutely nothing on the Reverend H. Paul Romeis, pastor of a small Lutheran church in San Bernardino.

Mr. Romeis had been sitting in his study, working over church matters, when two of Cary Grant's friends appeared. They told the clergyman nothing except that they would appreciate it if he would prepare to perform a marriage ceremony at Lake Arrowhead. "The contracting parties have their license, I presume?" he asked.

They showed Mr. Romeis a license issued to Archibald Leach and Barbara Reventlow. He nodded without lifting an eyebrow. As far as he was concerned, those monikers indicated nothing more than a couple of people hooked with fairly unusual names.

He and his escort talked about the weather, but—as a side line—Mr. Romeis was still pondering the problem he had left on his desk when interrupted: How to get an organ for his church. He had wanted a small organ to replace the exhausted piano that they had been using for what seemed centuries, but when he looked into the future he could see nothing but zero. Small churches in small San Bernardino just don't have pipe organ incomes.

Halfway across Lake Arrowhead in a speed boat, it occurred to Mr. Romeis' escorts that he should be told about the young couple he was to marry. One of the men shouted, above the slap-slap of the speed boat, "Archibald Leach is Cary Grant and Barbara Reventlow was formerly Barbara Hutton."

Mr. Romeis blinked. "Cary Grant! Why, he's my favorite actor," he said. "As for my wife . . ."

The instant the ceremony was over, he said quietly to Frank Vincent, "May I use your telephone? I'd like to tell my wife the exciting news." (Continued on page 66)

RIGHT GUY WRONG!

By Jack Wade

THE other day I dropped into the lobby of the Ambassador Hotel and ran across a Broadway columnist I know who was visiting Hollywood. This guy is usually in a sweat about something or other, but when I saw him he looked particularly upset.

"Say," he began, "what kind of a town is this Hollywood, anyway?"

"Why," I recited, "it's Glamourland, of course. Hollywood is a fabulous Fairyland where pampered stars pitch it around like kings and queens. It's Sodom and Gomorrah doubling in brass. It's the High Life capital of the world. Haven't you read——"

"Yeah?" he broke in, barking. "Well, guess what I just saw! Coming down Sunset Boulevard this afternoon I saw Victor Mature, the champ Casanova, the Magnificent Jerk, the glamorous Wolf of Vine Street—that's what they write about him, isn't it? Well—guess what he was doing!"

I didn't dare. "This front-page Don Juan," sighed the columnist—and his face was disillusioned and disgusted—"was leading a three-year-old baby girl by the hand into—into church!"

It may be dangerous debunking, but it's the truth: A whole lot of things you (Continued on page 75)

Vic would spend more than he made if he answered half his ¾ million fan letters. Mode final bow to flickers in "Sweet and Hot" but didn't have time to finish before taking to the briny!

Typical Mature lunch is grapefruit juice, coffee, Pepsi-Cola and hamburger. A great one for diet fads, he once had a spell of eating meat only—no vegetables or desserts whatsoever!

When Rita Hayworth made one of her rare public appearances with Vic, banquet tickets were anonymously registered "Fred Huxley." Vic left bracelet for her to remember him by!

Call to Color

Hedy Lamarr is a gal with full, warm, beautiful lips. The luscious Hedy is now make-believing as "Tondeleyo," the native girl in "White Cargo."

EVERY bright girl knows a lipstick has more important uses than writing phone numbers on the back of a menu. It's a slim, scarlet baton that transforms plain-Jane into a popular beau-catcher . . . changes your personality to suit your latest whim . . . and can always be depended upon to highlight the drabbest, weariest face with a dash of sparkle and zest!

Do you use your lipstick effectively? If not, you're cheating yourself out of an extra helping of glamour. And this is no time to waste anything, especially glamour, which is often just another spelling for m-o-r-a-l-e.

One of the bigger and better cosmetic firms offers a new "Lip Service" which will help you decorate your own Cupid's Bow. It's a cellophane strip wrapped, for no extra charge, around a plastic-case lipstick. The outlines of six alluring movie-star types of lips—the same ones pictured across the bottom of this page—are printed on the strip (we might call it a "strip-tease"!) You hold these famous lips in front of your own, and have a lot of fun deciding whether your beauty would be enhanced with a mouth like Dottie Lamour's, Hedy Lamarr's, Claudette Colbert's or one of the other's. Then you go ahead and follow the outline, but be sure to use a rich, creamy, opaque lipstick—like the one the Lip Service strip encircles—so that it will effectively cover the old lip-line and hold the new through heat, havoc or high water!

Remember, above all, that you don't have to limit yourself to one new shape. You may be able to wear a half a dozen (one at a time of course) for different moods and effects. The movie stars change around for the different parts they play and, in the same way, you can be Dietrich-ish one night and a simulated Vivien Leigh the next!

Drawing Your Mouth

There are certain rules you must follow, though, in redoing your mouth. If your chin is pointed or if your face is heart-shaped, your lips should be, too. But make it a modified heart-shape, not the cupid's bow that's as outmoded as pantaloons. If your upper lip is a straight Bette Davis mould, it needs a full lower lip to go with it. If your jaw is square, try a square effect on the lips, too. Is your nose up-turned? Then paint on a wide upper lip. Is your nose long or large? Then give it a full lower lip to balance it.

It's easy to change the size of your lips. If they're too thin and make you look prissy, draw the lipstick over the edge. If they're too full, keep well within the lip-line. If they are too long, stop the rouge before it reaches the corners. In every case, please keep the

That slim, scarlet wand—your lipstick—can give you lips lovely as a star's corners turned up. This is no time for tragic effects!

Back to Nature

For the natural effect the boys are clamoring for, take time and trouble to do a good lip-painting job. Thickly smeared lipstick that leaves a flaming imprint on coffee cups, cocktail glasses or uniform collars is strictly taboo. Resolve to help nature along, not to insult her. Bob Hope quips that when a man kisses you he wants to feel he's kissing your lips . . . not sliding into third base. Another thing the darlings don't like to see is a red-dyed fingertip. If you use your pinkie as a lip rouge spreader, be sure to clean it thoroughly.

Ways and Means

If at all possible, your lips should be clean and smooth before you apply your lipstick. It's best to remove all traces of your late make-up with cold cream or soap and water. Then pat softly with towel or tissue so the lips are absolutely dry before the lip rouge goes on. If you have difficulty removing color which has extended beyond the lip-line, try a bit of peroxide or astringent on a tissue or a puff of cotton.

Color your upper lip first, and then press the lips together to transfer excess lipstick to the lower lip. It should not be heavier than the upper, so the imprint will also tell you how thick to draw your outline. Next fill in the lower lip. Then, to avoid a watermelon rind effect, cover the inside of the lips, both upper and lower. If you have any trouble getting the outline you want, go over it with a lip pencil before you use the lipstick. If covering the inside is a problem, do that with a brush, as many movie stars do.

Press cleansing tissue against the lips to remove surplus rouge. Then pat on a little face powder to "set" the color. Wet the lips to dissolve the powdery surface. Some gals stop at this stage but we always find it more satisfactory to apply a second film of lipstick over this foundation, and then to press the lips firmly again with a tissue. Keep pressing until there is just a faint pink mark on the tissue. Then defy the hottest coffee to melt your careful lip-art! (Continued on page 62)

Crisp, cool and incisive is the Davis personality and Bette's lips are purposeful, firm . . . and gorgeous! "Watch on the Rhine" is her next film.

Jeanne Cagney smiles her way through Warner Brothers' new flag-raiser, "Yankee Doodle Dandy."

A YANKEE DOODLE DANDY SMILE

Lip and mouth beauty hints from Jeanne Cagney add up to a grand old American smile!

By CAROL CARTER

★ Winsome Jeanne Cagney, up-and-coming sister of her famous brother, has some things to say to you about beautiful smiles. And Jeanne is one to know whereof she speaks. Before the movies got her, she took a pre-med course at one of the New York colleges. There she learned what doctors think about beautiful teeth and smiles—and you'll know she practices what she preaches when you see "Yankee Doodle Dandy." She's a charming addition to that grand American movie, and never more so than when she parts her pretty lips and shows those gleaming rows of white, sparkling teeth. So heed Jeanne's words of wisdom on how to have the smile that wins friends and influences suitors.

A Tooth's Best Friend Is Its Toothbrush! Ply your brushes, lassies, if you want teeth that shine and gleam. Cover the bristles with paste, powder or liquid dentifrice, and then scrub. Not a couple of licks and a promise, from one end of your mouth to the other, but a thorough, 'round and 'round stimulating motion on each half inch of teeth, upper and lower. For real smile beauty, spend more time with your toothbrush than you do with your lipstick. Jeanne says to keep your wrist watch on, so you don't chisel on the time. Three minutes is the minimum allotment. Then, for good measure, take a little more of your dentifrice on your fingertips, and massage your gums. Pretend you're pressing the insides and outsides together. With one finger on each side, squeeze hard and draw little circles. The friction will give your mouth a glorious feeling of exhilaration.

Don't Tell Me to Shush! We don't go along with the folks who say "even your best friend won't tell you." We think a best friend will, but unfortunately she isn't always around. So don't take any chances on unpleasant breath. Swish a refreshing rinse all through your mouth after every toothbrushing and before every social engagement. Prevention is nine-tenths of success. Make sure you're a welcome addition to any group, by this quick, easy precaution.

The Dentist Wants to See You! Don't be shy. Step up, at least once every six months, and have your dentist clean and inspect your teeth. The thorough cleaning is necessary, in case there are any crevices you have missed despite your brushing, dental floss and energetic rinsing. The inspection is important to catch small holes before they grow to painful proportions.

Eat Your Spinach, Kids! And your lettuce, celery, eggs, tomatoes, cheese, and bread and toast crusts. Chew briskly, and drink a lot of milk and orange juice. That's the way to have strong, healthy dentals—the kind the movie stars smile with. Jeanne Cagney—knowing her oats and foods in general from her medical training—wants us to be sure to emphasize this subject of proper diet. So don't say we didn't tell you, if the dentist finds cavities, cloudiness and weak gums next time he looks!

Don't Lend-Lease a Lipstick! Not only because it's unhygienic, which it is, but because the chances of borrowing the proper shade are slim. Deep blue-reds are luscious on some, delicate pinks are entrancing on others. Find the tint and tone that goes most glamorously with your own skin, hair and costumes—and then buy rouge and nail polish to match. Remember that you need a bluer shade for night than for day, and that summer colors usually look gaudy or "corny" with sleek fall clothes.

Smiles Come Easier with Practice! The quickness of a smile is as important as its size. You should see Jeanne Cagney with a group of people. When someone speaks to her, she looks up expectantly, the pleasant suggestion of a smile already turning up the corners of her lips. Don't be one of those people who look as if the effort of a laugh is almost enough to break them in two. The right to laugh when you want to is one of the privileges of living in a democracy. Take advantage of it. Have fun! Smile often —smile pretty—smile at every excuse, and two to one, you'll find the excuses come much more often.

SMILE CHART

For	Use These	This Way
SPARKLING TEETH	Firm bristled tooth brush. An exhilarating dentifrice (paste, powder or liquid). Dental floss.	Minimum time allotment: 3 minutes, twice daily. Brush up, down and around with circular motion. Never brush crosswise. Use dental floss daily.
MOUTH HEALTH AND HAPPINESS	A brisk, invigorating mouth wash. Dentifrice for gum massage.	Rinse mouth with antiseptic after every brushing. Massage gums for stimulation. Use soft brush or a finger dipped in your pet dentifrice. Rub 'round and 'round.
AN EXPRESSIVE, MOBILE MOUTH	Chewing gum.	With consideration! No gum popping. No sound effects. No careless leftovers for unsuspecting people to step on.
LIP ART	Lipstick. Lip pencil or brush. Face powder and cleansing tissues.	Outline lips with brush or pencil. Fill in with lipstick. Blot with tissue. Dust lips with face powder, then apply a lighter, second coat of lipstick. Remove excess with tissue.
LIP PAINT	Lipstick shades that harmonize with your hair, skin, nailpolish, rouge and dress! Avoid clashes.	Brownettes, light brunettes, ash blondes use blue-red. Blondes, gypsy-brunettes, red-heads use orangey red. Most everyone can wear a true red-red with all colors.
CLEANSING SOOTHING SMOOTHING	Cleansing cream. Tissues. Emollient cream. Lip pomade.	Before applying fresh lipstick, slather lips with a rich cleansing cream. Remove with tissue. At night apply emollient cream. Use pomade to soften chapped lips.

Teresa Wright's a happy girl. "Pride of the Yankees" rates rave reviews.

KILLER-DILLER

You'll die when you meet Alan Ladd! He's no more a tough mug than Shirley Temple!

If they could rustle up a number Nine-C gent's model glass slipper around Hollywood, they'd probably be easing it today over the lucky socks of Alan Ladd. It's a very great temptation to tag Alan Hollywood's blue ribbon Cinderella Man.

Because look:

From a national nobody a few weeks ago, lucky Laddie has blasted his way to a round-the-world rave as ruthless Phil Raven in "This Gun for Hire." In practically no time at all Hollywood postmen have developed humps on their backs lugging in fan mail hailing our hard-boiled hero as the greatest male star stunner since Clark Gable handed Norma Shearer a straight left in "A Free Soul" and Jimmy Cagney wrapped a grapefruit around Mae Clarke's mush in "Public Enemy." Alan has already set Ray Milland and Fred MacMurray in the popularity shade on his own home lot, and even Dottie Lamour, with all her soldier and sailor pen friends, is being rudely muscled from the front of Paramount Studio's postage stamp parade. 1. Jonny Davis was a newspaper man. Tough, gay, debonair, with a cocky grin and a smash approach. As for Paula Lane she wrote good newspaper copy, too, but Paula was a woman and love came first. The pair of them crashed together like a shot of lightning zigzagging into an oak tree. Here was Jonny fresh back from Europe in October, 1941, with a job to do. He had to put over to a reluctant editor the terrific discovery he and his kid brother Kirk had made. A crawling yellow snake was writhing out of Japan, spurting venom toward this country. No time for a dame! But here she was, catapulted into his life, blonde, gorgeous, beautiful and full of memories that seemed to include him. Jonny met 'em and loved 'em and left 'em. He'd done that to Paula when he stood her up on a date three years ago. All Europe had slashed between, and war was flaring up inside Jonny Davis. Memories had ripened in Paula. And now she was meeting Jonny who didn't know that she'd tried to love his brother Kirk and blot out lingering pain that way.

"Somewhere I'll Find You"

By DAPHNE McVICKER and KAY HARDY

Army-bound Gable winds up his fabulous screen career with the top-notch performance of his life!

2. Jonny had work to do. He and brother Kirk had dug out of Europe an advance view of the rotten apple treachery planned by Japan. George Stafford, editor of the Chronicle, didn't believe it. He was still howling for appeasement and isolation through his paper's columns. He laughed at the pair and threw their big story back in their faces. But Jonny and Kirk, and some other people around the office saw a trick that would work. They had to sit on Stafford and hide his clothes as the story sneaked into page one. And he wasn't laughing anymore.

3. Fresh from making Stafford publish the big blast by substituting a faked dictaphone record for one of the editor's bland speeches, Jonny went back to his old boarding place, where Willie and Eve, commercial artist and his wife-model, still rented wisecracks, loyalty and shelter. But somebody else was using these. There was a girl in Jonny's old room. At least there was lingerie and lipstick. A good reporter like Jonny could track down these clues and find a blonde in his bath. Jonny bore down on the bathroom like a dive bomber, and the voice he heard spelled youth, beauty and bother with a great big capital "B".

4. Even a scoop-sleuth like Jonny Davis couldn't figure that Paula Lane, the girl, was the guiding star who'd shone across European blackouts for Kirk. She was no star to Jonny—just a firecracker, crackling on a fuse that he had to step on. Jonny offered the blonde a break. He took her to his special old Greenwich Village hangout for wining and dining—behind a closed door. Paula, illuminating the dimness of the scene with an old torch rekindling, tagged along. Jonny's kisses were blue fire, and Kirk's gentle caresses began to dim down into distance.

5. Jonny didn't get it. Sometimes she kissed back and sometimes she ran out on him. But Kirk came raging to accuse big brother of breaking up his one romance, and that without any serious intentions of his own. Kirk had tried to put the ring on Paula and found a new priority ahead of him—Jonny. Kirk was a big boy now, and he knew what women were to Jonny—sound effects for spare seconds. But Jonny laughed at the kid and went to work to clear the girl out of the path of the two of them. Kirk must learn. Both brothers were out of jobs, and Europe was on fire with red hot stories being born of its grim tortured flames.

6. Paula made a mistake. Everybody was trying to show her that Jonny was a two-timer with women and a no-good and that Kirk was the old reliable lover. She couldn't dodge the barrage of Jonny's kisses. And he could be so sweet. So she struck where he lived—in his newspaperman's world. Paula was on the Chronicle, too, and Stafford had offered her an assignment in Indo-China. She told Jonny that, expecting him to ask her to give it up for him, and all ready to do so. But Jonny burned—a dame in a big job and Jonny Davis stuck with only the dame? He waved Paula away and she set off, through tears, for China.

7. Now Stafford, the editor, called Jonny and Kirk to the Chronicle office to tell them that Paula had disappeared. Kirk turned white, but Jonny gave the old lip-curl. He knew these dames and their tricks! Stafford had to set the presses roaring their call to Jonny's blood. What a news break—the pair of Davis brothers going off on an assignment to find one small girl in a hell of slaughtered Oriental cities! Kirk heard Paula calling, but Jonny saw only page one and a by-line in capital letters. They left for Shanghai, while headlines began to blaze.

10. So Paula was Kirk's girl again, and the young Davis kid was in for a few moments of glory. He had to break the news that Big Brother had gone—and there was Kirk's shoulder for a girl to cry on and Kirk's kind kisses to console her. Paula couldn't understand why things were this way, but she gave up trying. As for the old torch, it was burning down to a shattered stick and Paula didn't intend to let it kindle ever again. She was ready to put on fresh lipstick and lift up her chin and make the best of a shattered world with Kirk. As for Jonny, he was in Manila now, in the Tropical Club forgetting with a girl named Crystal.

11. She couldn't make out why it took glass after glass of champagne and whiskey to get Jonny's attention focussed on her. When Paula Lane came, at the Chronicle's command, to get Jonny Davis and bring him back to work, she found the pair of them in Jonny's room. The newspaperman had passed out on the bed. The flashy girl wasn't surprised to see Paula. Jonny's binge had the earmarks of something started by a skirt. Crystal suggested that they cut cards for Jonny. But it didn't take Paula's King to Crystal's Knave, to show who owned Jonny's life.

8. China was just a reporter's beat to Jonny. He searched out a debauched old newspaperman named Kirsten, with a Chinese friend named Chang. The pair of them could stir up the Chinese cauldron with a long spoon. Jonny dragged out of them what they knew—the Japanese at the doors of Thailand, tanks glistening impervious to bows and arrows— And a white woman named Paula Lane who was secretly leading parties of small, terrified children out of attacked territory into safety. So Jonny wrote a big story carrying Kirsten's by-line, and was on his way.

9. He and Kirk and Chang went to find Paula. She wasn't the suave and lovely blonde that Jonny had played around with in New York. She was thin and dirty and bedraggled, but there was a glow about her and it kindled something in the newspaperman that he couldn't understand. They helped her stow away the frightened children. Then they found her a bath. Jonny helped wash her face, and all at once he was kissing her in a strange new way. This scared Jonny Davis, he didn't understand it, and he couldn't take it. Kirk wanted it—but bad—so Jonny picked up his hat and walked out alone, and rather gallantly. Davis was off again.

12. Now it was Paula's turn to tell a story. It wasn't too hard to tell it in Jonny's arms. It wasn't too hard to get a sobered-up Jonny to listen. He'd starved for this moment and this girl, and now he had her to kiss too much and hold too tightly. In Paula's room behind the bamboo screen that night, the story was told and kisses made a borderline around the page of the past. But then Paula jerked away. She'd merely tried Jonny out, she told him, to see if he'd double-cross his own brother. And now she was leaving him. And Jonny was alone, in a tropical night, staring at a calendar that marked the date—December 7.

13. Things happened then. Kirk met Paula and her story was all in her eyes. She couldn't deny that what heart she had left was staying with Jonny. As for her, she wasn't going back to safety. Kirk was off to the army, because things were crackling and he had a job to do. So Paula decided on the Red Cross. And when Jonny Davis reached the thickest of the smoke that had wreathed up on December 7th, he found the blotted-out cross that had marked a field hospital—and a soldier to tell him that nobody came out of it alive. Jonny was in Bataan, and Kirk was arriving there, too—and a girl had gone under a sign that no longer reached any chivalrous hearts. There were none left to reach.

HONEY-BLONDE—WITH A FRESH-AS-WILD-ROSES COMPLEXION

Jane's Precious Engagement Ring is dear and sweet like herself. A Tiffany setting of gold holds the clear, sparkling diamond that once belonged to her fiancé's grandmother.

DAINTY JANE DRURY of Leominster, Massachusetts—engaged to Loring Harkness, Jr., of New York and Connecticut. Loring was preparing for a teaching career—but, like so many boys now, he's working in a defense plant until the Army calls him.

Adorable, modern daughter of a distinguished New England family, Jane plunged right into war duties after college. She works like a beaver at her Civilian Defense job and nearly dances her feet off "hostessing" at U.S.O.

Wherever she goes, Jane has compliments about her lovely complexion. "I tell all the girls just to use Pond's Cold Cream," she says. "Then they'll see why I say it's so 'super'—and makes your skin feel so soft and spandy clean."

Copy Her Soft-Smooth Complexion Care

First—Jane smooths Pond's Cold Cream carefully over her face and throat—pats with gentle finger tips to soften and release dirt and old make-up. Tissues off well. Next—she "rinses" with more Pond's. Tissues it off again.

Use Pond's Cold Cream as Jane does—every night—for quick daytime clean-ups, too. You'll see why war-busy society women like Miss Fernanda Wanamaker and Mrs. Allan A. Ryan use this soft-smooth cream—why more women and girls all over America use Pond's than any other face cream. At your favorite beauty counter. Five popular-priced sizes—the most economical the lovely big jars!

GOOD NEWS

BY SYLVIA KAHN

Tierney and Chaplin ablaze!

Billy Halop off to air corps.

Tarzan searches for jungle mate!

Fri. July 10th: Started the day with a visit to John Payne. And what more can a gal ask? Found him on the "Springtime In The Rockies" set sipping Pepsis with Betty Grable. John tells me his mother is in town for the first time in years. He beaus her around by night, and she spends her days getting acquainted with her two-year-old grandchild, Julie Anne. Much as he loves having her here, John wishes his mother wouldn't embarrass him to bits by raking up memories of his adorable childhood. One of her dillies concerns the time John was about eleven. His dad gave him a twenty gauge shotgun and showed him how to use it. First time out, Papa Payne made the mistake of walking ahead of his young son. John, free from the parental eye, held the gun incorrectly and sent a blast of bullets within two inches of his father's boots!

Got first-hand information about the reported Grable-Raft rift from Betty herself. She waggled a new gold cigarette holder under my nose (the fifth she's received from George this year—she loses them that fast!) and pointed to the affectionate inscription. Then she marched me to the door of the sound stage and showed me Mr. Raft seated at the wheel of his convertible, patiently waiting for his blonde to conclude her day's labors.

After Errol Flynn collapsed during boxing scene in "Gentlemen Jim," M.D. cholked it up to o case of fotigue, ordered him to take it eosy. Spent one of his first p.m.'s out with June Millond at Mocomba.

Latest light to join French movie colony is M-G-M-signed Jeon Pierre Aumont. Michele Morgon's busy discounting romonce rumors with Gobin. Says they've been buddies for years; she goes to him for odvice.

Now thot Freddie Brisson (Lt. in Army Air Corps) is back, Roz is beoming! She'd heard he was shipped abroad, was ecstotic when he suddenly showed up, took her for o Sot. whirl.

Heard later that George strolls off his own sets at five o'clock sharp. Yet he'll linger around the lot till seven if Betty's busy and never murmurs a complaint.

Thurs. July 16th: Back in civilization, after three days on a mountain top with Deanna Durbin and Daphne McVicker. Daphne McVicker is the brilliant writer whose "Life Story Of Deanna Durbin" will appear in two up-coming issues of MODERN SCREEN. Deanna's making "Forever Yours," and the mountain peak—probably the hottest in the world!—is the scene of a Chinese village. Deanna spent the three days with her hand cupped over her nose to ward off sunburn. Can't say it helped much!

Sat out the long periods between "takes" in Deanna's trailer dressing room. Saw the first picture of Vaughn in uniform on his wife's dressing table. He was seated in a boat, eyes squinted at the sun—and the marriage and engagement rings Deanna gave him were very much in evidence!

Sun. July 19th: Accepted Dorothy Lamour's invitation to lunch with her and Kaaren Pieck at the Santa Monica Swimming Club. Kaaren stopped by, and we drove to the beach together. Dottie was on the enclosed sun porch looking like the stuff dreams are made of. Her skin is earth-brown, and her white jersey bathing suit and white terry cloth cape had the scrambled eggs whistling! Dottie's a changed girl since the war came. She's terribly in earnest about her tours for Uncle Sam. Social dates are out, and men are just creatures who buy bonds. Certainly, to her mind, bond-selling is her Number One job for the duration, with movie-making riding in the sidecar.

Attended an 8 P.M. broadcast of "Command Performance, U.S.A.," the radio show transcribed in Hollywood and beamed by short wave to our troops in Australia, Ireland, Africa and all the far corners of the globe. Every star on the program is there at the request of some soldier, sailor or marine who has gone overseas. Tonight, Master of Ceremonies Edward Arnold introduced Ethel Waters, Rise Stevens, Richard Haydn and the two greatest violin virtuosos of our day—Jascha Heifetz and Jack Benny! No person, from the stars to the technicians, receives a penny for his services on "Command Performance," and the show is unsponsored because there isn't an advertiser who could afford the talent!

Tues. July 21st: Over to RKO's "Sweet or Hot" set to say good-by to Vic Mature, who's Coast Guard-bound. Waited around a bit while Vic went into conference with studio heads who are hysterical over his enlistment. Seems every time 250 extras are called in to surround Vic in a scene, the Coast Guard phones and orders him to report for a radio broadcast or publicity stills. The extras stand around and wait for Vic's return—and production costs soar!

Vic denies it, but the story persists that he disobeyed his first official order. He was summoned to the pool of the Ambassador Hotel to try out a new overall life-saving suit. Instructed to jump in the deep end of the pool, Vic replied: "How do I know this thing works? I might drown!" And he waded in from the shallow side!

Met Cary Grant, giddy as a kid, strolling across the lot. Took a look-see at his wedding band, which is plain gold, same as his wife's.

Spotted a darling little boy on the "Here We Go Again" stage. Lucky thing I didn't chuck him under the chin. Turned out he's Jerry Maren, a twenty-two-year-old midget and Charlie McCarthy's stand-in! His last job was in Paramount's "Road To Morocco." He wore a fur suit and played a baby chimpanzee!

Speaking of Paramount—understand Paulette Goddard put the studio in a dither by going off to Mexico again. Mexico is Paulette's haven when anything goes wrong, and her friends believe she's not too happy about the betrothal of Harry Hopkins, President Roosevelt's right hand man, and Mrs. Louise Macy.

Thurs. July 23rd: Billy Halop phoned. He's off to the Army Air Corps and his departure will probably mean the end of the Dead End Kids. His beautiful Valley home is up for sale, and his romance with Georgianna Young will be laid away for the duration.

To Paramount with Kirt Baskette to interview Alan Ladd. Hope the fans never see Ladd as we did. He'd be a double dose of disappointment to anyone who thinks he's a leering menace off-screen! Actually, Alan's blonder and younger than he photographs and looks more like a shy, college kid than a potential killer.

Sat. July 25th: Met Ronald Reagan in a filling station. Asked him about posing for pictures for MODERN SCREEN. Said he'd be happy to oblige old friends, but he'd have to consult his superior officer first.

On to Brentwood for an interview with Shirley Temple. Found Shirley entertaining the Mayor and Police Chief of Santa Monica. They were there to present her with a gold plaque in appreciation of her bond-selling efforts. (CONTINUED ON FOLLOWING PAGE)

When they left, Shirley told us she was at the beach yesterday and came home with her shoulders sunburned and sore. Even the soft-textured pink dress she wore hurt her skin. Get into a pair of the new carduray pedal-pushers and give no ground to the "What is it anyway?" stares. Laok even ¾ths as smart as pretty, trim-figgered Katherine Booth, and you won't need to lean on the how-patriotic, how-very-comfortable crutch.

FOR THE

On the Fashion Front

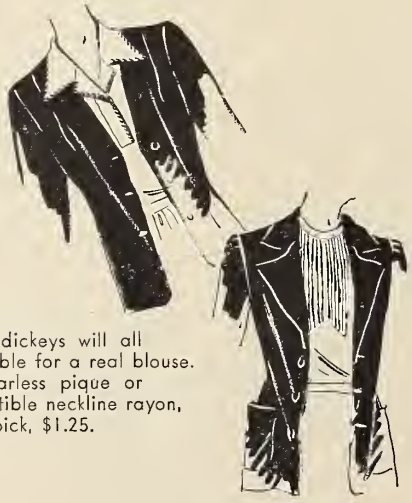
Make up your mind. Right now before even one mistake sneaks into your closet for the prize-winning leer of the season.

Give all the new wartime fashions and fads the eagle-eyed twice-over. Once isn't enough. Once makes you want the coat meant for the creampuff down the street, or the suit that really belongs to Tweedy. A good, hard second look brings you into focus, and you begin to sort out what goes with you.

But don't automatically pigeonhole yourself even if you think you know your formula. You might lose out on a bright new novelty like the stole shawl, because you think it old-fashioned and you've never worn one. The 24-by-72-inch shawls are all wool or wool mixture, but smart, not just warmers for a too-cold room.

If, like the two stars shown on these pages, you love unusual shoes, be first to wear one of the new, wood-soled types.

Take the loveliest, most becoming of Allied fashion inspirations for your own.



These two dickeys will all but dauble for a real blouse. White collarless pique or convertible neckline rayon, take your pick, $1.25.

Acquire another corduroy this fall and put it through the paces. Arleen Whelan shows how, adding tawn shaes and her favorite lapel pin to a simple suit of forest green.

MODERN MISS

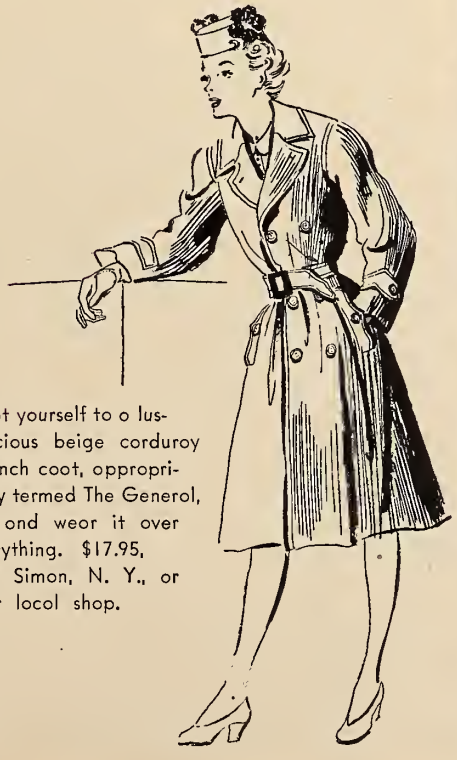
by Elizabeth Willguss

Perhaps a color like Chinese blue, the blue of the turquoise in their silver jewelry. Or one of the peasant-inspired coifs. Or a Cossack shapka in felt with matching velvet.

And keep right on wearing cotton, our country's choice, but of course that means warm velveteens and narrow-to-wide wale corduroys for the winter.

Worried over the first millinery reports? The importance of big, big hats, hats that sit firmly on the back of the head? Don't be alarmed. The most exciting head news is young and made for you, like the heart-shaped pillbox in beige, encrusted with material to match your teddy bear coat; like the witch's hat, crocheted with high crown and a broomstick ornament of feathers.

Finished your second look and made up your mind? Know just what you want? Go ahead, then; but, remember, buy them and love them or leave 'em alone!



Treat yourself to a luscious beige corduroy trench coat, appropriately termed The General, and wear it over everything. $17.95, F. Simon, N. Y., or your local shop.

Watch for separate jackets like this soft, rabbit's hair mixture shown on Katherine Booth. Comes in Victory purple, Chinese cherry, blue and green. Only $5.95 at your favorite store and a colorful, perfect answer to WPB's "no-dress-with-jacket" ruling.

If there's always room in your sweater drawer for just one more cardigan set, you're like Paramount star, Arleen Whelan, who wears sweaters and skirts or a suit to the studio. The set she models above is bright red, pure wool with tricky design, at $3.50.

All the foregoing is your spinach, too, about-to-be-freshman. And so's this.

When you get to college, be slightly aloof for a while. Instead of pouncing on the first soul who looks friendly, sit back and see which ones look like extra good fun. Be pleasant to everyone, but make friends slowly. If you simply can't tolerate the roommate they dole you out, effect a quick divorce early in the game. If you once get chipping in on curtains, electric grills, etc., you're sunk. Be nice to the sophomores, and maybe they'll throw a couple of cast-off men your way.

You're going to sit in on some pretty hair-raising bull sessions the first few weeks, and you'll hear some big talk about men and drinking and religion and life. Don't swallow it all whole. If you hear anything that sounds sensible, think it over and incorporate it in your own philosophy.

So you begin your first job this month! You can type like a dervish and take shorthand from Walter Winchell, but still you know you'll get fired the first day for having too many legs and thumbs. G'wan. Here's how to let them think you're an oldie at the game.

The most important item of all is to know you look all right. Wear a business-like dress and a tried and true hair-fix. This is hardly the time for anything Dietrich. Bring a comb, lipstick and powder with you, as nothing turns your co-slaveys against you faster than cosmetic-borrowing. Get there on time, so's you'll have a minute to pull yourself and your desk together. Don't make personal calls on the office phone. After you've been there a while and you see that everyone else does it, okay. See what the office policy is before whipping out the old cigarette case.

If you finish your work quickly and nothing new seems to be forthcoming, don't heckle your associates for busy work. Straighten up the files or something until you're given further chores. Don't flirt with your boss, or loll in the shadow of the water cooler chinning with the male element. They do it in the movies, but not in real life and remain employed.

All of which probably sounds like something by the Voice of Experience. Don't think it ain't—and, honest, it works!.

CALL TO COLOR

Seeing Red!

The shade of your lipstick is governed by so many factors—your hair and eyes, skin tones, dress, rouge, powder and yes, even the shade of your teeth—that it takes a braver woman than we to make any hard and fast rules. See MODERN SCREEN's Smile Chart for lip paint colors, and remember that for after-dark glamour, you need a bluer shade than in the daytime, because artificial lights fade orange tones.

You can paint your lips with a free hand, for there is nothing in the new lipsticks that is essential to the war effort. Lipstick cases will shed their shiny metal holders for the duration, but plastic, wood and cardboard will take its place. As for the lipstick paste, nothing will go in it that our soldiers and sailors need.

Talking about those crimson magic-wands, have you ever given a thought to the fixin's? Well, listen my children, to the story of the lipstick. Basically it's a mixture of essential oils, lubricants, dyes and fixatives. But not just a hit-or-miss arrangement. Oh, no! The stick needs a melting point high enough to defy varying temperatures of storage and use; yet low enough not to be brittle and crumble. It must also be of the proper consistency to withstand its daily use. Too hard, it will break in two; too soft, it will lose its shape and smear on the lips. That's quite a lot and besides, they must be made with certified materials that won't poison you or your lips, and carefully chosen colors that will hold their shade. So have more respect for your lipstick the next time you flourish it in front of your mirror.

If your lips crack or peel, cover them at night with a rich emollient to soften the surface skin. In the daytime, be sure they're protected with lipstick or lip pomade, because once they're accustomed to a protective covering, exposure to the elements makes them chapped or rough.

How's Your Smileage?

Now that your lips are so luscious, they're not going to be beautiful but dumb, are they? In the course of a few hours you may talk, eat, smoke, kiss your best beau, smile or (horrors!) pout—so don't mar your lip beauty with careless, un-ladylike habits.

Your smile moulds your lips as firmly as your lipstick. So perk up the corners in a friendly grin . . . and make it a big one! There's nothing grimmer than a half-hearted smirk you could wipe off with the lipstick. See to it, too, that your teeth are always gleaming. To be positive you've not missed up on tooth-sparkling, read Jeanne Cagney's recipe on page 44.

Another gauge of character is your use of lipstick. Smeared, blurred, caked, smudged on teeth or napkins and towels—and you are careless, thoughtless, sloppy, and we'll waste no time on you except to say, mend your ways. Give your lips a neat, clean, artistic outline, with perfect color and fastidious mouth habits, and you'll be the girl who's well groomed, poised and charming. For you, the slim, scarlet lipstick is today's call to color!

Before you wield your lipstick or any make-up tools, glamorize your skin with a flattering foundation. Hampden Powd'r-Base is a magic stick that cleverly conceals unwanted freckles, minor skin faults, or a summer-parched complexion. It goes on smooth as a breeze, and holds powder and rouge in a firm, faithful grip. Powd'r-Base comes in luscious lively shades to glorify drab-looking skin tones.

OFFICE OF DEFENSE
WOMEN'S VOLUNTARY

Applying the principles of good nutrition to our daily diets is one of the most important "Voluntary Services" we can perform for our country, says Jeanette MacDonald.

With hubby, Gene Raymond, serving with the armed forces, Jeanette MacDonald feels she has compelling reasons for doing even more than her share to further our national war efforts. When we met, Jeanette was about to leave on a concert tour for the USO—her itinerary including camps "Deep in the Heart of Texas" and back East as far as Illinois. Can't you imagine how thrilled our boys will be to have this charming star entertain them for over an hour with songs that they've always loved to hear her sing on the screen!

Once this ambitious camp-visiting program has been completed, Jeanette will be back in Hollywood, working once again as a member of the American Women's Voluntary Services—whose trim uniform she wears with great distinction, as you can plainly see. Among the activities of this group of progressive women that interest Jeanette greatly are the courses they offer on such things as Physical Fitness, Air Raid Precautions, and Nutrition. It was this very course on Nutrition, Jeanette assured me, that made her realize, as never before, the star role played by food, on the home and production fronts.

"Food is of such vital importance, these days," said Jeanette, "that all patriotic people should learn all they can about every item on our Government's Nutrition Chart." (The one, incidentally, in front of which Miss MacDonald obligingly posed.) "Take the first item on this Chart" she continued, "MILK! 'Oh yes, fine for children,' we say and think that we have covered the subject; entirely overlooking the benefits that milk has to offer to people of all ages."

Right, Miss MacDonald! And the facts about milk that they taught you in those Nutrition classes should be better known to all. Because no one ever really outgrows the need for milk. And yet, how many of us overlook that first rule on the Official Food Chart: At least a pint of milk a day for everyone—more for children.

Yes, milk should play an important role in the diet of each and every member of the family. The baby begins life with milk which supplies calcium and phosphorus to harden his bones and build his teeth. Vitamins and other essentials in milk insure the normal, healthy growth of each little organ and muscle in his body. While before baby comes, mother should drink milk—a full quart and a half daily—to supply the needed calcium for his teeth, and to protect her own.

The growing boy or girl requires a quart of milk a day to develop muscle, build sound teeth and grow sturdy and strong. The young adult continues to need the minerals, vitamins and other food essentials found in milk. No other single food will do as much for grace and beauty in a young woman; for vim and vigor in a young man—enabling him to push ahead in his studies, his job or in the armed forces.

Then, in the prime of life the modern woman wishes to retain her vitality and her figure so that she may take active part in the interesting life about her. The modern man desires above all else to maintain his energy, his drive, so that he can excel in his chosen profession. And milk will help them, too.

Of course, there are many ways to include milk in your meals besides drinking it. In the first place—as you will immediately note by looking at our Government's Nutrition Chart—cheese is highly recommended as a milk product. There are many kinds from which to choose, to add interest, flavor and food value to your meals. Ice cream also contains a large proportion of the food nutrients of milk. Butter should be included with meals because it adds immeasurably to food value as well as to flavor. However, because it contains only the butterfat portion of whole milk it cannot be used in place of milk!

We may, as our illustrations suggest, include milk in our meals in the form of cream soups, escalloped dishes, creamy casseroles and custards. Also in beverages flavored with chocolate, malt, vanilla, nutmeg, molasses and fruit juices to intrigue those for whom plain milk may not have great appeal. Besides these uses there are cream gravies, creamed vegetables, meats, eggs, and countless other possibilities.

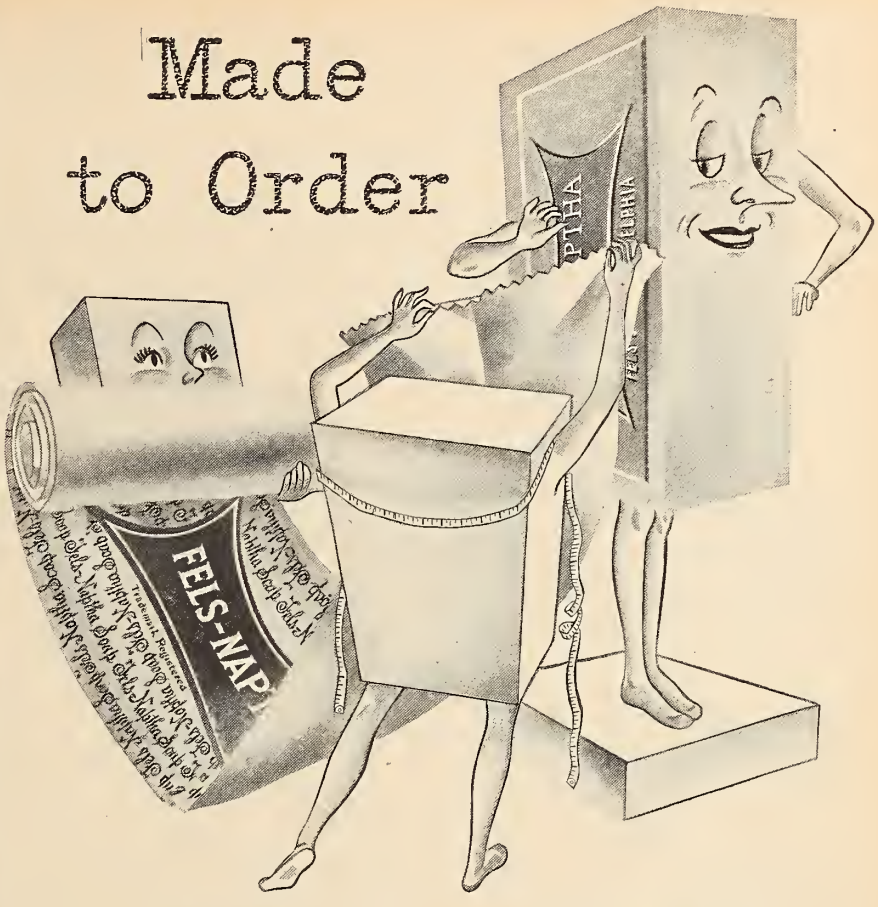
But to return to the important fact that no one outgrows the need for milk. "Why?" you may ask. Well, nationwide surveys have shown that calcium is one of the elements most often lacking in average American diets. This is because there is a sadly small per capita consumption of milk in the United States today—yet milk and its products are known to be the most practical sources of calcium!

In fact, in order to get as much calcium as would be furnished by a single pint of milk you would have to eat 19 eggs, 14 oranges, 3½ pounds of carrots or cabbage, or 13½ pounds of potatoes. (Imagine trying to get away with any such amounts as these, daily, to make up for a calcium deficiency!) We must remember, however, that other foods listed on the Nutrition Chart are indispensable sources for the other food elements which we also need.

To sum it up: Milk, according to Government Nutritionists, does more for the body than any other single food and does it more cheaply! The less money there is for food the more important it is to give the family plenty of milk and milk products because milk is our chief protective food—safeguarding the health of our children and contributing greatly to our general well being. Such considerations are not only of the greatest importance right now, but also mean much to the future of our country.

So decide today to establish the habit of drinking more milk, of including more milk and other dairy products in your meals.

Made to Order



It's a fact. The washing and cleaning job in most homes today is 'made to order' for Fels-Naptha Soap. Take your own home for example. You have less time to give to housekeeping. It's hard to get help. And you can't just let things slide.

So you use Fels-Naptha for the family wash. To get grimy work clothes cleaner. To wash linens and dainty garments (especially baby clothes) whiter. To get the whole week's wash done quicker.

You use Fels-Naptha Soap to make windows and glassware sparkle. To keep paints and porcelains bright. To take the backbreak out of heavy cleaning. And always—to save time.

We hope you use Fels-Naptha Soap like this. We know it's what many other women do in these strenuous times.

IMPORTANT! Today's Fels-Naptha Soap is better than ever. Making richer suds. Making them quicker. More helpful in reducing wash-day wear and tear.

The Modess Tampon

"I, CARY, TAKE THEE, BARBARA . . . "

A few moments later Cary Grant handed Mr. Romeis a check big enough to buy real organ music for Mr. Romeis' church. Mr. Romeis stood perfectly still for several moments. His face was a study in delight, surprise and gratitude. "There isn't anything I can say," he managed at last, "except that I know you will always be two of the happiest people in the world. May God richly bless you."

And he strode down the terrace toward the boat landing, flicking a sudden moisture from his eyes.

swooning junior . . .

In addition to Mr. Romeis there was another unexpected participant in the nuptials—a sun-tanned sixteen-year-old girl wearing a faded sweater, sneakers and a pair of blue jeans. She was lounging around the south shore in her motor boat when the photographers, press representatives from the studio, caterers and innumerable others began to arrive. The situation was acute. It looked as if it would take all day to transport wedding party, etc., to its destination. (Frank Vincent's home is on the north shore of Lake Arrowhead, and can be reached by one of the world's worst mountain roads or by crossing in a boat.)

The girl on the dock looked things over for a few minutes then boy-scouted to the rescue. "I'll help you transport some of your equipment, if you like," she said.

One of the more vocal photographers said, "Lady, you're saving me from a life of sunburn. When you grow up, remind me to kiss you."

"Are you on location here?" the girl asked.

As their mission was the darkest secret since the disappearance of Charlie Ross, the boys said, "Well, sort of," and skipped it.

"I'll bet you know my dad," said the extemporaneous ferry boat captain. "His name is Gene Lockhart. I'm June."

"Like father, like daughter," said the photographer. "I should have known that a swell scout like Gene would have a girl like you. In that case, I'll tell you a secret—all this to-do is caused by the Cary Grant-Barbara Hutton marriage, scheduled for high noon today."

"I'm swooning," quoth Miss Lockhart. "I mean I really am."

After all the people and provisions were transported, June hung around the Vincent boat landing, awaiting developments. One of the publicity men in her group of passengers had promised her a bite of wedding cake. He outdid himself by bringing her the groom instead. He had said to Cary, after the ceremony, "June Lockhart has been a little brick. If it hadn't been for her, it would have taken twice as long to get set up here. She's patrolling the boat landing right now."

Cary began to step briskly in that direction. "I want to thank her," he said.

So June, in her jeans and peeling sunburn, met her idol on his wedding day. The occasion was almost too crucial. She couldn't think of anything to say. She stood on one foot and then the other. Finally she burst out, "I sure hope you'll be awfully happy, Mr. Grant. I certainly do."

Cary patted her shoulder. "You've helped to give us a good start in that direction," he said.

She told one of the men whom she ferried back across the lake in the afternoon, "I'm going to remember this as long as I live. What a sen-sa-shun! Tell me all about the wedding."

It was a simple, unpretentious ceremony.

The Frank Vincent house (Mr. Vincent has long been Cary's business agent, adviser and intimate friend) is one of the most beautiful of mountain lodges. Its ceilings are high, its fireplaces huge, its rugs deep and brilliant. The entire south side opens upon a flagstone terrace. Spreading away from the terrace is a grassy slope that rolls gently down to a series of wide flagstone stairs. These descend to the boat landing.

On the grassy knoll there is a massive oak tree, and it was under this that the marriage rites were performed. There was no wedding march, no "Promise Me," no music of any kind. Barbara and Cary came out of the house together and joined Perry Lieber, head of RKO's publicity department and one of Cary's best friends. Mr. Vincent and Mrs. Hazeltine (wife of the sculptor) joined the group to talk about the weather and Cary's picture "Once Upon A Honeymoon"—the conversation was one of those helter-skelter things that suddenly died on the vine while someone took a quick look at his watch.

Both Cary and Barbara were so thrilled and excited that they couldn't see straight. Something was said about the tree under which they were going to stand. "It's a begonia," Cary said absently. No one bothered to kid him.

Barbara was wearing a navy blue silk moire suit, a shell pink blouse and a tiny hat that looked like a bowl spilling over with pink roses. Cary wore a dark grey suit with a tiny pin stripe. Someone said to him, "Cary, that's a terrific suit to wear to a wedding—it's really zoot."

Barbara tipped her head up to smile at him. "I'm so glad he wore this suit," she said. "It's my favorite."

And so they were married. The ceremony marked the end of some bitter experiences for both of them. They met, originally, in Europe—two people who would seem, at a glance, to have everything on earth that heart could wish, yet two people who were rather desperately unhappy.

Barbara had separated from her Danish husband, when she met Cary, and it was plain that there was going to be serious trouble over her divorce. Cary had never quite recovered from the shock of his divorce from Virginia Cherrill.

no bed of roses . . .

Life had never been particularly simple for either of them. Barbara's mother died when Barbara was five, and a tragedy of that kind alters the entire life of a child. Luckily, Barbara had a devoted governess, Mlle. Touquet (who was a wedding guest), who gave the little girl a foster mother's love.

Barbara was born to the limelight, and if you don't think that isn't the worst thing that can happen to a person, just imagine buying a paper some evening, only to find the worst picture ever taken of you plastered all over the front page, above a story that made you out a moron, if not a beast.

When Barbara was 15, her attorneys put ten million dollars worth of Woolworth stock on the market. It sent shares down seven points and cost the shirt of many a small investor, but—the attorneys announced—it saved the estate about two million. Naturally, Barbara didn't know, or understand, any more about the transaction than your kid cousin, Imogene, who is hep to the jive but a hooligan with jellybeans—the silver ones that make banks go jingle, jangle, jingle.

Whether she knew anything about it or not, she got the blame in newsprint. She was a chubby little girl in those days, and no camera flattered her. Her plump picture, accompanying the million dollar story, somehow gave the impression that she was waxing fat at the expense of others.

When she was 21, Barbara was swept off her feet by Alexis M'Divani, one of the Marry Mentors. That made her a Princess, but it didn't bring her happiness. She had "everything"—time and money for travel, an excellent cultural education, an altitudinous place in the world and a title. There were plenty of girls in dime stores all over the land who would have changed places with Barbara in an instant.

It was during the depths of the depression in this country, and pallid girls picketed the Woolworth stores with signs reading, "Could Babs Live On $8 per week?"

One of the girls said to the other, "My feet are frozen and my back is like ice. Boy, wouldn't I love a fur coat and a pair of fleece-lined boots! I'll bet Babs has never been this cold."

husband de luxe . . .

And the other answered, "Gosh, I'd sure like to be a Princess—some fun, huh?" Neither of the girls realized that Barbara Hutton had absolutely nothing to do with the running of the dime stores. Or that being a Princess wasn't so much fun after all. No one has ever doubted that the M'Divanis were superb suitors. They paid the prettiest compliments heard in four languages. But they were frightfully expensive husbands.

Alexis had just one aim in life: to be a ten-goal polo player. Getting this rating is almost as hard and dangerous as making ten touchdowns in every football game. Barbara sat in the stands one day and saw Alexis, who rode like a demon and was afraid of nothing on earth, thrown from his horse. He landed in a cramped, twisted position, and for a moment the spectators rose as one spine and gasped "Oh!" in horror.

That time he was only knocked out. Fate was reserving death on the polo field for his brother.

Alexis drove a car the same way he played polo—as if it were the last trip of his life. He would scare Barbara to death as he charged over the narrow French roads or leaped from promontory to peak as he scorched Italian highways on which might appear, at any instant, a leisurely peasant wagon occupying the entire middle of the road. "Alexis . . . please . . ." she would say against the gale.

Alexis told her not to be a drip—he knew what he was doing. So she huddled, small and terrified, in one corner of the big seat and prayed to be killed outright, not just maimed. Years later, it was another woman whose tongue was severed when the car Alexis was driving hurtled into a canyon wall in the Pyrenees. He was killed instantly.

Long before that happened, Barbara had divorced him. Cost: $350,000 per year. That was the settlement she made him, and—although she is entirely too gallant a woman to say such a thing—the price must have seemed cheap when she was free . . . and unharmed.

Still seeking love, protection, comradeship, Barbara married Count Haugwitz-Reventlow, a wealthy Danish nobleman. Money was of no interest to him, but prestige, power and Family were.

When little Lance was born February 24, 1936, he was jubilant. He said to the nurse, "A son, a son! The line is assured!" The nurse asked what he planned to name the baby. A shadow passed over his face. "That, we will not be able to decide until the mother's life is out of danger," he said.

The birth of her boy almost cost Barbara Hutton her life. Money and fame mean very little to Mother Nature—she makes her own arrangements, and for a time she seemed to have lost all interest in the slim, fragile, blue-eyed girl who was fighting for every breath. But the firm line of Barbara's chin is the key to her courage, and she had no intention of quitting. She wanted to live for that baby. Each time she drifted out of the haze of sedatives, she turned her head weakly to say, "Please let me look at my baby."

Two years later her marriage with the Danish Count was a thing of the past, but she wasn't free until late in 1941.

She must have made great sacrifices in an attempt to make this second marital venture a success, according to those who should know. For one thing, she renounced her American citizenship. No woman as deeply devoted to her native land as Barbara is, would do such a thing unless subjected to extreme pressure.

A friend said to her, "Every paper in the States has carried a story about your running out on your country. There's talk of dropping your name from the Blue Book. Fine thing."

Barbara, as usual, said nothing to defend herself. She's a quiet little body, according to her friends. And it didn't seem to occur to anyone that the fragile Hutton girl "who inherited the dime store millions" was also a flesh-and-blood woman who wanted to please her husband, to take care of her son's future, and to live the life of any happy wife.

But nothing she did seemed to work out just right—until she met Cary.

If a script writer had been writing a picture about a girl like Barbara, he would have had to invent a guy like Cary.

A blade of grass spending its life under a rock wants sun. And Hutton who'd spent a fortune in her day buying grief in titled packages, wanted Grant. They met in Biarritz. When you say it, put the accent on the last syllable. Cary's hep to the Ritz himself. He sports a topper as nimbly as you slip into a nightie. The average guy in his place, meeting the richest girl in the world, would have handed her a line.

Not Cary! Those dark glasses he wears filter out the glamour. Maybe she was an heiress to the rest of the world. To him she was just a pretty girl by the name of Barbara. "I've met your son Lance," he said. "You've got a great kid!" That's the way human beings talk to each other. It must have been a shock to Barbara. No polo. No Dali. Just "you've got a great kid."

She came to Hollywood to live then—to hug the sun, to thaw out. And Cary took charge of the job. He taught her how to be a kid. He, the British expatriate, showed Barbara what it's like to be an American. He had her cramming up on Yank specialties like July 4th, jitterbugging, hot foots. He and little Lance rough-housed plenty, and home wasn't just a place for the period furniture.

at long last . . .

Barbara and Cary thought they had found the real thing, but they wanted to be sure. So they let their romance age—mellowed it under many moons—tempered it with quarrels. Each day together became more precious, each moment more magical.

Above all, between them they rediscovered a theory that's as old as this country. Marriage isn't just a contract on a piece of paper. Marriage isn't for money and it isn't for titles or position. It's for love. It's for raiding the ice-box together. It's for laughs and kids and sharing heartaches.

It's finding something bigger and finer than yourself and your possessions. It's like the Cary Grants!

YANKEE DOODLE DOTTIE or a cigarette. She couldn't do anything but sit, feeling trapped and helpless. Like the boys at Hickam, she thought suddenly—caught trapped and helpless and unprepared.

That was when the idea hit. Sitting up abruptly, she grabbed at Peanuts to keep him from tumbling off her lap. "That's what they need," she told him excitedly. "Guns and bombs and planes. Much worse than songs, they need 'em. Why don't I go out and ask people to buy 'em?"

She put her plan to Y. Frank Freeman, boss of Paramount. He reminded her that she'd have to face crowds, make speeches—a special art.

"Worst that can happen, I'll make a fool of myself. So what?"

my country 'tis of thee . . .

A representative came out to talk things over. Dottie sketched her ideas, and ultimately they formed the basis for her tours. Only one radical change was made. She'd been all for raking in the big dough, descending on Wall Street, prying the tycoons loose from their moola. Fine, said the Washington man. If she could get a pledge for a million, take it. But more important than bankers were thousands of plain Americans, more important than Wall Street were shops and factories, far more important than the occasional heavy sugar was the payroll savings plan. Hammer at the payroll savings plan, he told her, because it's like this. If you'd undertaken to buy a house, you'd have to know there was so much coming in every month to cover the costs. The government must buy materials of war or perish. They've got to know there'll be so much coming in every month to cover the bills. Only the payroll savings plan could give them that assurance.

The details were ironed out and submitted to Secretary Morgenthau, who said go ahead. Soon after, Dottie was on her way, with the little speech whipped up by herself and the treasury man which she planned to read. Her maiden appearance on the first trip was at City College in New York. A sea of grinning young faces lifted expectantly to hers. She thought she'd die. Her legs wobbled, her hands shook, her voice stuck in her throat. Whose idea had this been anyway?, she wondered wildly, forced her mouth open and started reading.

"I'm doing all right," she decided and found courage to raise her eyes as she reached the stirring line: "We've got to fight together. I mean you and me."

Came a concerted "WOW!" from her audience. "Where's your sarong, Dottie?" they yelled.

For one moment she contemplated flight, then she got mad. Picking up her speech, she turned it face down and waited for the uproar to subside. When she spoke, her voice was clear and steady. "Okay, kids, you asked for it. Here it is."

She told them about two boys she'd met in Honolulu—what they'd looked like, who their folks were, how they'd rumbaed with her and hoped they'd be going home for Christmas. "They liked to kid, too—who doesn't?—but they're dead now, and they're the reason I'm here, so I don't feel funny. Nobody knows how long this war will last, but it won't have to last very long to catch up with you. If it doesn't, all the more reason for you to stand behind the guys who are catching it now. You've all got lunch money on you. Well, lunch on a glass of milk today—that'll give you your vitamins—and spend the rest for war stamps." She pulled out a bill. "Here's my lunch money."

The roar that went up that time made the first one a murmur. Uncle Sam collected eleven thousand bucks at the college that week, and Dottie never read another speech.

She's seasoned to all emergencies now, having finished a second tour—seven packed weeks of one-night stands. A typical day was the one spent at Gary, Indiana, population 100,000. Yet 60,000 marched in the parade, and 125,000 lined the streets, so you figure it out.

Declaring a war-bond holiday, Gary had closed its schools and banks. Dottie arrived at nine-thirty, rode in the back of an open car with a soldier, a sailor and a marine, marines flanking the car, the navy marching ahead, the army behind. People yelled her name, and she waved and yelled back with such fervor that, but for the rescuing clutch of her companions, she'd have fallen on her face a couple of times. "Hi, Dottie!" they'd shout, or "Hi, Babe!" Never Miss Lamour, or even Dorothy. That, she says, was the nicest compliment they paid her.

Luncheon with the town officials. Then to the steps of City Hall, where she stood for hours while people filed by and bought bonds. Autographs were out. She couldn't give one without giving all, which would have interfered with business. This she always explained at the end of her three-or-four-minute speech. "Okay, Dottie," they'd yell, and the few who tried to slip something over were slapped down by their neighbors.

An evening rally, addressed by the Governor, by army and navy men, by Dottie. The president of the United States Steel Corporation, having gathered all the pledges made by his men, produced a check for $2,280,000. Dottie's squeal of joy carried over the loudspeakers. So did the kiss she planted on the president's cheek. "I didn't know

The Davis Twins, United Air Lines Stewardesses, tell how Pepsodent Tooth Powder came between them.

"We're typical twins, Athalie and I. Look alike, dress alike, share the same problems of mistaken identity. We've always been together on everything...except once. That was the time I 'divorced' my twin . . . for test purposes only. I switched to Pepsodent Tooth Powder. Athalie went right on using another well-known brand."

"Even when we dressed alike, people began to know us apart. My teeth became twice as bright as my twin's . . . thanks to Pepsodent! It was easy to tell who was who . . . but not for long. Athalie had enough of our trial separation. So she switched to Pepsodent, too. And is she glad! Nothing but Pepsodent for us from now on."

checks could be written that big."

It was her only kiss of the tour, popping as it did from the fullness of her feelings. "It's for all the men," she explained. On principle, she's opposed to exchanging kisses for bonds, feels it puts emphasis where emphasis doesn't belong. "Ten thousand for a kiss," someone would offer.

"Ten thousand for your country," she'd amend with her sweetest smile, and the sheepish bidder would come up and sign.

Among the speakers that night was a young ensign named Jennings Walker. Beginning by saying, "I'm a nobody representing everybody in the armed forces," he used the kind of language that opens men's hearts. Faith shone in his eyes, rang in the force and simplicity of his words and stirred a response in kind. Dottie was one of the sixty thousand he held spellbound, and the first to start cheering when he'd finished.

She left for Cleveland at eleven-thirty that night and, by her request, Ensign Jennings made the rest of the tour with her. "He's in uniform," she said, "besides being a better speaker. He can do lots more than I can." When it was suggested that he might steal her thunder, she didn't even get mad. "That's the kind of crack you just don't bother to answer. We're out to sell bonds. If an organ grinder's monkey can sell 'em better, Jennings and I'll both take a back seat."

She grew expert at gauging the mood of an audience. There was the group of factory workers who eyed her with critical aloofness. She knew what that meant. "Movie star!" it meant. "She can talk about giving ten per cent!" it meant. "She can give ten per cent and still buy a fur coat."

"I know what you're thinking," said Dotty. "Okay, I'm a movie star. Okay, I can give ten per cent and still buy a fur coat. Only I'm not buying coats, I'm buying bonds. Because I'd rather buy the arm or the leg or the life of an American boy than anything else on the market today. What's more, I wasn't always a movie star. I used to run an elevator. I used to work in a factory. I used to go without lunch because I needed the twenty cents to have my heels straightened. I'm telling you this, so you'll understand I'm not talking through my hat. I know what a dollar means to you, because it once meant as much to me, and maybe more. But if I were still running an elevator, I hope I'd take anyway half of that twenty cents and buy me a stamp and walk on my crooked heels for a while longer."

There was more, but that gives you an idea. The factory pledged itself 100 per cent to the payroll saving plan.

mighty melody . . .

She offered them no entertainment. But often a voice would cry, "Give us a song, Dottie."

"Come on up," she'd say, "and we'll sing together." Up he'd go, abashed but loving it. Linking arms with him, she'd start "God Bless America." His tentative tenor would come in on the second line but by the time they reached "from the mountains to the prairies," he and the crowd were both in full voice. It made a fine send-off.

One of the biggest thrills came in New Orleans, when Mr. Higgins of the famous shipbuilding company, attired like his men in shirtsleeves and overalls, said, "No need for any pep talk, Dottie. As a tribute to the home town gal, we've signed up a hundred per cent. That's our way of thanking you for coming back to see us."

The government paid twenty millions to build the California Shipyards in Wilmington. "Here's a wire," the president told the men, "which, with your permission, I'd like to send to the President of the United States. 'We're going to buy this plant back for you in war bonds.' Is that all right with you guys?" The roar that went up from twenty thousand throats left no room for doubt, and left Dottie limp with emotion. "Men putting ten per cent of the first money they've earned in years and all their overtime into war bonds!"

The trip had its humors, too. There was the Italian who held up his four-year-old and beamed, "I'm raising her to take your place in pictures."

"I'll cut down one of my sarongs," she promised, "to start her off right."

There was the little girl in Longview, Texas, who handed her a bag. "I think it's eighteen seventy-five, but you'll have to count it." It was eighteen seventy-five all right—in pennies. There was the woman who poked her nose into the car and went, "Whew! Look at those fingernails."

"Oh, well," sniffed her friend, "she doesn't have to wash dishes."

Dottie grinned. That same afternoon she'd washed her girdle and stockings in the bathroom, since her packed program left no time for sending laundry out. She was also tickled by another feminine critic who took a look and remarked, "She's not so hot." Annoy her? Why should it? "She was right," says Dottie. "Only I did want to tell her that I look better clean."

She'd turned down the suggestion of a uniform, feeling they should be worn only by those in the service. Part of her wardrobe consisted of a blue suit and three blouses—white, blue and red—with turbans to match. She worked eighteen hours a day and, if she was lucky, got six hours sleep. There are cleaner spots than factories and street corners, where most of her time was spent. Even at hotels you can't get a suit pressed in less than half an hour, and her free half hours were rare and unpredictable. When they came, she'd dash home, bathe, change her blouse, get out her traveling iron and press her suit on the floor. When her hair got too grimy, she'd wash it at night. "And grab more sleep," says she, "than the boys on Bataan."

For every heckler, there were thousands of the other kind. The little old lady of seventy-five, an invalid so she couldn't come to the rally, but she'd crocheted a gadget of red, white and blue bells on a gold pin, and would Dorothy wear it? She wore it throughout the trip. The colored folk on Chicago's South Side who responded with such a surge of warmth as she'd never felt from any other crowd, and subscribed a million dollars within thirty days. The German-born American who came up with a fistful of bills and hoped that one of them by some lucky chance might buy the bullet that would finish Hitler. Kids sent home from Pearl Harbor with a couple of bullet wounds, rarin' to get back. The woman in Gary who brought her a package tied up in ribbons, "because of what you're doing for America."

"I'm just doing a job like the rest of you. I don't want any presents." But the woman smiled and went on, and business was good, and Dottie couldn't stop to argue. Opening the package that night, she found two doilies edged with tatting and a linen pillowslip. "I made the doilies when I was thirteen," said the note, "and the pillowslip's been in our family for fifty years. They're the nicest things I had to give you."

That moved her most. What broke her heart were the people who'd lost their boys. The woman whose one son had died in action. Another was reported missing. Her clothes were shabby, her hands work-roughened, you knew she could ill spare the money she'd saved for a twenty-five dollar bond. The man whose only son, a twenty-one-year-old instructor in the air corps, had been killed in a crash. "What can you say? You can't say you're sorry. You couldn't even blame them if they felt, 'Well, my kid's gone, so just count me out.' But no, they stand there and smile and look brave and buy bonds for somebody else's kid. Then you think of people screaming about tires! Let 'em walk—let 'em crawl," says Dottie fiercely.

What impressed her most was the feeling of America. She left, a good American, and through contact with her countrymen, returned a better one. "If I hadn't loved my country before, they'd have made me love it. They'd come up to you—a butcher in his apron, with his sleeves rolled up—a guy in trousers and shirt and a workcap, with dirty hands—they'd never say much—but there was something in their eyes and the way they shook hands—a kind of steadiness and purpose and self-respect—as if they were saying, 'I'm part of this, count on me.' Well, you roll that up to a hundred and thirty million, Mr. Hitler, and see where it lands you.

"At first, going into those plants and shipyards, seeing girls like myself at the machines, seeing men dirty and tired and dripping with sweat, I'd think, 'Gee, how lucky I am.' After a while I began thinking, maybe I'm not so lucky, maybe they've got more than I have—solid ground under their feet, kids growing up, wives and husbands loving 'em all their lives—" She shook her head free of whatever clouds had gathered. "I don't know—anyway, I'm holding hands with them—and prouder of that than of being a movie star."

In Washington she met her other boss—Henry J. Morgenthau, Jr. When he thanked her, she said: "For what?"

"For a good job."

How good it was she doesn't know exactly, nor does she want the figures publicized. Because there are plenty of others, she says, who can do as well.

She worked hard for seven weeks, came back to work hard again in Paramount's "Star Spangled Rhythm" and Goldwyn's "They Got Me Covered." She can't wait to get through. Because she's impatient—not for the holiday she'd have earned in a warless world—but for the eighteen-hour grind of her third bond tour. Right now movies are just an interlude to Dottie. America's her job.

LANA WEDS!

up every second to look for the promised taxi, moaning, "Why don't they hurry?" Linda chewed what was left of her nail polish. Steve didn't know which end was up. Even Alan, the composed, caught the contagion and paced till the taxi arrived.

Wedding chapels—with signs that read, CEREMONIES PERFORMED IN 45—or 30—or 25 MINUTES—dot the road to Las Vegas. You walk in and they do the rest—arrange for the license, arrange for the minister or judge. It was before such a chapel that our travelers dismissed their cab. The woman in charge—small, thin and fluttery—recognized her clients and all but fell on her face. Her husband, the minister, was in town. She'd go phone him—lady in waiting . . .

"Thank you very much," said Lana, "but I'd like Judge Marshall to marry me." Judge Marshall had married her to Artie Shaw.

Well, her husband could do it as well as not. Well, all right, if they wanted Judge Marshall, she'd phone Judge Marshall. Followed a rambling conversation with the operator. Judge Marshall was tracked down. He'd meet them at the courthouse. The lady would drive them. No, thanks, they'd get a taxi. Oh, you couldn't get taxis, they'd much better wait for her, she wouldn't be a minute. With their earlier experience in mind, they thought maybe they'd better. Then she couldn't find her little girl's sun suit. Then she couldn't find her lipstick, and she did feel so undressed without lipstick.

At last they got under way. Alan had gone on ahead with the photographer. Sticky with heat, the girls had said nuts to swank and dumped their fur coats into his coupé. The flowers were there, too, to be picked up at the courthouse. Meantime they went jouncing along in a vintage De Soto. As between the road and the bride, their chauffeur preferred the latter, and kept looking back to tell Lana she knew exactly how she felt, and wasn't Henry Fonda a wonderful actor, and did he look anything like his pictures, and my! how she'd like to have his autograph and now, don't you worry a mite, she could drive this road blindfold.

They arrived intact at the courthouse. Judge Marshall was waiting. So was an AP man, who'd smelled out the proceedings. It was he who dreamed up the romantic note for Linda.

"How about making it double?" asked Lana, looking up from the license she was filling out. Lana's a great kidder. Both Linda and Alan gave out with a loud "no." But reporters don't like negatives, so the AP man rendered a free translation. "Not yet," he had Linda cooing, "but soon maybe." He should have heard Linda's comment on his performance, which wasn't cooed.

The preliminaries over, Judge Marshall shooed everyone out. After all the turmoil, it seemed heavenly quiet, with just the five of them and the secretary and bailiff. Lana slipped her engagement ring from the left hand to the right. It was a beautiful diamond in a heavy silver setting—Steve's ring which he'd had cut down to fit her finger.

This was to be a double-ring ceremony. Alan held Lana's, Linda held Steve's. They were exactly alike—wide, octagon-cut gold bands with thin bevelled edges inscribed "From Lana to Steve"—"From Steve to Lana"—followed by the initials of a phrase whose meaning they alone knew.

Lana's finger buckled when Steve tried to get her ring on. And her hands shook so that she couldn't get his on at all. "Oh, baby, help me," she cried.

The judge pronounced them man and wife. "Oh, Stevie!" she whispered. He just grabbed her.

Then the judge was handing over the marriage certificate, and they were all shaking hands, and then they were out on the steps and Alan was saying: "Don't stand here in the hot sun, Mrs. Crane," and Lana was squealing in ecstasy, "You're the first one to call me that!"

Not till they were sitting in a nice little place called The Apache having breakfast at last, did anyone think of the orchids, wasting their sweetness on the back seat of the coupé. "My wedding flowers!" gasped Lana.

"Never mind," Steve consoled her. "We're just as married." Eyes devouring his bride, he couldn't be bothered with the menu. "I'll have what you have."

She ordered orange juice, poached eggs on toast, little pig sausages and coffee. "And my husband," she added, tasting the words as if they were good to eat, "will have the same." The quietly starving Linda ordered strawberries, basted eggs, little pig sausages and coffee. Alan had French toast.

Their next stop was The Pioneer, owned by a friend of Steve's named Curland. Mr. Curland had ordered champagne. Alan proposed the first toast "to Mr. and Mrs. Stephen Crane." Then Steve pledged Lana, and Lana "my husband." A juke box had been grinding out something corny about not waiting up for me, I might not get home till three, so hang up the front door key. It broke off abruptly and after a moment's pause—Dum, dum, de-dum-dum, dum-dum—Mendelssohn's wedding march. Though it was only a juke box, Lana must have heard organ tones swelling, and her heart swelled with them and she wept on Steve's shoulder. Not till Mendelssohn made way for "I Love You Truly" did she lift her head and smile.

They drove out to Rancho Vegas. Steve started humming, his eyes teasing her—

"I got spurs that jingle, jangle jingle,
As I go riding merrily along,
And they sing, oh ain't you glad you're single?
And that song ain't so very far from wrong.
Oh Lanabelle—"

She clapped her hand over his mouth. "You mustn't sing it any more, we're married—" and promptly began singing it herself. He stopped her mouth, too, but not with his hand.

journey's end . . .

For old time's sake, Garwood Van, Rancho Vegas bandleader, claimed the privilege of kissing the bride. He was leading the Troc orchestra 'way back, when Billy Wilkerson, owner of the Troc, discovered Lana perched on the now famous stool in the drugstore. Perched on another stool at El Rancho, she phoned her mother. "Hello, baby. This is your married daughter. Say hello to your son-in-law." Then they wired Mrs.

Crane. Then there was barely time to make the three o'clock plane. And as Mr. Curland had provided Lana with her wedding march, Rancho Vegas provided rice, pattering on their shoulders, speckling Lana's golden hair.

Alan reclaimed the fur coats and the flowers—four white, purple-hearted orchids for Lana, two purple ones for Linda—a little tired by the time the girls got them pinned on. So was Linda, who fell promptly asleep, to waken just before they landed. In the mob of press and studio people and plain gapers, Lana saw only her mother. Mrs. Turner's second kiss went to the tall, hatless, blue-suited young man at whom more necks were craned than at Lana herself. After all, they knew who she was.

A celebration, planned by the Mocambo that evening, had to be called off. The newlyweds were much too worn out to celebrate. Dropping Linda at her apartment, Lana kissed her. "I'll do the same for you some day." Linda couldn't help feeling kind of empty as she fitted her key into the lock, dropped the silly fox coat, pulled off her hat and flopped into a chair. Reaction, she guessed, from too much excitement. She rose wearily and went to draw her bath.

Lana had the party at her home the following night. Linda went with Alan. Judy Garland and Dave Rose were there. None of Lana's other friends are in the movies. The bride looked radiant in white, her hair caught up at either side by a little cluster of valley lilies. She wore a matching set of pin, ring and bracelet in rubies and diamonds. The pin spelled out her name—L in jewels, ANA in gold. There was dancing and a buffet supper and a wedding cake, which Lana cut, with Stephen's hand over hers.

She spent a good part of the evening showing them all the house—the dream house that she's lived in for just a few months. "The only two things I'm proud of," Lana would say, "are my record collection and my house." She designed the furniture herself, chose the colors, had everything made to order. The lime-green rug in the livingroom, the oversize coral couches in front of the white marble fireplace, the chairs big enough for two to sit in, the drapes with their tropical design threaded in coral and lime, the cockatoos and flamingoes on the wall.

And her own room. "I think I've got the loveliest room in the world," she exclaims worshipfully. The deep-piled rug like white fur. The white wallpaper striped to look like grosgrain and satin. The dressing table ten feet long, its scalloped mirror—which had to be made twice because it broke the first time—finished with organdy ruffles edged in yellow. The froufrou lamps at either end of turquoise and rose. The huge chest covered in quilted chintz, with a radio to match. The bed with its scalloped headboard and nubbly spread of pale yellow tufted in white. A restless sleeper, she didn't want lamps on nightstands because she knocks them off. So there's indirect lighting over each pillow, artfully concealed by mirrors, and the bed extends itself into dainty nightstands, mirrored and skirted.

Her favorite spot's always been the pillow in front of the fireplace—a huge sponge affair like the kind used in swimming-pools, big enough to sprawl on and covered with the same material as the bedspread. There, on a wide low table, Miss Lana Turner would eat her breakfast of orange juice, toast and coffee, read the funnies and warm her toes.

Mrs. Stephen Crane won't. Mrs.

Johnny Hyde cuts himself a hunk of wedding cake while Lana and Steve look on! Mrs. Mildred Turner, Lana's mother, gave the reception at her Westwood home.

Stephen Crane seems quite happy to leave these lately acquired treasures for her husband's modest apartment on Olympic Boulevard. That's love and no kidding, as you'd realize if you'd ever seen Lana adoring her house. Whatever the wise guys say, and they're saying plenty, she's dead sure today that this is her guy.

Dead sure today is right, say the wise guys. Tomorrow's another day. Well, that's futile speculation. It's true that Lana's impetuous, that she acts first and thinks second. But then it works the other way 'round, too. So many marriages you'd have sworn would stick. Where are they now? Maybe twenty years hence Lana Crane will be sweetly thumbing her nose at the doubters.

Part of that doubt is rooted in a certain mystery surrounding young Mr. Crane. The papers—maybe in a laudable desire to glamorize a glamour girl's bridegroom, maybe to mask their own lack of information—came out with large tales unsubstantiated at this writing. The twenty-seven-year-old Crane was the son of a tobacco czar; he'd been a member of the New York and Chicago Stock Exchanges; he'd been married to an Indianapolis society girl; he was now associated with an important mercantile concern. One columnist, on the other hand, dished up the tidbit that he'd come to Hollywood to crash the movies. Guesses as to how long Lana knew him before she married him range from four months to nine days.

Out of the welter, only these facts are confirmed to date. That he comes from Crawfordsville, Indiana—went to a midwestern prep school called Crosley—was graduated from Wabash in '36, emerging as a crack swimmer and dancer (on his more scholastic activities the source is silent)—married and was divorced from Carole Kurtz, an Indiana girl—works for the David O. Bernstone Enterprises, an outfit owning food and beverage concessions at ballparks. A junior executive they call him, which sounds swanky and is vague enough to cover lots of territory.

Why the phony buildup, for which neither Lana nor Crane was responsible, nobody knows. It should be matter for rejoicing that a plain American kid's good enough for a movie star. The future lies in their hands to make what they can of it. Why curdle present joy with sour prophecies? In "The Mikado," when Nanki Poo marries his girl, though under sentence of imminent death, the chorus tactfully sings: "Long life to you till then." In the same spirit of good will, we sing long life to the wedded bliss of Lana and her Stevie. How long that will be is strictly their business.

I SAW IT HAPPEN

Ice-skating one afternoon, on a crowded Los Angeles rink, my companion and I heard that Joan Crawford was present. We were naturally anxious to catch a glimpse of her, but after scouting around for a while without result, we decided she had left. Suddenly I met her—very emphatically and head on! Might I add that I saw stars? Although I was happy that she was unhurt and that the accident gave me an opportunity to speak to her, I was very, very embarrassed.

YOU'VE GOT A RIGHT GUY WRONG

read about the Hollywood stars (I had to inform my friend) aren't necessarily so. For instance, it's high time someone exposed Victor Mature as one of the nicest, soft-hearted guys in Hollywood.

Vic, himself, wouldn't want you to know this. He tells the world he's as selfish as a shark. He cracks, "I'm all out for Mature!" He pretends to be several varieties of timber wolf crossed with an All American heel.

high-flyin' heel . . .

There's a method behind this madness, of course. Vic believes he's the type to hike to movie Heaven on his heels. And who am I to say he isn't right? It has certainly paid off in publicity, and he's hotter than a three-dollar pistol right now. But he can't fool me.

There's a little restaurant right near the Pasadena Community Playhouse, which supplies the movies with so many young stars. Vic spent his starvation years at the Playhouse sleeping in a piano box and living from handout to mouth. He got 42 cents a day salary and sometimes not that. He got down to 160 pounds which is almost Gandhi-weight for the great big guy, and he'd have dropped lower if it wasn't for a waitress in this certain hash house.

I don't know her name, but we used to call her "Garbo" because she wore a long page-boy bob. Anyway, in Vic Mature's hunger years, Garbo made out checks for dime double-cokes and slipped Vic a full meal instead.

It must have been two or three years ago that I dropped in that resturant. About the time Vic Mature got his first break with Hal Roach. Garbo brought over the menu, and she was walking on air. "Look," she bubbled, and yanked a money-order out of her bosom. "Sixty dollars! Vic Mature sent it," she said, "with a swell note of thanks I've already got pasted in my memory book. He's got a break in Hollywood—seventy-five bucks a week! So out of his first check he sends me sixty!"

Frankly, I like a guy like that—particularly in Hollywood where "I knew you when" to most phonies is a terrifying phrase. But Vic—despite all he does to scatter the impression—is absolutely no phony. He's not only loyal to every pal who has pitched for him in the past, but now that he's in the box himself, he's unhappy if he isn't straightening out somebody else's headaches—usually the headaches of a little guy.

There was the little radio actor I talked to the other day and this was the story he told: A while back he got his first chance at a picture part at Twentieth Century-Fox. Naturally he was flustered and, to make things worse, the day of his Big Moment the stars were fluffing their lines. Vic Mature was one of them. The blow-ups continued through five camera takes until the stars were getting hysterical about it and the director sore as a boiled owl. On the sixth try, everybody was perfect except the bit player. This time he muffed it higher than the Himalayas. The director exploded with a tongue lashing that he'd never dare direct at a star. "I give up!" he cried, "break up the set! We'll try again after lunch!"

Yes... she was born with a lovely skin

...So were you

Hers is lovely today

.....Is yours?

You can't explain a beautiful skin by saying, "Oh, she was born with it." That isn't all of the story. You may be very sure a beautiful skin is the object of special care.

If your skin is not quite what it ought to be today, try giving it the special care that thousands of women depend on. With two special creams which are different—because they contain the famous Phillips' Milk of Magnesia.

PHILLIPS' MILK OF MAGNESIA SKIN CREAM

Used at night this remarkable cream does two things: (1) softens and neutralizes any external acid accumulations in the pore openings; (2) retains moisture in the skin and so helps to keep it soft, supple, free from dryness.

A smooth lasting foundation, too. Phillips' Skin Cream seems to have a special affinity for make-up. It prepares the skin—removes excess oiliness or relieves harsh dryness so that powder and rouge go on evenly and last.

PHILLIPS' MILK OF MAGNESIA CLEANSING CREAM

This cleansing cream is different! It not only absorbs surface dirt but cleanses away accumulations which may lodge in the outer pore openings. See how clean and refreshed your skin looks and feels! Give these creams a chance to help your skin.

The actor felt like crawling into a coffin right there. But Vic stepped in.

"Not me!" he said. "I won't do it after lunch. I'll do it right now. Why don't you pick on somebody your size?" he asked the set boss. "You know its our fault, not his. But he can't answer back and we can! He'll get it right this next time. Let's go!"

But the director was raging. "After lunch," he repeated.

"Okay," said Vic, "without me. And I won't be back till you treat this guy right!" He walked off the set and never showed up either until the director had had a change of heart!

good samaritan . . .

The truth is: Vic Mature, whether he realizes it or not, is a genuine humanitarian. The reason behind it probably is selfish. He's lost without someone to help along. He's unhappy without an altruistic cause. He surrounds himself always with mixed-up people and tries to straighten them out. The other day when a close friend of his, a Hollywood writer, busted up with his wife, Vic ran right over and grabbed him by the lapel. "Now don't go to some dam' lonely hotel," he urged. "Move in with me. You're gonna be a little confused for a while and besides," said Vic, just for an argument, "hotels are expensive." To make his friend feel okay, he set the amount of money for board, although he didn't want the money. But he's pretty anxious about other people's feelings.

In this connection, I'm thinking particularly about a little Hollywood actress I know who has never quite made the grade here. Last season she got a chance at a Broadway show. It was the grandest event of her life, by far. Vic knows her, too, and he heard the news. Now, Hollywood is a little far from Broadway, and it isn't easy, with all the movie whooptedoo, to keep abreast of Manhattan first night schedules. But on Vic's mind was the picture of this girl, friendless in New York, having her first opening night with all the Broadway stars about her getting flocks of flowers and bushels of wires and gushing tributes, and she, like Cinderella, getting nothing and a lot of it.

I didn't see the flowers he sent her, but she said they were gorgeous. I did see the wire. It showed Vic had put some thought on it, and the girl told me she was lonely, she did feel neglected and she was plenty thrilled when the posies came with this telegram:

"If I were only near enough to Saks-Fifth Avenue I'd pick out a dozen Madeira lace hankies and send them to you this opening night with this card: Good Luck, Darling—and—DON'T BLOW!"

friends in need . . .

Betty Grable showed me another Mature memo, also on the thoughtful side. When Betty was laid up in the hospital a while back with a bum side and an operation to fix it, her flowers arrived from Vic with this message—using titles of Betty's pictures.

"Dear Betty: I hope by now you're singing "The Song of the Islands" (because you were "Strictly Dynamite" doing that) and that your days of "Waking Up Screaming" are all over now. Love."

Vic builds himself up florist bills of $150 a month keeping people thought of. But it isn't the money he spends that spells good guy to me. It's the thought behind them and the pains he takes to put some personal tribute into the gesture. That makes him the McCoy.

But about these philanthropic causes of Vic: You'd gather if you didn't know the guy that the only interest Mature has in life is Mature. It's true that he is the one star in Hollywood who regards the whole glitter carnival as a business, and one of the rare ones who figures unashamed publicity is only good bookkeeping. But the real Vic is always wrapped up in somebody else.

There was this amateur Edison. Everyone thought the fellow was strictly from the hickory tree. He was the friend of a friend of Vic's, and he had some kind of an idea he was hipped on. Everyone shied away from him—except Vic. Like most wool-gatherers, Edison, Jr., was a bit eccentric. But Vic saw in him a chap who needed slapping on the back. He not only welcomed the opportunity of telling the inventor he was terrific seven days a week—he had him move in with him and scatter his apparatus around the apartment until the place was a shambles. And so—one day the inventor up and sells his Great Idea for $50,000! He gives Vic the credit.

There are cases and cases. Since Vic Mature takes out more different Hollywood stars than any six other guys, there's no way to trace the identity of this one. So I'll tell you about her. She was in a pretty bad way. A certain producer had the Indian sign on her, and he was making life miserable. He was beauing her around but at the same time beating her down. Everything she did was wrong. Everything she said was silly. She didn't know anything; every idea she had smelled. And so on. That kind of a guy. The girl, a swell one with talent galore, began to think maybe she was a moron, a double dope, and shouldn't be without a nurse.

Her self-confidence was being destroyed, and psychically she was mixed up like a chef's salad. To make matters worse, she'd married her kibitzer, and that was a fine pickle indeed! She was heading straight for the padded cell when something prompted her to confide in Vic one day on a set. I can't tell you much more without giving the answer away. But she's divorced now, and her career is something that's being written in big, blazing lights. Mature talked her back to confidence and courage to shake herself loose, and from then on she was a cinch.

I don't want to paint Vic as a Mr. Fixit or some kind of a Father Confessor in slacks. But that helpfulness is a trait you never hear about (he won't let you if he can help it). And another thing that may surprise you about Mature is this: Although you've read time and time again what a cagey operator he is, how shrewd and smart where the greenbacks are involved (and it's all true), still Vic himself has absolutely no private regard for the stuff.

Right now Vic is spending far more supporting his separated wife, Martha, and her baby girl, Helen, than he spends maintaining himself. All Martha's bills come to him, and sometimes they total around $900 a month. Vic doesn't resent this although there is no legal divorce settlement or anything to compel him to stand it. Helen, of course, isn't Vic's child, but the late Hal Kemp's. He's none the less crazy about her. He gives her parties, takes her on shopping sprees and has her over to his place as many times a week as Martha will let her come, to romp around the place and play with Vic's dog, "Genius." Once Vic bought Helen four new coats in one day. He's taught her all the songs in his pictures and calls her several times a day to hear her pipe them over the 'phone. Vic would spend his last cent on "Mrs. Townsend" as he calls the little angel. She was the baby girl he was taking to church, of course, when my columnist friend almost swooned.

financially speaking . . .

On himself, spending is a different story. Vic still buys old cast-off studio clothes at half price for his personal use. He lives in a far cheaper place than he supplies for his estranged wife. A while back when his father died and left more money than Vic will ever stack up, Vic insisted that all of it be placed at his mother's disposal. Before he died, Mature Senior wanted to will it to Vic. His wife, he felt, wouldn't know how to handle it and might lose it.

"No," vetoed Vic. "Then she'd feel dependent on me, and that wouldn't make her happy. Mother should have it outright. What if she does lose it? I'll make my own, anyway. All that dough might make me lazy."

Vic has a money adage he quotes today: "You'll never get rich on the money you spend." He contradicts it constantly by letting his dollars roll away from him. But—he doesn't actually spend them. He gives most of them away in some form or other. And when you get into the subject of wealth, Vic will very likely tell one of his favorite stories—about the miser who died thinking he could take his wealth with him to Heaven. The day of his funeral, his best friend noticed he had his fists clenched in the coffin. "By Gosh!" he exclaimed. "The old boy is taking it with him! He's got it right in his hands." Slowly he pried open the fists. Inside were a few pennies. All he could take was the money he had given away!

In spite of his what-the-hell press pose, there is a definite religious streak in Victor Mature. He's a devout Catholic, and he's always had a do-unto-others complex that is far from a pose. In Vic's early Hollywood days, when he was just getting by, he lived with three other fellows in a house. They shared expenses, of course, but Vic had a further idea. He called it "Group Insurance." All four agreed if any one of them lost his job, the others would kick in enough to give him $50 a week salary. Why? So he could keep his self-respect, self-confidence and go after another spot in the right frame of mind. It only happened once, by the way—but that was for nine months. All that time the unlucky brother got his $50 from the others, kept in fine fettle instead of slinking around, and ended up with a swell job, to prove Vic's theory of money morale.

Today anything that Vic has belongs to any of his friends for the asking. Often he's imposed on. Recently, a writer friend of his, out from New York, mentioned he was without a car that day. "Take mine," said Vic, tossing him the keys. The chap not only took it but kept it three days without saying a word to Vic. Vic never protested; he just took cabs.

At the Mature household, Vic never leaves the house of an evening without leaving money for his maid and cook to take in a show or buy some ice cream.

Maybe the oddest thing of all is Victor Mature's will, which he's just recently filed. In it he takes care of people he figures took care of him. He leaves money to his "Gestaffel" as he calls the little cabal of writers and press agents who are his chums—Lieutenant Walter Ramsey, USN, former Fox publicist, Yeoman Jules Seltzer, USN, former Hal Roach publicist, and an editor, Carl Schroeder. Vic also leaves dough to the Press Relief Fund and—for a sly gag—one-tenth of his "good-will" to Hedda Hopper (who doesn't like Vic).

Vic doesn't mind taking cracks at people in his league. He's no plaster saint oozing sweetness and light. But I've scouted around quite a bit without finding any instances where he's lorded it over lesser lights. On the contrary, I've heard him crack, "No guy is so big that he can afford to be small to little people"—quite a neat line in itself.

I think one of the nicest episodes I remember about Vic Mature occurred one noon at the Brown Derby. I was at the next booth and I saw it all. I'd always heard Vic was arrogant with women and had no more manners than a mule. I changed my mind right there when a lady about forty years old came up, pen and autograph pad shaking.

"Never done this before," she smiled shyly at Vic, who grinned back. She stuck out the pad and knocked a glass of water all over Vic, the table and his guests. "Oh!" she cried dismally.

"It just ain't homelike," chuckled Vic, "unless I spill a glass of water!" The waiter came scurrying up then just in time to see the lady's pen leak all over the table cloth and Vic's suit.

"An accident?" asked the waiter, ominously. The lady by this time was ready to end it all.

"Yep," said Vic blandly, taking the blame. "This damned pen of mine! I'm always spillin' ink. Just a big, clumsy clown, 'at's me!"

Now that, I think, was pretty nice and I know the lady will always have Vic down in her list of good guys. I could go on for pages like this telling you why he's already down on mine—all of which will make Vic pretty upset, because, like I say, he thinks he's more intriguing limned as as a louse. To the world, he'll be vain, dopey, self-centered and puffed up like a pouter pigeon, as long, I suppose, as he lowers those heavy lidded eyes before the cameras and pops off about himself to the press. But don't let him fool you.

I think of a certain director at Twentieth Century-Fox, Walter Lang. When Victor Mature came there right after the leopard skin and body beautiful stuff of "One Million B.C." he brought with him the reputation of being Joe the jerk from Albuquerque, sure enough.

Lang drew the assignment for Vic's first picture, and he wasn't a bit happy about it from what he'd been hearing. He went to the front office. "Look," he decreed, "I'll take that cream puff and treat him right. But the minute he starts acting up on my set, he leaves or I leave —in two minutes flat!"

Well, a week went by and one day Lang burst into the front office again. "Say!" he cried. "How in hell do these screwy Hollywood rumors start, anyway? Everybody tells me this Vic Mature is a wrong customer from all angles —and I never worked with a sweeter guy! Tell me—am I the one who's crazy?"

Take it from me—it's the rest of the world. But don't ever tell Vic Mature I told you he was a right guy. He wouldn't like it. He's phony that way!

Editor's Note—On Thursday, July 2, Vic enlisted in the Coast Guard a coxswain at $78 a month. He chose this particular branch because of his love for boats and a better chance for getting along with the other men. In his crew of six, it won't take the fellows long to find out he's really a sweetheart; whereas in the Army or Navy, he'd be associated with hundreds, and it would take the duration to make them like him.

An executive at RKO where Vic had been working in "Sweet or Hot," said he hoped the actor would be granted a furlough to complete the picture. However, Coast Guard officials said no such plans had been made as yet.

As far as Vic was concerned he wouldn't give out one word of information about his association with the Coast Guard. All facts came from official headquarters and Mature's personal friends.

First job after induction was posing for publicity pictures. He had no uniform so the studio lent him one.

Mature was given rating of coxswain, which is first rating of a petty officer, by successfully passing certification examinations, and a test to determine previous knowledge of boats and duties connected with them. He was always crazy about the water. Studied celestial navigation in military school and was on list of potential appointees to Annapolis. He hopes to be eligible for Officers Training.

He possibly will be assigned to a converted 50 ft. yacht "Barbill" (named after its former owners, Barbara and Bill). He reports to the Captain of the Port in Long Beach, and will be assigned to patrol duty.

Modern Screen and your many, many fans wish you the best of luck, Vic Mature!

Benny's from Heaven

But Jack's no angel! He's a Hellzapoppin' zany with the biggest line of gags this side of Allen!

Jack Benny (portered by Rochester) shells out 10,000 buttons in overhead for each week's airing. Manages to salvage 15 grand for personal services.

One day, not long ago, Jack Benny met a slight acquaintance in the halls of NBC's Hollywood studios and stopped for a chat. The man mentioned the wife of a mutual friend who was very ill. "Zat so?" murmured Jack vaguely, puffing his cigar. "H-m-m-m-m—too bad." Then he changed the subject and strolled on with an absent-minded "So-long."

The acquaintance stared after him and shook his head. "That guy Benny!" he muttered angrily. "What a selfish dope! All he cares about is himself and his show. He must have a cake of dry-ice for a heart!"

A week or so later the same man ran into the ailing woman, now up and about and bustling along the Boulevard. He said she looked swell and what was the hurry? "Got a date to meet Jack Benny," she smiled. "I want to thank him for being so nice!"

"Benny!" sputtered the gent, recalling the disinterested episode. "Good Lord, why Benny?"

Jane Wymon tagged along with the Benny party to San Francisco, for an eager squint at her handsome lieutenant husband, Ronald Reagan. Jack, Mary Livingstone and Don Wilson come to sprinkle with levity the dedication of the new NBC Radio City.

Jack and Ann Sheridan (on set of W.B.'s "Geo. Washington Slept Here") find Allen's gag book tough going. Benny's share of pie for each pic is 10,000 berries.

"It was the funniest thing," bubbled the lady. "I hardly knew Jack, you know. But one day when I was so sick, he showed up loaded with flowers and presents. He sat around all afternoon telling stories and making me laugh so hard I couldn't help get well. It was the day before his show, too. I know he was busy, and—well, I think he is swell."

Because he is modest, most people think Jack's stand-offish. Because he's shy, they call him cold. Because he plays tightwaddery for a radio gag, they'll tell you he's a penny pincher. Because he's gone absent-minded, wool-gathering on how to make folks laugh, they're sure Jack's distant, indifferent and selfish. Some call him stuck-up because he's been the number one chuckle champ for years; others paint him grass green with envy of Fred Allen, Bob Hope, Red Skelton or every other Joe Comic.

All of which is a lot of scuttlebut, as they say in the navy. If you don't believe me, you might ask Ann Sheridan.

Jack has just finished "George Washington Slept Here," with Oomphy Annie out at Warner Brothers'. Jack always makes buddies out of his movie leading ladies, and always before the picture is over they turn up on his radio show. Jack thought Ann would be particularly swell on a Sunday laugh spot, but when he suggested it, she shivered and shook.

"I'm allergic to radio mikes," protested Ann. "I'm likely to faint or draw a bamboozled blank and ruin your program. Sorry, Jack, but it's impossible."

Jack tried to soft-talk her out of it, but he saw Ann wasn't kidding. Mikes do convert her nifty knees to jelly and turn moths loose in her tummy. But Jack was convinced Ann would be terrific, and he had an idea. "Okay," he told her, "I'll write two complete shows—one with you and one without you—and rehearse 'em both. Then if you just can't go through with it at the last minute—well—you won't have to." And that's what he did—although it cost Jack a pretty penny and some horse-sized headaches, too, to double the order just to soothe Annie's nerves.

The first year that Jack's black Man Friday, Rochester, clicked on his program, he got a $10,000 check for Christmas. Every member of Jack's big staff, his writers, Bill Morrow and Ed Beloin, his entertainers, Phil Harris, Dennis Day, Don Wilson, and all the rest get regular raises on already fat salaries well above what their options call for. Nobody who has ever worked for Jack is happy with anyone else. His secretary, Harry Baldwin, has been with him 11 years. Two actors he brought out from Broadway several years ago haven't worked on Jack's show for months, yet every Saturday night their check is in the mail. On his army camp shows Jack personally foots all transportation and technical expenses, which run into four figures about every week. If I mentioned his private charities, I'd only embarrass a sensitive guy. But I can tell an incident on the "George Washington" set that happened just the other day.

They were collecting for a certain war fund around the Warner lot, signing up the various stars for various amounts. It was all on the cuff and in advance, but when Jack was approached he said—"Oh, sure," and reached in his pants pocket, extracted a roll of century notes big enough to choke a cow and said, "I don't know how much is in it, but take it. Wait," he added, peeling off a lone dollar bill. "I need gas to get home."

Most of this abundant generosity in Benny comes from the fact that he has little use for the green stuff except to pass it around. He has been so up in the chips for so long that he knows it isn't mere bank notes that count.

You wouldn't think a hardened entertainer would be sensitive about his comic stock in trade. But the penurious, misery air Jack assumes for gags on the air waves touches him to the quick.

A Brown Derby waitress told me, "Jack Benny doesn't over tip. He over-over-over tips." He's afraid somebody will think him a nickel-nurser. A couple of years ago when his wife, Mary, was in Honolulu, Jack cabled her one night. "Jack Benny cabling Mary Livingstone in Honolulu," said Jack. "Oh," replied the operator, "then you'll want the message sent on the deferred rate, won't you, Mr. Benny?" Deferred trans-ocean messages are lots cheaper, and in this case it made only an hour or so's difference, and the message wasn't rush at all. But Jack flushed—"No—no," he said hastily. "Send it straight—send it straight!" He was afraid even an operator would think him stingy.

Actually, the luxury requirements of Jackson Benny are pretty meager. He has never felt exactly comfortable in the plush life, remembering too well the hard times he waded through to success. He lives in a Beverly Hills colonial mansion of movie star proportions, all right, but that's mostly a gesture to Mary and his family. Jack himself holes out in his bedroom, which is his workroom, library, studio and about everything else. He has a complete radio transcription outfit there, recording machine and playback equipment. The walls are lined with bound scripts of his shows. He has dope and data scattered around on a couple of big desks and seals himself in amid dense cigar smoke for inspiration on this or that.

Like most Beverly Hills citizens the Bennys sport a fancy swimming pool in the back yard. Jack never uses it. Instead he goes down to State Beach, the public strand at Santa Monica, and mingles with the mob. He's a guy of the people, really, and is happiest when he's doing just the things they do. His biggest daily recreation is a walk downtown in Beverly to hang around the drug store. He used to get his biggest recreational kick driving his open roadster around town slowly, often with Joan, and buying her all the things she shouldn't have. He likes to go to the fights and movies and the Play Pier at Ocean Park.

When the Jack Bennys first got settled in Beverly Hills, they used to entertain a lot, and like all Hollywood entertainers, they found that their parties soon became events. A guest list starting at ten zoomed to two hundred in no time. People they slightly knew came and kibitzed on the food and entertainment. One New Year's Jack and Mary threw a lavish party—with gay canopies all around the place, an orchestra, fancy catering and almost a stage set around the swimming pool. Everybody came—and stayed, and it was such a chilly night that the Hollywood night clubs actually beefed about Benny taking away their customers.

In the midst of the gala event, a good friend of Jack's came up to him and noticed that Jack wasn't having such a hell of a good time. He pointed to the mob. "It's colossal, Jack," he cracked. "Why don't you photograph it?" Since then the Benny's don't entertain like that. When they go in for good times it's with their close pals, and what they do are the little ordinary American fireside diversions—cards, conversation and home movies, as a rule.

The intimate Benny set includes Barbara Stanwyck and Bob Taylor, Ronnie Reagan and Jane Wyman, the Ray Millands, the Mervyn LeRoys, Loretta Young and her husband, Tom Lewis, George Burns and Gracie Allen and Jack's in-laws, the Myrt Blums.

For a long time the clique maintained a Sunday night "Turnabout Club," the turnabout part being that each member took turns footing the check for an evening of dancing at Ciro's or some Hollywood glitter gallery. Jack loves to dance, and he's good, too, especially at a rousing rumba. Since the war and his army camp shows, his one night of stepping out has been stepped on. Sunday evening is Jack's high spot of the week in more ways than one. It's the only time he can relax—after the radio show is over—and as anyone will tell you, Jack's weekly radio stint is the essence of his life.

He worries about it from Tuesday until it goes on the air Sunday. Sunday night is the only night he lets down, when the "So-long, folks" signs him off the air waves. Monday he sleeps late and that is what his colleagues call "the wolves' day." Every Monday people who want Jack to attend to this or that, people with axes to grind, solicitors, business agents, tailors with fittings, salesmen and all extra-show business characters swoop down on Jack. He holds court far into the night. Tuesday morning he starts worrying again—about Sunday's show.

Jack is a great worrier—maybe that's why he's so good. His nails are chronically bitten down. He's a perfectionist, and he's always sure everything he does is terrible. The people who brand him disinterested and self-centered don't know that from Tuesday morning at 7:30 on (Jack is an early riser every day except Monday), Benny is deep in mental agonies about his next Sunday program. He puts in hectic work on it surrounded by his staff who tag after him to his several offices, scattered around Hollywood at NBC, his home, Paramount, Warner Brothers and Twentieth Century-Fox. During that time he is likely to stare old friends in the eye and not know them. Sometimes Mary Livingstone, after repeating the same thing to him five times and getting "H-m-m-m's" for answers, will cry, "Remember me? I'm your wife!"

benny's self-torture . . .

Jack himself bemoans this concentration because it takes plenty out of him, but he's convinced that his stuff depends on timing and finesse. That's one reason he feels so chagrined about his value as an army camp entertainer. He feels that the continuity type of program he puts out is not zippy and fast enough to make good watching entertainment for the doughboys. And while he doesn't beef about it, it's no secret that for him to stage a program where every faculty isn't just right is a torture his audience never knows about. When things aren't smooth as silk, Jack Benny dies a slow death.

Jack envies Bob Hope and Red Skelton and the oily gag ad libbers who can toss off a show at the drop of a hat, tear themselves to pieces and love it. "If I was only about ten years younger like those guys" he wails. Jack always gives out with a 45-minute warm-up to compensate for the less slam-bang character of his program. And he's already made plans for a 13-week road tour of the camps this summer, devoted exclusively to entertaining soldiers with a show prepared especially for them. He'll pay the expenses, by the way, and it will cost plenty. But that's the only way Jack figures he can really do a good job and keep out of a coffin.

Health is a great concern of Jack's. Some people call him a hypochondriac. He's a great pill swallower, dieter and general health faddist. "Benny," Phil Harris once cracked, "eats an 11 course meal—five courses of food and six courses of pills!" The other day a waitress at Warner Brothers brought Jack his lunch; it was Jack's tomato day. As she set the plate down the waitress gasped, "Oh, Mr. Benny, I'm so sorry!"

"What's the matter?" gulped Jack.

"Why, your tomatoes—they're sliced, and I forgot you like them quartered!"

Jack doesn't drink. When he does he falls asleep. If he goes for a cocktail before dinner it's always a pink lady. He's always furrowing his brow about the cigars he devours but can't stop them. His dietary weakness is rich food and late night stuffing. "Restaurants will be the death of me," he wails after stocking up on a choice morsel.

Oddly enough, Jack's not one bit touchy about the signs of Old Man Time. In fact, he's always joking about his thinning, gray hair. A few days ago on the "George Washington" set he had a scene in which he was drenched in a rainstorm. After the prop storm deluged him a few times, Jack cracked, "For gosh sakes—get me out of here—my hair's slipping."

don't tell allen, but . . .

Probably the highest glee of Jack's week is listening to the caustic comments of Fred Allen which rip his own show to pieces every Sunday. He carries a couple of portable radios with him to be sure not to miss them, smoking a stogie furiously and chuckling when Fred—who pulls no punches—hits a particularly tender spot. The Allen-Benny feud, by the way, is entirely impromptu. It was never a studied gag, like the Walter Winchell-Ben Bernie battles. Jack and Fred, who have known each other from vaudeville days, never correspond or arrange pots at each other. Each Sunday it's a complete surprise to Jack, and he's never yet got really mad.

Jack is always telling his friends that he'd give anything, including a small fortune, for a year's rest. Sometimes he probably means it. "I'm tired," he sighs. "The pace is killing me," but there's always some reason why he can't stop. Right now, of course, the reason is that Jack thinks he'd be unpatriotic to loaf when the government can use the cartwheels he collects each week and when the public can use a few belly laughs.

What Jack Benny will probably do if he ever ends up on the retired list is to sit and reminisce—his favorite recreation today—about the fun he's had making other people laugh. About the kick of giving breaks to radio stars like Rochester, Kenny Baker, Rudy Vallee, Phil Harris, Dennis Day and a dozen more. And the headaches he's enjoyed stewing on picture sets, taking it on the chin from sassy birds like Fred Allen and generally worrying himself sick—and happy. Probably Jack Benny will be most remembered in Hollywood's archives by his last picture, "To Be or Not To Be"—because it undoubtedly is his best to date. It would be a funny thing if some future Hollywood historian links him with the one he's doing now—"The Meanest Man in Town."

Because, take it from me, that's one thing Jack Benny is not and never has been—and the people who get that impression just don't know their Benny.

Right now, as this is written, the big shots are ripping up Alan's old contract and writing a juicy new ticket on his own terms. With no studio tough guy competition to heckle him, Alan Ladd is sitting as pretty at Paramount as a Petty peach. The guy will make a million dollars as sure as cats have kittens. unless he breaks both arms and legs or is suddenly struck deaf, dumb and blind.

What a break! What colossal luck! It's practically unbelievable. Too good to be true.

Well, it isn't true! Not a bit of it. On the contrary:

Alan Ladd doesn't believe in magic wands. Fairy god mothers are fakes in his book. Nobody ever handed him anything. He went out and got it. He gambled strictly from guts and he risked plenty—his friends, his reputation, his good health—yep, even his life once or twice. Sound like a Cinderella Chappie? Not exactly.

courageous laddie . . .

Take the time, only a few weeks ago, right smack in the middle of "Gun For Hire." The climax of the whole movie was coming up. Alan had been working in rainy scenes, sopping wet for days. One day he felt hot. He was. Fever: 104. They had to wrestle him to get him to the hospital "I'm all right," Alan scrapped back. He wasn't though. They called a doctor. Pneumonia in both lungs!

Five days later, after tossing with fever all day and night, he practically sandbagged his doctor into letting him loose. Right from the hospital bed, the guy hurried to the studio and went through all the toughest scenes he had to do—the chases, action and drama around the end—the stuff that made him famous—and is going to make him rich.

Now, of course, getting this information out of "Laddie" (that's what his wife, Sue Carol, calls him) is like pulling teeth from an elephant. He's modest, not shy, but modest. When you talk to Al you don't think of a Horatio Alger hero, like I might have hinted here. But you certainly don't get the idea you're up against any killer who, as one critic shouted, "makes George Raft and Humphrey Bogart look like a couple of song and dance men."

In person, Alan Ladd looks, not like a slug, but a fellow you'd like to know better. He's neat and trim, around five feet ten, I'd judge, light and wiry, maybe 150 pounds. He has the build of a quarterback, or a sprinter. He was both, too, just to make me honest, and a champion high diver as well. His hair is soft, wavy and rebellious, a burnt gold color (it was dyed black for The Raven) and his skin matches. He has dark eyebrows over very gray eyes, and his teeth flash when he talks. He's easy mannered, level and straight talking. His address is careless and off-hand, but you sense underneath a racehorse mettle and the tenseness of a coiled spring. Nerves—but under control. Well—mostly.

There was the night of the preview of "Gun For Hire." It was the break Al and his wife, Sue, had been pounding for too many long months, so he was pretty interested.

"Sitting there in that show," he grinned, "I had hold of Sue's hand and you ought to have seen it afterward—black and blue! I heard every cough in the house. I saw every head turn, I watched every kid fidget. When anybody got up to go out my heart flopped to my socks. My mind raced like a P-38's engine. I never even saw the show. I didn't know what the picture was about!"

And then, in New York, just a couple of months ago, where Alan and Sue went to give Manhattan's Ladd-happy press and critics a personal peek, they ventured on to Broadway one night to see "This Gun For Hire." It was Alan's first trip to the Big City. In fact, he'd been out of Los Angeles County only three times in his life since he arrived as a kid. The jostling crowds dazed him enough, but that name—ALAN LADD—up there in flaming letters hypnotized him. He couldn't believe it. He stood staring at it and then it happened. A wise Broadway kid recognized him. "Alan Ladd!" he screamed. "He's right here. That's him!" The curiosity kibitizers gathered like a lynch mob. Alan got the Broadway celebrity treatment—people snatching at him, mauling him. Terrified, he bolted for the theater door. It looked like half New York would rush in free past the doorman. So Alan turned for the curb and yanked Sue into a cab, breathless. "Where to, Mac?" asked the cabbie.

"Anywhere," gasped Alan, "out of here."

So—he's not as calm as he pretends. And it's a very good thing. Actors who burn with a bright flame are artists. And I've got a hunch Alan is one of those. Directors around Hollywood have sensed the pressure underneath Alan long before he made "This Gun For Hire." They knew he was good long before Bill Stevenson and Henry Tuttle decided to gamble on him in "Joan of Paris" and "This Gun For Hire." Producers used to stop him halfway through tests, and say, "Kid, you've got it all right. But," they'd add, sadly, "I've just got to have a name!" Whoever heard of Alan Ladd?

double dynamite . . .

Sue Carol, his wife, business manager, career guide, twenty-four-hour sweetheart and best pal, hadn't. But she heard a radio show one night a couple of years ago. Two men were in it and both were terrific, though the parts were entirely different. She was new in the agency business then and she was hunting clients. She called a Columbia Broadcasting producer. "Say," she enthused. "Who were those two men on such-and-such a show that just went off the air? They're terrific! I'm looking for real talent and they've got it. Who were those actors?"

"Actors?" said the mike producer. "Names? Why, that was just one guy, Sue. His name's Alan Ladd. But you've got him right. He's double dynamite."

So she wrote him a note and he brought it around and now they're living happily ever after as man and w— But wait a minute. This needs a start:

Alan Ladd has been a double load of TNT ever since he was a kid. But he had to wait twenty-eight years for somebody to touch it off with a big bang. There have been little explosions all along the route, since Alan decided to make faces for a living, but they always fizzled out. B. H.—Before Hollywood—he was popping busily about like a firecracker and getting nowhere too.

Alan is a Hot Springs, Arkansas, boy, who traveled to California via Oklahoma and Colorado. His father died when Alan was five, and his mother remarried. There was never very much money after that, but that didn't bother a kid as full of beans as Alan.

He was never without an after-hours job all through grade school. He mowed lawns, peddled papers, swept out stores and delivered groceries. He found time to work his way up to an Eagle Scout and pass his studies too. In North Hollywood High the mighty atom kept up his business career selling ads on a local paper, life guarding and doing everything that cropped up. Meanwhile, he became about the hottest athlete in San Fernando Valley—football, basketball, track and swimming. He turned into the champion 100- and 220-dash man and capped off his athletic career fancy diving his way to the Olympic tryouts. I mean Alan was good. He was Southern California interscholastic swim champ a couple of those years. He shows the results in his physique today—smooth, firm muscles and an easy style of getting about.

Alan thinks it was the exhibition diving that got him used to public life and made him hanker for audiences. As a kid, he remembers, he used to roll away gravestones from the cemetery behind the very Paramount that pays him plenty today and sneak through the fence onto the sets. He never dreamed he'd be looking into lenses himself later on those same sets. He might never have been, if a couple of things hadn't happened.

slapped like a Jap . . .

For one, he took a two-and-a-half gainer off a high board in a diving exhibition one day and landed with a belly slap like a Jap plane off Midway. He tried again and did the same thing and hurt himself bad. That steered Alan off ideas of becoming a professional merman, although he can still sail through the air like a swan and knife the water. The next tack was business. But a job with a Babbitt pep outfit, the required sales slogans, blue serge suits and stiff collars were more than Al could take. He tried newspapering, too, briefly and finally opened up his own hamburger stand, figuring on expanding into a chain when the customers swamped him. But they didn't swamp.

I first saw Alan about eight or nine years ago. That's his real name, too, Alan Ladd. I remember. He wasn't even 21 then, and somehow—after all the above—he had wandered onto the Universal lot, right near home, and into a dramatic stock training school the studio ran then. The ambitious young Barrymores all wore blue linen coats and gray pants. Alan looked like a high school kid in his. He was only five feet four (he did most of his growing after twenty-one) and that's what finally eased him out of that start. "You're too short," they told him. "Come back when you grow up." He was to hear that refrain plenty from then on. Al can't remember how many times producers have looked at his young face and slight build, and the college cut sports clothes he loves, and grunted, "Too collegiate!" And now the guy wins his fame—can you beat it?—as a merciless killer?

Alan never went to college. The Universal stock school and the drama institutes he went to later on were the only higher education he ever had. He had college chances, too. His athletic record won him scholarship offers at Southern California and Dartmouth and he had an inside edge on a West Point appointment, too. But he thought it wasn't fair to his folks to duck out then. Family finances weren't going very good. He thought he'd stick around a year and make some dough to help out. Alan got himself a job as a grip at Warner Brothers. He collected $65 a week. All day long he looked down from forty or fifty feet up in the catwalks at people—people acting. He wasn't a very good grip. Not after he spied an old chum from the Universal school in there with a bit part and dragging down 50 bucks a day.

It wasn't the money, though. It was something else. Alan doesn't know yet what it was that made him forget everything when he saw actors doing their stuff. He kibitzed silently and sometimes the boss gaffer would get a little nasty. "Okay, Mr. DeMille," he'd crack. "If you think the scene's okay then how how about a little work! Or do you feel an inspiration?"

You can see he was a gone goose, right then. He quit after a year or so of gripping with a little money he'd socked away in the bank. And that's when the trouble began. Alan resolved that this time he would be an actor or he'd bust.

You read a lot of stories about young unknowns who starve in a garret for fame. Kids who tackle Hollywood the hard way. Usually, investigation reveals they skipped a meal once, got behind a month in the rent, or couldn't buy a convertible coupe the first year. That isn't hardship. But what Alan Ladd endured when his money ran out was.

He went hungry. He slept where he could. He ran desperately in debt. Everything broke wrong for him. He lost his stepfather in those tough years and right after that, his mother, who had always been an understanding pal, passed on. Alan thought a lot of his mother. She always hoped he'd make something important out of himself and he always assured her he would. His most poignant regret today is that she isn't alive to witness his success.

What ate into him most of all during the hunger stretch was what his friends thought of him. He got a lot of criticism from his friends. He had a lot of friends. They all remembered his high school triumphs and they thought he was tossing himself right down the drain with this actor yen. "Gone Hollywood," he heard plenty say, and it was said with a sneer. When he spent his savings to enter Ben Bard's dramatic school, it looked like the height of folly.

That was hard to take. But it wasn't weakness as so many people supposed. What Alan Ladd did in those hard-up days took plenty of the stuff they string racquets with. It isn't easy to turn down steady pay checks when your stomach is growling and your socks feel the sidewalk. But he shook his head firmly at respectable jobs. Instead, Alan sang (he's got a swell baritone) in beer joints and on Saturdays he dug ditches and laid pipe. He stayed at a friend's, with the room rent on the cuff. To outward appearances, he stacked up as a bum.

"But I knew," Alan told me, "what a lot of people didn't. I knew I couldn't work and learn to be an actor at the same time. This is an all out job—this acting—and I wasn't going to be just a ham. I was going to be good!

"And I knew something else. The minute I got a salary check, I'd start depending on it. I'd buy the clothes I needed, and I'd get a jalopy and then I'd be afraid to quit and face being broke again. So I just stayed broke!" Alan stayed broke three years.

And when he got good enough he went on the radio in bit parts for free. "Then I got a real break," chuckled Alan. "I did a show and the pay was five dollars—split between ten actors. I got fifty cents for the job!" But bigger ones came along and then—enter Miss Sue Carol.

I don't know a Hollywood wife who deserves more credit for a husband's break than Sue Carol. I don't know a couple that is happier either than Sue and Alan. They're a perfect team. They're crazy about each other. They're together every minute they aren't forced apart by business. Alan, to both Sue and himself, is "He"—"He did this, he did that" impersonally, as if he were a project of some sort. Alan's as wrapped up in her agency as she is in his career.

This ideal match was cemented for the second time, by the way, just a few days ago, and Alan's wearing a brand new gold wedding ring. They were married first last spring in Mexico, because there was some delay about Alan's divorce from a former domestic hitchup that didn't pan out and which he doesn't like to talk about now.

But most people in Hollywood hand Sue Carol too much credit for the astounding break of Alan Ladd. She doesn't want it. It's true she took him when he was nobody and peddled him around like a cranberry merchant for the past three years. "What about Alan Ladd?" is a crack that will get you a smile in any casting office in town even today. Sue was always saying it. You may be surprised to learn that Alan Ladd played in over sixty movies before "This Gun For Hire." She got him the jobs. Independents, westerns, commercial advertising movies, bits here and there. She kept him busy and with money in his pockets. And she never stopped plugging for that break that would count. But Sue will tell you today, as she told me the other day, "Sure I worked hard for Laddie. I knew he had it and that some day a lot of people would thank me for telling them so. But don't say I put him across. You don't put anybody across in Hollywood—unless they've got it!"

The other day Sue Carol was offered $25,000 for one-half of Alan Ladd's agency contract. No—she didn't take it. She wouldn't take $100,000—not for a half interest in her husband.

What kept a guy like Ladd, a thousand volt personality, a kid who'd tear himself apart in any chance, a boy that professional people, radio and movies knew had what it takes—what kept him off the big time—until "Joan of Paris," and "Gun For Hire"? And Hollywood, you heard, was begging for new male names.

That's exactly what kept him in the dark—no name. It happened so often it was funny. Alan came up for parts. "The Devil to Pay." Sure—his test was swell, but we dunno, who is Alan Ladd on a marquee? Bob Cummings got the lead. "Kitty Foyle"—Dennis Morgan. "Meet John Doe"—Regis Toomey. "I Wanted Wings"—Ray Milland. Always like that.

Alan had some minor breaks. He played a part in "Hitler, Beast of Berlin," a sensational quickie but timely, which broke big in New York. He had some chances for bread-and-butter contracts. Steady jobs but hack acting. "No!" said Alan. And his agent, Sue, backed him up. Maybe I'd better tell you about Sue, right now. How this team began, I mean.

It began, as I said, when Sue heard Alan on the air and wrote him a note. He called around, and right before he did, Columbia Broadcasting decided to handle him. They offered a managerial contract. So did Sue. Sue Carol wasn't much shakes in the agency field then. Columbia was, for radio, and that was all the work Alan was getting. But after a look at Sue, Alan asked for ten days to think it over. On the tenth he walked into Sue's office. What Alan meant to say was that he had decided. "I'm going to sign with Columbia." He started to say it, took a look into Sue's brown eyes and said something different. He said, "Where's your contract?" Maybe it wasn't love at first sight—but it was something like that.

From that minute Alan Ladd's luck really changed. The climax came one day at two studios. Alan was at RKO; Sue at Paramount. They had a date to meet for lunch and a rendezvous in RKO quadrangle. Sue was angling for "This Gun For Hire"; Alan had tested for "Joan of Paris." Halfway through Director Bill Stevenson made a circle of his thumb and finger, snapped off the camera. "Okay, Alan," he said, "that's plenty. You've got it!"

Alan hopped around the quad as nervous as a bride. What news to tell Sue! When she showed up her face was down to her knees and she looked ready to cry. "Honey," she said, "Sorry. They turned you down at Paramount. It's all off."

"I don't give a damn," laughed Alan. "Listen to my news." And he spilled it.

Halfway through Sue started squealing. Her surprise gag was flat, and she knew it. Alan had got the Paramount part, of course—"This Gun For Hire—within a half hour of cinching the "Joan of Paris" test. That, again, is this Hollywood town.

up and up . . .

So—is there any use of going all over what happened? How the Baby part in "Joan of Paris" was prestige film for Alan around Hollywood at last. How theatre owners reversed the billing in "Gun" and starred Alan Ladd over Veronica Lake on their own account. How the guy is the toast of Hollywood this minute? Nope—you know it all.

Then what has success done to Alan Ladd, the hard way hero? How's he taking his sudden fame?

Very steadily, thanks. I've told you how happy Sue and Alan are, how inseparable, how they double-hitched their marriage just for good measure. Alan hasn't any folks or relatives to share his good fortune with. That's his biggest regret. On the splurge side: He's bought some mighty good clothes, because he likes clothes and for a long time he had to look at them in windows. But he's buying most suits second hand from his Paramount parts. There's just the one car, a Packard convertible. No night life to speak of, Mocambo once, never a peek inside Ciro's or the new Troc. The Ladd's live in Sue's house she bought years ago, up in the Los Feliz section of Los Angeles, which most of Hollywood has deserted now. They aren't figuring on moving or digging a pool. The dough Alan makes goes mostly into War Bonds.

The lights are burning late in the Ladd kitchen right now, for Alan is in the middle of "Prelude to Glory" and where he likes to study his script best is perched on a stool over the breadboard with buckets of coffee handy on the sink.

a man in a million . . .

While he studies, Sue broods over the only real problem of their married life so far—Food. Alan's so intense he won't eat when he works. He lost twenty good pounds during the hunger days and he could stand to get more of them back than he has. It strikes Al as some sort of a joke—this lack of appetite, now. He used to stroll up in front of Hollywood's fancy restaurants, his mouth watering and his tummy playing pat-a-cake. If he ever made some dough, he swore—boy, would he wade into those New York steaks!

"And now," he chuckles, "I go in a place with the choice of the menu—and I'm not hungry!"

Maybe it's some sort of a reverse psychosis from those starvation days. It may be years before Alan Ladd can appreciate the pleasures of success without hangover pangs from his past.

At the Waldorf-Astoria in New York, where the Ladds recently stayed in style, Alan woke up one night about three A.M. "Sue," he said, "I want a hamburger, just like you get out home!" Sue was tickled because Al hadn't touched food all day. She jingled for Room Service and two hamburgers and two bottles of beer came up, wafted in under silver covers by an immaculate waiter—all very elegant.

Alan started to bite the sandwich. Then he noticed the check. It was five dollars. He gagged. It wasn't even his money, understand. Paramount was paying all expenses. But right then Laddie lost his appetite. "I thought about those other days," said Alan, "and five bucks for two burgers and beers made me sick." He told the waiter to carry it away, untouched.

That's the kind of sensitive, high-strung, impressionable, sentimental guy Alan Ladd is—beneath his menacing, icy mask. Personally, I hope he stays that way. He'll be a great star as long as he does. Of course, I'd like to see him take a little nourishment every now and then, too. He's going to need it.

WIN $5.00 in WAR STAMPS

Are you giving up an extra ice cream soda for a War Stamp? Saving up the shekels from mowing lawns for War Bonds? USO-ing? Victory Bond vending? WE WANT TO KNOW ABOUT IT. Write us, and the best letter will win $5.00 in War Stamps. Address your letter to MODERN SCREEN, 149 Madison Ave., New York, N. Y. The brightest idea this month came from a Kentucky reader whose letter, printed below, will give you one excellent idea for raising stamp money to help America win this war. We're proud to send her $5.00 in War Stamps. Maybe it will be your turn next month. Let's get busy right away!

"I have a Victory Garden with many vegetables. When these vegetables are large enough, I sell them to families who live in cities and are not fortunate enough to raise gardens themselves. With the money I purchase stamps each week. Therefore I feel that I am serving the government in two ways, namely by buying stamps and producing more vegetables. If everyone who could would grow a Victory Garden and use the returns in the same way, I am sure the plan would help "Axe the Axis."

certainly heaven could wait! Dr. Lindstrom's in from Rochester where he and Ingrid have settled with their daughter, Pia. Interesting that Ingrid won't allow her house in Beverly Hills to be photographed because "it's only a stopping off place, not my real home."

Lunched at Universal with Deanna Durbin. Watched Maria Montez go through her notorious "letter routine." Seems Maria loves to be looked at. In order to attract attention she brings the same letter to lunch daily, and as she reads, registers every emotion in the catalogue. After devouring the first passage, she throws back her head and roars with laughter. Then she reads on, and her shoulders quiver and tears fill her eyes. Another page and she's sobbing, softly. But not too softly. There isn't an eye in the room that can rip itself off Maria when she goes into her act! It's her way of attracting attention, and it's the same way every day. Yet the crowd is always fascinated. She's a smart girl, that Montez. She'll be famous some day!

Tierney Meets Chaplin!

Tierney and Chaplin ablaze! Surprised? Well, you needn't be, 'cause the Tierney we're talking about is Gene's sister Pat, and Chaplin is Charlie's son Charles, Jr.

Pat, who's lush and lovely and sixteen, and Charles, who's dark and handsome and seventeen, were introduced at the West Side Tennis Club. Chaplin, Sr., never one to stifle romance, saw the sparks shooting and invited the kids to be his dinner guests at the Mocambo. That glamorous beginning has been followed by almost-nightly movie-and-sundae dates, with a heavy sprinkling of phone calls in between.

Incidentally, Pat's getting a big rush from local producers. Three studios are pursuing her with fat contracts. She'd like to sign 'em, but sister Gene says no, she can't 'til she gets her high school diploma.

Out of the Frying Pan

The sudden spurt of patriotism that sent Hollywood's leading glamour boy scurrying into the nearest recruiting station is still mystifying his friends. They don't know that the guy had a very personal reason for getting under the sheltering arm of Uncle Sam's armed forces . . . and getting there fast!

A year ago, the glamour boy and his wife parted. Instead of rushing to Reno and ridding herself of her undesirable mate in six weeks, the wife elected to remain in Hollywood and file for divorce under California law. California demands legal residence of one year but, as compensation for the long wait, offers a divorcing wife a substantial chunk of her husband's property.

Last week the year was up. But three days earlier—rather than waiting another month as he had planned—the glamour boy enlisted! The reason? He doesn't want all the goodies he's worked so hard to earn to fall into his wife's hands. And, under the Soldiers and Sailors Act of 1940, no wife whose husband is in the service may sue for divorce and gain a default judgment without written permission of the husband—which you may be sure this little lady will never get!

Nothing Sacred!

Can you imagine Katharine Hepburn standing before the cameras and advising a movie audience to "see a Bette Davis picture for really good acting!" Of course you can't. One actress would never plug another, even for the sake of the script. Yet, something similar occurred when Glenn Miller made "Orchestra Wife."

A line of dialogue called for a list of bandleaders' names. It is customary, in such cases, to rattle off a string of phonies. But Glenn Miller refused. Instead, he inserted the names of his own favorites, Benny Goodman, Harry James, Sammy Kaye, Paul Whiteman and Andre Kostelanetz.

"Why shouldn't I mention the boys? Deadly rivals? I should say not! I admire every one of them. They're fine musicians. They have taste in music, which I respect above all else. Take Kostelanetz. One of the blights of our time is the practice of swinging classical music. Kostelanetz does it among others. But he knows what to swing. Not like another genius, who shall go nameless, who had the nerve to lead his men in a swing arrangement of "Onward, Christian Soldiers!"

Short Shots

Greer Garson doesn't know whether to become a sailor's wife or remain a sailor's sweetheart, now that Richard Ney belongs to the Navy. . . . Tarzan (Johnny Weissmuller) is looking for a new jungle mate, and Ann Corio, Queen of the Strip Tease, is up for the role! . . . Cradle Talk: The Brian Donlevy's and James Ellison's anticipate autumn heirs. Ditto the Franchot Tones. . . . It's almost two years, yet Bette Davis and Arthur Farnsworth continue to swap monthly anniversary gifts. . . . One third of Shirley Temple's earnings are placed in trust, which will make her a very rich young lady at twenty-one. . . . After twenty-two years, the Groucho Marxes are talking to the judge. . . . Mrs. Stirling Hayden (Madeleine Carroll) and Mrs. John Hertz, Jr., (Myrna Loy) have had their fill of careers. They'll quit films to devote themselves to their new husbands. . . . The Jack Bennys are expecting another dotter—via the adoption trail. . . . Harry James and Helen Forrest are humming the wedding march!

Labor of Love

Hollywood can learn a thing or two about popularity from Bandleader Harry James. Without ballyhoo or build-up, Harry's earned himself a fan following that tops any movie star's. Each week the postman dumps 6,000 letters on his desk, and in the past fourteen weeks the maestro has filled requests for over 50,000 photos of himself.

"T'aint an accident that puts James up in front. It's his appreciation of his fans and his willingness to devote long hours to them. Harry personally keeps an index file of every person who's ever written him. And, believe it or not, he maintains a fan mail department that's bigger than any movie studio's!

"And do you know where most of the letters come from?" he asks. "Dallas, Texas—and Brooklyn, New York!"

This is the Army!

Brenda Marshall, back from the East where she enjoyed a brief reunion with hubby Bill Holden, tells this story.

Bill was walking across the camp grounds, on his way to mess, when he saw a familiar face coming toward him. A few steps more revealed it belonged to Jerry Hopper, Marsha Hunt's husband, and one of his closest Hollywood friends. Bill was delighted. He hadn't seen Jerry in months, and here was his old pal, togged in an officer's uniform, 3,000 miles from home.

Bill steamed up to him. "Jerry, you old so-and-so," he shouted. "How've you been? When did you pull in?"

Hopper was equally delighted. "Bill," he cried, grasping Holden's arm. "This is wonderful! Think of it, running into you here!"

Then, suddenly, both men stiffened. Simultaneously, they remembered they were in Uncle Sam's Army, under Uncle Sam's regulations. Stepping back, they saluted briskly.

"Sir," said Private Holden. "Sir," said Lieut. Hopper. And, with a quick wink, they hurried on their separate ways!

Musical Jackpot

"Jingle, Jangle, Jingle," the hit of the Hit Parade, has the heavy coin jingle-jangling into Kay Kyser's cash box.

The old Professor's waxing of the tune is reportedly smashing all sales records the country over. According to its publishers, it sold 250,000 copies the first four weeks it was available, which ain't hay when you realize a record is considered a roaring success if it unloads 350,000 in an entire year!

By the way, it is now revealed that "Jingle, Jangle" was conceived and composed in only 25 minutes! During the making of "Forest Rangers" Director George Marshall ran into a spot where he thought Fred MacMurray ought to sing a song. Summoning tunesmiths Joseph Lilley and Frank Loesser, Marshall instructed them to drop what they were doing and rap out a little ditty for Fred. Within a half hour the boys were back with "Jingle, Jangle, Jingle"—never dreaming they had the song sensation of the season!

Peace in Our Time

Olivia de Havilland and Joan Fontaine have finally achieved the ideal sisterly relationship. They chatter on the phone, they visit each other's homes, they shop together and they share confidences. Now if no one makes any dirty cracks, they'll do okay.

Livvy and Joan admit all has not always been well between them. But they blame their differences on newspaper columnists and local gossips. In the past, whenever they've bordered on complete understanding, someone invariably set the ball of trouble rolling by whispering, "Did you hear what Olivia said about Joan?" or "Have you heard what Joan said about Olivia?" Word would get back to the girls who, being only human, would climb onto their high horses and be enemies again.

At this writing, all is peace and harmony between the sisters. Joan has even asked Olivia to come and live with her. However, Olivia has no intention of breaking in on the still-honeymooning Ahernes. She's content to dwell within halloo-ing distance and see them almost every day.

Disa and Data

Bill Holden can't persuade the boys in camp to call him by his real name, William Beedle. They insist on using his movie monicker! . . . There's a plan in Washington to print the likeness of Carole Lombard on war savings stamps . . . Sheila Ryan boasts the most finely-contoured hands in Hollywood. No wonder Johnny Payne likes to hold 'em! . . . George Montgomery's nose is buried in volumes on celestial navigation. Hopes to enter the Air Corps as a pilot . . . Jimmy Stewart won a promotion from second lieutenant to first lieutenant. But his sidekick, Burgess Meredith, leaped all the way from buck private to second louie!

Signe Hasso's 8-year-old son was a passenger aboard the exchange ship Drottningholm when it slid into New York Harbor . . . Ann Rutherford isn't ashamed to wear mended hose. She jauntily sews stocking runs with colored thread as her answer to Hirohito!

Home on the Range

If Johnny Payne gets puffy around the waistline and heavy about the jowls, don't accuse him of dissipation. Just blame his mother!

Mrs. Ida Payne, a charming Southern woman, is currently in Hollywood visiting her movie star son. Like all doting parents, she thinks he's too thin. True, his splendid body is the pride of 20th Century-Fox. But, reasons Mrs. Payne, they're only the studio —they can't be expected to understand Johnny's needs the same as his own mother!

And what does Johnny think? Well, he wants his mom to be happy. And besides, she's such a good cook!

"She loves to fuss with foods," says John. "She's the only woman I know who has a "play" kitchen. Yup, instead of a game room or an extra parlor. The cook uses the main kitchen, and only Mother's allowed in the "play" room. It has three stoves, gas, electric and coal. I guess it doesn't say much for progress, but Mother likes the coal stove best!"

The Parting Hour

It won't be long now till Bob Sterling joins the Brotherhood of Guys Who Left Their Gals Behind. And boy, it's going to be tough! Not every man has a sweetie-pie as gallumptious-looking and devoted as Ann Sothern!

Four nights a week Bob has to barrel into his books and study for Army Air Corps entrance examinations. Yet, not a thought of two-timing enters Annie's pretty head. She just sits at home or calls on her chum Hedy Lamarr, and waits until Bob is free.

And talk about thoughtfulness! When Bob was bedded with a strep throat a few weeks back, Ann and her secretary (Bob's kid sis) made a daily trek to his apartment with food specially and tenderly prepared by their own loving hands.

Modern Times

Nothing phony about Mrs. Garfield's determination to go to work in a defense plant. Soon as John enters the service, she'll put their daughter Kathryn in the care of a nurse and become the first Hollywood wife to don overalls in an airplane factory.

The Garfields can see no reason for the surprise expressed in some quarters over Robbie's chosen war effort. Some women, they declare, are best suited for fund-raising and others for knitting sweaters. Mrs. Garfield is convinced she can do her best job building planes. What's more, she believes that many another Movietown wife who has never done manual labor and who is shy about starting, will follow her once she takes the first step.

Enter Phillip Terry

Joan Crawford's marriage to Phillip Terry was a complete surprise to Hollywoodians already made dizzy by the news of Lana Turner's elopement with Stephen Crane, and Cary Grant's union with Barbara Hutton. As Joan tells it, their romance began when a mutual friend brought Phil to her home in Brentwood. She was immediately taken with him, and their wedding, two months later, was anything but "sudden."

Joan probably doesn't realize it, but her marriage was even less sudden than she thinks. Her first meeting with Terry, a 33-year-old Stanford University grad, occurred seven years ago! It was at a party given by the Jack Oakies at their Beverly Hills home —a costume affair at which guests were asked to attend dressed as their favorite advertisements. Joan was married to Franchot Tone at the time. Neither felt like bothering about costumes. Since they lived only a few blocks away, they strolled over in street clothes.

Stepping into the Oakie drawing room they found themselves surrounded by men and women rigged out as toothpaste tubes, bird seed and gin bottles. Joan and Franchot were embarrassed. They were out of place in their street clothes. They'd better leave immediately, they decided. But as they turned to go, Venita Oakie hurried up. She had a friend who wanted to meet them. A young actor, just breaking into pictures. Would it be all right if she brought him over? Joan said it would be. And two minutes later she was introduced to her future husband, Mr. Phillip Terry—dressed as a package of cigarettes!

Wanted: New Faces

After years of keeping studio gates securely locked and guarded, Hollywood has done an abrupt about-face and spread its doorsteps with large Welcome mats. Talent scouts are all over the country haunting highways and by-ways looking for likely leading men. Never has the town been so wide open for new male talent.

Calls to service have depleted the current list of leading men so fast that executives are issuing orders to find new faces, and find 'em quick! The catch is in the restricting requirements. According to the Hollywood Reporter, a man can't be considered a prospect unless he is "married and preferably a father, or a single man pretty heavily weighed with dependents. Or he must have a 4-F draft classification based on physical disabilities of such a nature that they will not interfere with reasonably regular appearances before the camera." In addition, he must have "the type of immunity that will enable studios to publicize him without apologizing because he is not in uniform."

The sudden rush-rush began in earnest when unalarmed studio heads casually gave orders to round up all the Broadway stage neophytes who've been pointing for Hollywood for years. By wire and teletype came the sad news. All such aspirants were gone from the White Way. And not only that—the situation was so desperate musical comedy producers were seriously considering costuming the bigger gals in male clothes, to take the place of chorus boys in dancing routines!

Hollywood "Gadabouts"

Paging Walter Winchell! There's a brand new "addition" at the Cary Grant-Barbara Hutton domicile! Only two months old, and it's the sensation of the neighborhood! It's name is Crosley, and it's the perky, midget auto Cary gave to Babs as a wedding present. Barely five feet long, the tiny go-cart was especially designed for the duration. It can whip up a speed of fifty miles an hour without batting a headlight. Its tires are good for 70,000 miles, and it scoops up plenty of distance without a refill —at least fifty miles to a gallon! The little buggy, which sells for $500.85, is a two-cylinder job and comes in only one color—bright yellow!

Since the Grants started the Crosley fad, Paulette Goddard, Burgess Meredith, Brian Aherne and Preston Foster have all adopted it. They've had to settle for second-hand editions, but Maggie Sullavan and her husband, Leland Hayward, zoop by in a shiny right-off-the-assembly-line model. Seems Hayward owns five aerial training centers, and the importance of his work merits him a precious priority number.

Autry of the Air Corps

Gene Autry, the boots and saddle man, won't do any more cowboying till it's over Over There. As a technical sergeant in the Army Air Corps, he'll stow away his 60 western costumes and his gaudy cuban-heeled shoes and serve his country in the uniform of the service. His horse, Champ, will be turned out to pasture at Melody Ranch where Ina, his wife, will also remain for the duration.

Gene, an experienced pilot, is 35 and too old for combat flying. His duties haven't been defined, but it's expected that no matter where he's assigned, his mere presence in the Air Corps will be a great spur to youngsters who are thinking of enlisting.

Surprisingly, Gene's fans aren't all wet-behind-the-ears kids. Many are 18 and 19 years old, well beyond the all-day-sucker age. They may flock to the colors just to be near him. After all, they've never yet gone wrong, emulating Autry!

One Man's Family

Lots of rumors chasing around about the Bing Crosbys. One is that Bing and Dixie are expecting another tax exemption, and sending up daily prayers that this time it will be a girl.

Another is that Bing's got the enlistment bug and will join up with the Air Force soon as he can wind his personal affairs. If he does go, his family will be well provided for. With his movie earnings cut off (they totalled $300,000 last year), he'll still have a sizable income from his Decca recordings, a casual sideline which in 1941 earned him a mere $100,640!

Bing's also arranged for physical protection for his brood. Whenever they go out, they're accompanied by a chauffeur, dressed in a uniform like a State Trooper's and equipped with a nasty-looking revolver. At home they're surrounded by an electrically-charged gate and balconies that will fry an intruder on contact.

And woe unto the kidnapper who brazenly enters by automobile! A battery of flood-lights automatically bathes the driveway, spotting the driver like a fish in a net!

Didja Know

That Freddy Martin and his boys are planning a mass enlistment in the Coast Guard where they will form a band . . . That the Cary Grant-Barbara Hutton marriage ceremony was recorded on 16 mm. film by Cary's secretary . . . That far from hurting her career, Rita Hayworth's divorce led to a doubling of her fan mail—which in turn led to a doubling of her salary? She's now pulling in $2,000 weekly . . . That a dispute over money is the reason given for Ray

LIKE A LOT of other fellows, I used to take what I thought was a "he-man's" laxative. And, boy, what awful punishment I'd take with it. The stuff tasted terrible — and acted worse. It was just too strong!

THEN I SWITCHED to another brand. It tasted pretty bad, too. But I wouldn't have minded that so much if it had done me any good. Trouble was I didn't get the proper relief. It was just too mild!

FINALLY, A FRIEND suggested Ex-Lax!..."It's so easy to take," he said. "Ex-Lax tastes like chocolate and it works like a charm!" . . . Well, I tried it and I knew right away that I'd found MY laxative. Ex-Lax is not too strong, not too mild—it's just right!

Ex-Lax is effective, all right—but effective in a gentle way! It won't upset you; won't make you feel bad afterwards. No wonder people call it:

The "HAPPY MEDIUM" Laxative

Naturally, like any effective medicine, Ex-Lax should be taken only as directed on the label.

Eberle's walkout on the Glenn Miller orchestra? And that Glenn has one foot in the Navy . . . That Mrs. Ruth Cummings, Bob's ma, is a minister . . . That Edward Norris, Ann Sheridan's "Ex" is a bridegroom for the fourth time . . . That Laraine Day is the happiest girl in town since her husband, Ray Hendricks, completed his assignment as civilian flying instructor in Arizona and returned to Hollywood . . Drive For The Love Of America

Come September and the Motion Picture Industry's efforts to sell war bonds and stamps will have twins, triplets and quintuplets. Up to now, movies have donated stars and facilities to every other organization trying to promote such sales, without much credit to themselves. But September marks a kind of total responsibility for the celluloid industry, so come September, every movie house in the land will ask you and you and you to buy more war bonds and stamps. It's going to be quite a drive, you know, with every theater in the whole U. S. cooperating. Now don't expect Dottie Lamour in every lap or a five thousand dollar war bond as a Bingo prize, you greedy things! Still, consider what has already been done via mo'om pitchers.—How about those Kansas street dances with war stamps as admission and a stamp the price of every dance? And the place with a 250-pound bomb you can autograph for 50c or more? And the booths where pretty gals sell kisses (candy, but good fun) with each war stamp? These things may come to your town. You may hear "Any Bonds Today" instead of "The Star Spangled Banner." So tell 'em "sure, bonds today, and bonds tomorrow and the day after"—you'll be showing your appreciation for the swell tireless work the movies have done, but that's not really very important. You'll be showing your appreciation for what a helluva lot of kids in khaki are doing and have died doing. Because, my friends, those grand old stars and stripes up there mean just precisely what you want them to!

BIG BROTHER BING

Bing's hand closed on the young arm briefly. "You've got the stuff," he said. "You'll always win."

Nowadays, Bob and Bing shoot quite a lot of golf together, or in a foursome. Bing shoots a hard, swift game—"I've never been able to take him," Bob admitted to Bob Hope one day when they were teeing off, "but I'll keep at it until I cost him at least one point."

Not so with tennis. Several months ago, Bob and Bing were playing one of their weekly tournaments when Bob beat his big brother in straight love sets. That threw Bing for such a flock of exclamation points that he has managed to talk himself out of all succeeding matches.

Bob was reporting this fact with relish to Larry Crosby, and Larry said, "Remember the time you won the Pacific Northwest Amateur Tennis Tournament!"

"I'll say I do . . . that guy, Bing . . ."

gold hearts and medals . . .

It happened this way: Bob had been practicing like crazy. He was out on the courts at daybreak to take advantage of the cool hours, and he batted balls off the Crosby garage in Spokane until it was so dark he was likely to get pushed in the face with a fast return. At the time, Bing was in New York, but Mother Crosby was keeping him informed of the family gossip. She wrote: "I think it will break Bob's heart if he doesn't win this tournament. You've never seen such constant practice as he puts in. Mary Rose" (the sister just older than Bob) "says he has a terrific forehand drive, and his backhand is accurate. She thinks he'll win, barring trouble with his racket. It was a fine one when it was new, you remember, but it's been in use a long time. We really should have it restrung, but it seems there are so many other places for the money. . . ."

Bob was worried about that racket. He knew there were going to be some very fine shootin' irons in the tournament, but he just polished his technique that much harder—planning to make up in strategy what he lacked in equipment

The morning of the tournament, an insured package arrived for Bob from New York. There was no note, no card, nothing. But the package contained the finest racket on the market. Bob stared at it a long time, then he went to look for a handkerchief because it seemed he was getting a summer cold—or something.

That afternoon he marched out on the court and won the tournament. Then he had his picture taken, wearing his medal, and mailed the photograph to Bing. On the back he wrote, "Any time you want to sell YOUR medal for scrap gold—just say the word."

Larry asked, "Still got that medal kicking around somewhere?"

"Sure," Bob said. "I'll give it to Christopher some day." (Christopher is his baby son, and Kathleen is his four-year-old daughter.) "I still have that racket, too. I wouldn't part with it."

EAT NUTRITIONAL FOOD

Some people have to learn to like vegetables—particularly the green and yellow ones—either because they never had them as children or have never tasted them properly prepared. It is well worth while developing a taste for these vegetables because they supply large amounts of what it takes to make Vitamin A in our bodies. They also give us minerals for blood and bone building.

Vegetables cooked as short a time and in as little water as possible will retain more of their color, flavor and food value. You'll like them when you see what color and variety they add to your meals.

Whenever the Crosby clan gets together during these hot fall days, they all go swimming. Bing taught his own sons their aquatic lessons almost before they could go in without wearing rubber panties. But his methods have mellowed with time.

Bob was six and Bing sixteen, when Bing decided that his kid brother should join the Fin Club. Bob was a little afraid of water, seeing how painful it was behind the ears, and he had no desire to endure Saturday night more often than once a week.

"Okay," Bing said, when they reached the creek bank, "you sit here like a siss if you want to—I'm going in." This ruse put Bob completely at his ease. He relaxed on the bank, whereupon Bing grabbed him and tossed him into the middle of the pool.

To the nearby school of minnows, he must have looked like a six-year-old octopus with dozens of arms and legs. Also a good healthy pair of lungs which emitted bursts of rage. Using a frog stroke, a dog paddle and a Crosby crawl, Bob reached the bank.

"Nice form," grinned Bing. Then—rather sheepishly—"were you scared, kid?"

Bob shook the water out of his hair, feeling very much a man. "Aw—I knew if anything went wrong, you'd be in there to get me in a hurry," he said.

That faith in Bing's ability to get him out of deep water—of any kind—persisted in Bob's psychology for a good many years. Only once did Bing refuse to dive in, and that instance involved discipline. Bob was playing with an orchestra and living up his weekly pay check in two days. Came the sad night when a session of Ethiopian Ping Pong rallied him right of that old stuff that jingle, jangle, jingles.

It looked to Bob as if cookies were going to be frozen, and he was going to be out of a priority on dream sacks. No board or bed for Bobby. Soooo . . . he borrowed the price of a wire from a fellow musician and asked—in ten words—for dough, and he didn't mean a note of the scale.

Back came the answer: "Too bad you can not reach me. Love. Bing."

This laconic answer was typical of Bing. He's a boy of few—BUT VERY—few words. In the Crosby family everyone has a fancy name. Dad Crosby, who is noted for his blithe disposition, is called "Good Time Harry." Everett, who is described by Bob as "the guy who—before the war—had more pleats in his pants than any other two men in Hollywood" is known as "New York Charlie." Bob, who used to think, talk and write nothing but a Chamber of Commerce description of his adopted state, is labelled "California Elmer." But Bing has always been dubbed "No Talkin' Joe."

no tellin' Joe . . .

While Bing was going to Gonzaga, he started to lunge out of the house one Saturday morning. "Where are you going?" his mother wanted to know.

"Swimming," replied her son.

Bob, who had come to know that Bing's ONE word was sometimes to be heeded as carefully as one hundred from anyone else, tagged his big brother. Not in plain view, you understand, but bush to bush, tree to tree, in the best guerilla fashion. He followed Bing all the way to the Mission Swimming Pool.

Once there, Mr. Bing (Silent) Crosby entered a diving meet and walked away with four first prizes. Bob watched the whole show, softly spreading the news that the Human Porpoise on the springboard was his big brother. He got plenty of attention.

However, he was careful to keep out of Bing's sight.

That night at dinner, Bing consumed his calories as usual—without conversation. So Bob decided that kid brothers should be seen. Period.

The morning paper, with a page of pictures, broke the news. "Do you mean to tell me you won all these events yesterday and didn't say anything about it?" demanded his mother. For answer, Bing proceeded silently to his bedroom and returned with his medals.

Like all mothers everywhere, she was heartsick not to have shared his triumph. "I wish you had told me your plans," she said wistfully. "Some of the family should have been there—we ought to stick together, son."

Bing patted her shoulder and eased out of the room. That dood it. Bob confided excitedly, "I was there, Mom. I saw the whole show." Whereupon he gave his shining-eyed mother a splash by splash description of Bing's victory.

Looking back on it, Bob doesn't think those medals alone account for his pint's-eye view of his big brother as a hero. There was another incident that crystallized the notion. Bing, as nimble a man on his feet as you'll find east of Astaire, developed his adagio by walking logs in a mill pond in Spokane. And, as usual, a small shadow followed him. Bob, thinking that Paul Bunyan must have been a boy once, decided to walk a few logs himself.

life-saver Bing . . .

A mis-step meant almost certain drowning because the logs slid apart to let an out-of-balance victim slide through, then closed exactly like Scylla and Charybdis (if you remember your grade school mythology). The faller-inner drowned with his head bumping against the indifferent logs.

Bing was deftly leaping from ex-tree to ex-tree when he heard a small, terrified cry behind him as Bob slipped between logs and disappeared. Luckily there was no current in the pond, or Bob would have been carried downstream beyond even Bing's quick-witted help. As it was, Bing wedged his body between two logs, grabbed the soaked kid and brought him up for air.

Did Bing go into a long harangue about the nuisance of kid brothers? About their getting into jams? About their being copy-cats who might kill themselves? Not Bing. Nonchalance now—nonchalance then. "Watch your step a little better next time," he advised.

No wonder today Papa Bing is such a success with his own sons. He has a knack for understanding the psychology of sprouts, complete with athletic ambitions. He played baseball for Gonzaga, Bob played baseball for Gonzaga, and Bing wants his four and Bob's one son to ditto for ditto. (Bing said, when Bob's baby boy was born in June, "Nice start. Keep it up and we'll be able to provide a complete Crosby baseball team.")

He has theories about what makes a player valuable. He's teaching Gary—just as he taught Bob years ago—to bat left-handed, and to pitch right-handed. Theory is that a south paw batter develops terrific swing to smack out a three-bagger when necessary, but that a right paw pitcher develops precision and accuracy in that department.

Part of Bing's devotion to baseball and other group sports is due to his belief in team work, such as that which holds the Crosby family unit together. Bing is all in favor of clannishness. When something good comes along, he likes to share it with kin. For instance, Bob's orchestra did all the musical sound track for Bing's latest Paramount picture "Holiday Inn," and Bob is also set for the same job in Bing's next picture—still untitled.

Bob's assuming the Crosby spot on the Kraft Music Hall is another example of the same thing. Everett and Dad Crosby are managers of the family interests, and no decision is made without their okay. Larry, Bing and Bob own the Major Aircraft Foundry in Pasadena—a thriving manufactory established 3 years ago. At that time there were 4 employees and now there are 60. This company probably sees more of Bing than any other spot except his golf course.

The foundry is working for the government, making items which are slightly secret. And, incidentally, making no profits at all for the Crosbys. California Institute of Technology, when it invents a brainstorm, takes it over to the Crosby firm to be tested. And standing around watching without a word—is likely to be No Talkin' Joe.

When a family as closely knit as the Crosbys are, get together, there is always a lot of ribbing and reminiscing. "As long as I live, I'll never forget the first time I started to sing," Bob says. "I was with the Dorsey Brothers, and when we hit Elizabeth, New Jersey, I was elected to do a song. I walked out to the mike and opened my mouth . . . and nothing came out except silence. I didn't have a note in my system. Gosh—what a sensation! It took three trips to the mike, on three different nights, before I finally gave with the vocal chords."

Larry breaks in with, "I don't think that's as funny as the time five years ago when you were doing six shows a day at the Strand in New York and your suspenders broke right in the midst of a swing arrangement of 'When The Leaves All Come Tumbling Down.' I can just see you clutching your pants with one hand and directing the orchestra with the other."

Everett gets kidded because he can't carry a tune in a box car. "You're the only man on earth," Bob tells him, "who can sing 'Rosalie' and make it sound like 'Gypsy Love Song.'"

And Everett comes back, "I may not be able to sing, but—boy!—my sox always match. No Talkin' Joe came walking in here the other day wearing one bright burgundy sock and one emerald green."

Bing is color blind. No matter how hard he tries to match up his outfits, he always manages to scare a rainbow.

"Remember," Everett recalls, "how Ted used to padlock his closet so the rest of us couldn't borrow his clothes?"

"I could use one of those padlocks right now," opines Bing, without looking in Bob's direction. Significance of this crack is that whenever Bob gets bored with his own wardrobe, he oozes over to Bing's and takes a squint. Bing's plaids, giddy slacks and other fancy haberdashery appeal to him so he "borrows" an occasional item. "I never had a chance to wear anybody else's clothes when I was growing up," Bob complains, "so I have to catch up on this community thing now."

double talk . . .

Larry says, "Speaking of communities and how they grow, I still think the funniest crack Bing ever made was that wire to Ted." Ted and his wife added a pair of twin girls to the very young Crosby generation just three months before Bing's twin boys were born. Ted wired, to announce the event, "I hold a pair of queens."

When Bing became a dual-role papa, he wired back, "My pair of kings beat your queens."

As for babies, when Bob learned that he was to become a father, he went to Bing—a genius at the game—and asked for advice. Bing, putting aside his pipe and his reticence for a bit, gave him a long talk. Bing is sentimental enough to idealize women. For that reason he has a lot of ideas about how they should be treated all the time, but especially what should be said, and what thoughtful things should be done for them when blessed events are on the way.

"Just remember," he told Bob, "when you talk over things with your wife, that ALL babies are girls. Don't let her think for a moment that you want anything but a daughter. Plan in advance on be-ribboned clothes and a girl's school. Think up girls' names. Then, if the baby is a girl, your wife will be happy, and if the baby is a boy—well, that will be swell, too."

Bob absorbed this information. "Thanks," he said. Then—not passing up an opportunity to have some fun no matter how solemn the occasion—he added, "Remember when I was six and you were sixteen? I found a five dollar bill one day and told you about it. You made me divide fifty-fifty with you, but somehow you got three bucks and I got two. Well, we're square now. I'm going to charge off that extra fifty cents in payment for advice."

When Bob's progeny arrived, it was a girl which had already been named Kathleen.

Bing hastened over to look at his new niece. "She's all reet," he murmured in awe. "She's reet sweet." Then he turned to Kathleen's beaming dad. "If I give you back that three bucks," he asked, "will you give me some good advice?"

"Not on your life," quoth Bob. "Having a daughter is my one accomplishment that no one can compare to your previous performance!"

starts to dance occasionally, on his afternoons off, but inevitably he ends up taking a hand with the band and showing them how they do it in Glenn Miller style. Connie, meanwhile, goes back to her table and nurses her coke. Then, too, there's the matter of the quick trips the band makes when Connie can't go.

As it happens there's one very pretty girl, Jaynie Stevens (Lynn Bari) who sings right with the band wherever it goes. And Jaynie, bless her, is carrying a torch for Bill. On tour the band makes a quick jump to Iowa City one night, leaving the wives behind. The first trombone's wife takes that opportunity to tell Connie about Jaynie and Bill.

Quicker than a station break, Connie is on her way to Iowa City, and sure enough she finds Jaynie and Bill with their heads together. What she doesn't know is that Bill's been tricked into it. Before she finds that out, she manages to break up the band, break up her marriage and break her heart. It all comes out, of course; Glenn Miller's still piping the tunes hot or sweet. Connie learns

THE MAJOR AND THE MINOR

Remember when Mama used to insist to the trolley car motorman that you were under twelve and entitled to half fare even though you were beginning to look like a football halfback and there definitely was a bristle on your chin? Well, in "The Major and the Minor," Susan Applegate (Ginger Rogers) is down to her last twenty-seven-fifty which is supposed to get her back home from big, bad New York. But railroad fare back home turned out to be thirty-two fifty. What to do?

All the better railroad terminals come equipped with Ladies' Rooms, and Susan pops into one aged twenty-two and comes out again aged twelve. It's all a matter of pig tails and dimples. Susan had the dimples all along. Susan, at that, thinks she's pretty smart and in the clear; but the conductor, like all officials, is just a mite suspicious and when he catches her sneaking a smoke out on the observation car, little Susan is in a pretty fix. Like the little girl discovered with her hand in the cookie jar, Susan just runs. She runs plump into an empty compartment, slams the door and collapses into the seat.

Enter the Major.

The Major is the real thing with all the military trimmings and pretty young for his title. Major Philip Kirby (Ray Milland) is on his way to the Coast, back to Wallace Military Institute where he is an instructor. The Major is quite taken with little "Susu," soothes her crying and tucks her paternally in the lower berth while he climbs into the upper.

Comes a complication when the Major's fiancée, Pamela (Rita Johnson) discovers some decidedly feminine things in the Major's compartment and immediately springs to the right conclusion. Pardon, the wrong one, because Susu, of course, is only twelve years old. Susan, who meant to confess her little fraud to the Major in the morning when all was safe, obviously no longer can. Matter of fact she has to go along to the Institute to clear his name.

Everyone there is immediately taken with the pleasant little child, and before Sue knows what's what, she finds herself invited to stay at Pamela's sharing a room with Pam's real twelve-year-old sister, Lucy. Lucy isn't a bad sort at all; the little devil has a pack of cigarettes hidden under her mattress and is only too glad to share a puff with Sue.

All is not well at the Wallace Military Institute. The Major is disgruntled because he can't seem to get assigned to active duty. And Pamela, it turns out, is definitely not the girl for a man like Philip Kirby. Still masquerading as a twelve-year-old, Sue decides to turn things right; and you'd be surprised the things a twelve-year-old girl can accomplish especially if she's 21 or so.

You can't be young forever, and just when Sue thinks she has everything under control, Pamela discovers the fraud. It's fireworks for fair then. No longer hampered by her braids, Sue goes on the warpath and the result, not very surprising but very satisfying, is that the Major gets his assignment to duty and the Minor gets her man. Pamela settles for a banker from Chicago.—Par.

P. S.

Ginger Rogers brought her lunch to the studio every day, ate it in her dressing room so she'd have time for a quick nap afterwards . . . Director Billy Wilder thought it was a swell idea, showed up each day with his lunch, then nibbled at it all morning. Came noon time, he had to join the commissary crowd anyway . . . Young Broadway actor, Richard Roe, came to Hollywood for a visit and heard from his pal Jimmy Lydon that Paramount was looking for a guy like him. Richard was interviewed at noon, given the part at 5 o'clock, filled out his application for a work permit at 5:10, spent part of the evening at a tailor's getting his uniform fitted and was on the set ready to work at nine the next morning. First thing he had to do was rush into a scene and kiss Ginger violently! . . . Lela Rogers turned actress for this one and posed for lots of publicity stills with her daughter, showing how much alike they look . . . After her scenes were finished, Lela went back to the 4R ranch (1100 acres) to see how the Guernsey cows were getting along. Each week she sends Ginger fresh eggs, fruit, vegetables . . . Robert Benchley received a wire during production, telling him he is now officially Mayor of Marineland, Florida—population: 25 people, 400,000 fish. Has received so much kidding since, he is threatening to resign. . . Paramount bought 75 $12.50 evening dresses for the young girls in the school scenes. Studio figured their own would be too elaborate, since they were probably purchased B. P. (Before Priorities) . . . Edith Head used a 12-inch doll to experiment with grown-up costumes that could be changed to a plausible kiddie version in 3 minutes . . . Director Wilder always signifies a perfect take by shouting "Champagne for everyone!"

THUNDER BIRDS

Here comes the monthly grouch review, and if it sounds petulant, don't blame it on the weather; the snarl is strictly premeditated. The point of all this ill temper is an item called "Thunder Birds." "Thunder Birds" is an important production. Filmed in technicolor, expensively mounted and produced, it uses as background the air training program of the United Nations.

Spotted through America are flying fields where British, Chinese and American pilots are learning their loops and turns. We're building not only an arsenal of democracy, but an arsenal of trained men. Here, worked out in actual practice, are the United Nations in action. On those fields is what we are actually fighting for: the dream that varied nations can work together toward a common destiny.

A tremendous theme you might say, yes? A theme worthy of all the truth, dignity and power that Hollywood can lavish on it. Here are the Four Freedoms and the Atlantic Charter in reality. Here's a story so important and so close to us that just the bare statement of it is enough to set the pulses pounding and hearts beating higher.

And what is "Thunder Birds" about actually?

It's the old chestnut of two men and a girl, handled as it has been handled in dozens of pictures before—trite, ordinary and, in face of the theme, cheap and tawdry. We're asked to thrill again to the horny-handed old-timer (Preston Foster) and the clean-cut Britisher (John Sutton) as they vie for the hand of a girl (Gene Tierney). "Thunder Birds" comes replete with wisecracks and kisses in the moonlight, romantic misunderstanding and cute little touches and fancies. "Thunder Birds" reduces the air training program to a feud between two lovesick swains.

There are, of course, shots of airplanes in action, and these can scarcely fail to be thrilling, filmed as they are in natural color. There's an occasional reference to the need to fight the Axis. There's a hint that these boys are bound a bit further than the nearest altar. But scarcely enough to make a dent in the story, and the theme noted above is just lost in the shuffle.

As we've been repeating for months, this department has nothing against love. Some of the best pictures we ever saw have been love stories. But this relegating of the war to a background for a conventional triangle is shameful; basically pictures like these have nothing at all to do with the war. Hollywood is just making capital of the headlines. Surely no one is asking that all pictures be grim and realistic; there's a place and a need even for pictures which have nothing at all to do with the war. Entertainment and release are at a premium in these tense days. But when Hollywood does turn to the war, it's not asking too much that they do so in the same mood that it is being fought.

The only complication "Thunder Birds" can evolve, beside who gets the girl and when, is the problem of the young Britisher. Seems he gets airsick every time he goes up in a plane; just can't control his stomach. That's the only thing they could think of for an air-training program that's supplying pilots, bombardiers and navigators for every far-flung battle line on this globe.

Well, my stomach seems to be turning, too; and both my feet are on the ground. —20th-Fox.

flesh-colored bathing suit, to keep the Hays office happy . . . Most of the location shots were taken at Falcon, Thunderbird and Luke Flying Fields, near Phoenix, Arizona, where American instructors are teaching the art of fighting-flying to Chinese, British and home-grown youths . . . Preston Foster took a terrific physical beating throughout the picture, topped by a parachute descent in a studio-manufactured dust-storm. Everything was o.k. on the first take 'til the sound man reported the microphones had picked up Mr. F.'s muttered comments. "We'll have to do it over," demanded director William Wellman, "and this time, Pres, keep your thoughts to yourself!" . . . Writer-Producer Lamar Trotti went along with the troupe on location and rewrote the script to take advantage of the fresh twist in story material presented by local conditions . . . The spectacular Technicolor footage of ships in flights is the work of cinematographer Ernie Palmer, who spent days working out the technical problems involved . . . Most popular man, the troupe discovered, was Jack Holt, whose pictures are better known to Arizona habitants than any other star's . . . After one particularly long clinch with John Sutton, Gene Tierney backed away, gasped, "That's not the way an Englishman kisses!" Mr. Sutton, embarrassed, confessed he'd picked up the American technique since working in Hollywood, and banished himself to the projection room to study some of his earlier love scenes. Now when you see the close-up of the Sutton-Tierney kiss (in Technicolor, too) it'll have the stamp of authenticity on it.

TALES OF MANHATTAN

There are enough stars in "Tales of Manhattan" to staff five or six double features and a handful of shorts; no less than ten writers pooled their awesome talents on the script, and it took a pair of producers to share the worries and the headaches. For the record, though, only one director is credited with the job; probably he once ran a three ring circus.

Let's take a quick fling at the cast just to show you what you'll be getting for your money. Top rating goes to Charles Boyer, Rita Hayworth, Ginger Rogers, Henry Fonda, Charles Laughton, Edward G. Robinson and Paul Robeson. Only one peg below you'll find Ethel Waters, Rochester, Thomas Mitchell, Eugene Pallette, Cesar Romero, Gail Patrick, Roland Young, George Sanders, Victor Francen and Elsa Lanchester. The cast goes on for several pegs more, but that ought to give you the idea.

It's top notch entertainment, of course. It could scarcely be otherwise with a list of credits like that. It's not a great picture, nor even a particularly good one. But no movie fan in his right mind will miss it. They'll be talking about it and comparing notes about it for months to come, so unless you want to sit in a corner and brood, better see it soon.

The picture is told in episodes with each star taking his turn before the camera for his sequence and then disappearing for the rest of the film. It all hinges on a tailcoat, black, beautiful and fateful. Before it's finished, that tailcoat has been draped around more shoulders than a playboy's baited mink coat.

It appears first on the shoulders of matinee idol, Charles Boyer, gets mixed up in a love affair with Rita Hayworth and is finally bored through with a neat hole from the gun of Thomas Mitchell. Charles Boyer, of course, is wearing it at the time.

It flips along, via a conniving butler, to the apartment of playboy Cesar Romero and promptly causes more trouble. Because of the tailcoat, Ginger Rogers dumps Cesar and marries Henry Fonda. Henry, knowing what's good for him, doesn't bother to take the tailcoat with him.

Dumped into a second-hand shop it's picked up by Charles Laughton to decorate his big night—the first performance of his symphony in Carnegie Hall. It's witness there to the near tragedy of that night. And witness, too, to the final success.

From there it goes to Edward G. Robinson, a Bowery bum who's seen better days. What's he want with a tailcoat? His college class is having a reunion at the Waldorf Astoria, and the invitation, delivered to him in a garbage-littered alley in Chinatown, expressly states: Attire—Formal.

Back to the pawn shop again. And there it's highjacked by a couple of gangsters who need a tailcoat to engineer a high class stick-up. They net fifty thousand dollars and are fleeing south by airplane when the motor conks and the tailcoat, fifty thousand dollars richer, comes floating down on the breeze into the cotton patch of Paul Robeson. The fifty thousand is duly appreciated by the whole community who consider the tailcoat strictly a miracle and manna from heaven.

The tailcoat?

It ends up on a scarecrow in the field of a poor negro.

It is, as you can easily see, a wild, colorful, fantastic picture. It runs the gamut from stark tragedy to outrageous farce. It tries to be everything to all people. You're likely to be bored stiff by one sequence and sitting on the edge of your chair for others. At any rate there are at least ten major stars to keep you entertained.

Now for opinions: This department didn't like the Boyer sequence, thought Ginger Rogers was shamefully wasted. The Charles Laughton episode was the best conceived and the best acted with a special nod to Victor Francen in his role of a Toscanini-like maestro. Robinson's specialty began strong and then fizzled. The Robeson-Waters tailpiece almost stole the picture, vivid, alive and beautifully acted. The director, Julien Duvivier, who juggled all these stars, their temperaments and varied techniques, ought, at least, to get a medal for bravery.—20th-Fox.

P. S.

Every part in the film was tailored-by-typewriter to fit the person who played it . . . Producers Boris Morros and S. P. Eagle reversed the usual order of a Hollywood deal and got all their actors and necessary story rights lined up before they arranged their financial backing . . . Everyone in Hollywood wanted to have something to do with the picture . . . The originality of the idea appealed to actors, writers, composers, directors . . . When production finally started, the headaches tripled. How could so many important stars get away from other studio contracts long enough to work together? Morros and Eagle worked out the details, aided by Darryl F. Zanuck, who had made a verbal deal with the men to produce the film . . . Every department had an expert at its head. The original music for the film was written mostly by Sol Kaplan, with one hymn, "Glory Day," written by Ralph Rainger and Leo Robin . . . 83 separate, elaborate sets were turned out by Richard Day and Boris Leven . . . Gwen Wakeling, Bernard Newman, Irene and Dolly Tree shared credit for the costumes . . . Director Julien Duvivier had charge of the entire group of separate sequences and burned the midnight oil, but late, working out the characterizations after discussions with the actors . . . S. P. Eagle changed his name shortly before production began. It used to be Sam Spiegel, and when the studio wags heard about the switch, they began laying bets as to how soon he would shorten it further to E. A. Gull!

THE HARD WAY

Warner Brothers may once have had the idea of building Ida Lupino into a sort of second string Bette Davis. But Miss Lupino long ago proved that she's nobody's second string. Now in "The Hard Way," she's achieved the dignity of a vehicle. Obviously the story was tailored to her measure, and it's almost impossible to imagine anyone else in the role of Helen Chernen but the vivid Ida herself.

"The Hard Way" is the tale of a female Svengali, and while Miss Lupino has not quite the piercing eye of the late John Barrymore, she's no slouch with the eyes herself; or on the eyes either. For proof, you may remember the strangling scene from Miss Lupino's "Ladies In Retirement"; if you saw the picture at all, you haven't forgotten that bit. Miss Lupino strangles no one in "The Hard Way," but if looks could kill, the cast might have been shy a member or two before the final reel.

Beginning in a grimy factory town, the story focuses on Helen Chernen. Married to a lump of a man, hating the town and it's ugliness, the only joy she finds is in the youth and beauty of her younger sister, Katherine. Katherine, she is determined, will not be trapped as she was; and to save her, Helen, is willing to lie, steal or kill.

Grabbing at a passing opportunity, she engineers a marriage between Katherine and a vaudevillian, Albert Runkel, who, playing a one night stand in the town, is attracted to her pretty sister. Albert Runkel and Paul Collins had a two-man act playing the rounds of the vaudeville circuit, and Helen has it in back of her mind that Katherine could make a success on the stage.

Leaving her husband, she travels with them, guiding Katherine, tolerating Runkel only because she still has use for him. She forces Collins out of the act when he begins to suspect that Helen wants to break them up. And in New

Here in town the biggest dance hall was over a super-garage and Kemp played there some years ago. A little girl, on the dare of a friend, sang a number during his band's playing and then probably wondered how badly she'd be bawled out for it. York she forces Runkel out when an offer is made for Katherine alone.

From there on Helen plays her cards shrewdly. She maneuvers Katherine into a spot in the show of Zagrue, Ziegfeld of his day; at the expense of another actress, of course. She drives Katherine hard forcing her higher and higher into the Broadway world, from success to success. She makes her, finally, into a musical comedy star, toast of New York.

But the shadow of Runkel and Collins always somewhat mars the sun of her success. For Katherine and Runkel were really in love. Fearing that Runkel may yet talk Katherine into returning to him, Helen cheats, lies and fights like a cornered tiger. And wins. For she drives Runkel to suicide.

Then only the shadow of Collins remains. He is too wise and shrewd for Helen to beat. With Runkel dead, Collins feels free to tell Katherine that he loves her. He pleads with her to escape from Helen; Helen, he tells her, is a parasite living on her body. But Katherine, overwhelmed by Helen's force and drive, cannot quite make the break. The story builds to a climax with Collins and Helen pitted one against the other. Who wins in this battle for a soul is the secret of the Brothers Warner, and it would be taking the edge off the story to divulge it.

Dennis Morgan as Collins and Jack Carson as Runkel, handle the male leads. Joan Leslie is the bewildered and beautiful Katherine. Gladys George, Roman Bohnen and Faye Emerson are all in the supporting cast.

"The Hard Way" is thoroughly artificial, but it has an intensity and novelty quite its own. It's not regular movie fare, but that, perhaps, is its attraction. It's another portrait in Miss Lupino's gallery of poisonous females.—War.

I SAW IT HAPPEN

It happened at the Fontenelle Hotel in Omaha, Nebraska, during the Golden Spike days of 1939. George Burns and Gracie Allen were walking down the hall of the banquet room when I first saw them. Gracie wore an evening dress and carried a bouquet of beautiful flowers. George was dressed in an old-timer's outfit. They both looked so nice that before I realized what I was doing, I found myself standing before George, trying to speak tho I was speechless. I gathered courage to ask him for a souvenir and he said, "O.K., I'll give you a very good one." Breathless, I waited. He opened his mouth. "You can have Gracie," he offered.

SOMEWHERE I'LL FIND YOU

14. Kirk went to his death blotting out a nest of machine gunners. For his medal, he left just Jonny Davis, telling the story of that tremendous stand on Bataan. Heroes stiffly holding on for ninety-four days that changed the world. Jonny grimly told the story, name after name inscribed in golden prose. And there came to him Paula Lane, who hadn't been killed because she'd been helping some wounded in the field. Together they began to tell the radiant story of a glory far too great and fine for tears. For Jonny was fighting his own way, with the printed page, and his story closed with the words "MORE TO COME."

PRODUCTION NOTES

Quietly, Clark Gable returned to Metro to finish a job he'd begun.

He didn't have to come back. A big studio like Metro-Goldwyn-Mayer could easily have struck the production off the books and absorbed the cost of a few weeks' research and two days of actual filming. Players signed for roles in the picture could have secured their release with no trouble at all.

Gable looked at it a little differently, though, and one day, not too many weeks after Carole's tragic death, he strode onto the lot and went to work. The set was closed, of course. Metro's publicity department threw its gears into reverse and kept as quiet about the picture as possible.

Things leaked out, though. Stories of Gable's perfect dignity, the way he set the mood—not too somber, not too gay. Between scenes, he stayed around and talked to his pals. Sometimes he'd go in his dressing room and shut the door. Then production would halt until he chose to come out again, whether it was minutes or hours later. When the picture was finished, Gable left immediately to offer his services to Uncle Sam.

Part of the quietness of the set was due to Director Wesley Ruggles, who never wastes words. His secretary confided that during the fourteen years she's worked for him, he'd said not more than twenty-five words to her.

Lana got the idea for a Victory Hairdo during the picture's filming, and had Sydney Guilaroff cut off her long tresses. News of the bob reached England, and Lana was asked by officials to send instructions for the coiffure to the women of the British Isles as quickly as possible. Ideal for war work, they said, the short hair-do would be ultra-practical and safe—wouldn't get caught in defense plant machinery.

There were no elaborate wardrobes. Lana and Pat Dane have only two changes apiece. Turner wanders through a greater part of the film in a white shantung suit and a dirty face.

The research department had tough going, too. No longer could they send a wire to Java or Manila to verify facts. One mistake was deliberately left in. Gable scratches a match on a wall, and in the flare, sees a calendar. It's December 7th, but he's in Manila, where the 7th would be the 8th. The studio okayed the shot, said it came under the heading of dramatic license, and hoped not too many folks realized an error had been made.

The few laughs on the set were contributed by the Chinese kiddies who spent their time between scenes in Lana's dressing room. Every time they emerged, they had mascara daubed on their cheeks, lipstick streaked on their foreheads and greasepaint over the entire mess.

Follow this Bride's Way to New Loveliness! go on the CAMAY MILD-SOAP DIET!

This exciting complexion care is based on skin specialists' advice —praised by lovely brides!

"MY FRIENDS tell me how much lovelier my complexion has become since I started following the Camay Mild-Soap Diet. I wouldn't be without Camay for a day," says beautiful Mrs. Carnohan.

You, too, can be lovelier if you will only give the Camay Mild-Soap Diet a chance. For, without knowing it, you may be letting improper cleansing dull your complexion—or you may be using a soap that isn't mild enough!

Skin specialists advise regular cleansing with a fine mild soap. And Camay is actually milder than dozens of other popular beauty soaps! That's why we say, "Go on the Camay Mild-Soap Diet."

Give your skin thorough cleansing with Camay night and morning for 30 days. At once—what a delicious, fresh feeling! But be faithful—and soon your complexion may have thrilling new loveliness!

This lovely bride, Mrs. Harry Carnohan of New York, N. Y., says:

"I wouldn't let my skin go without the Camay Mild-Soap Diet for a single day—it has done so much for me! Why, I'd been following the Mild-Soap Diet only a short time when my friends began asking for my beauty secret!"

"Only Tangee gives your lips Satin-Finish," says Constance Luft Huhn

"How often have you wished for a lipstick that would literally smooth on to your lips; that was perfectly balanced... neither too moist, nor yet too dry; that, once applied, would cling for hours and hours—a lipstick, in short, that would bring to your lips the lustrous, lasting softness of a true SATIN-FINISH?

"I can say with assurance that each of Tangee's new SATIN-FINISH Lipsticks is a combination of all these qualities. Each one graces your lips with a softer, glossier sheen than you've ever known before... gives you the perfect grooming only possible with this exclusive SATIN-FINISH.

"And, remember, whichever Tangee shade you choose, it will do the most for you if worn with the matching rouge and Tangee's unpowdery Face Powder."

New TANGEE MEDIUM-RED... a warm, clear shade. Not too dark, not too light... just right.
TANGEE RED-RED... "Rarest, Loveliest Red of Them All," harmonizes perfectly with all fashion colors.
TANGEE THEATRICAL RED... "The Brilliant Scarlet Lipstick Shade"... always flattering.
TANGEE NATURAL... "Beauty for Duty"—conservative make-up for women in uniform. Orange in the stick, it changes to produce your own most becoming shade of blush-rose.

Smile, Plain Girl, Smile...

all hearts respond to a radiant smile!

Make your smile the passport to new happiness! Help keep it bright and sparkling with Ipana and Massage.

GLANCE ABOUT YOU, plain girl! Who are the bright stars of your own special intimate world? Are they all beautiful—all candidates for a screen test?

Of course not! But the chances are their smiles are bright. For a sparkling smile can light up the plainest face—give it a charm and a warmth no eyes can resist.

Make your smile the real you! But, remember, a bright, sparkling smile depends largely on firm, healthy gums. Play safe—if your tooth brush "shows pink," heed its warning.

Never ignore "Pink Tooth Brush"

If your tooth brush shows a tinge of "pink"—see your dentist right away. It may not mean anything serious, but get his decision.

It's very likely he'll tell you that your gums have become sensitive because they've been denied natural exercise by today's soft, creamy foods. His suggestion, like so many dentists, may be "the helpful stimulation of Ipana Tooth Paste and massage."

For Ipana not only cleans teeth to sparkling brilliance but, with massage, is designed to aid the health of the gums as well. Every time you brush your teeth, massage a little extra Ipana onto your gums. Circulation is increased in the gums, helping them to a hardier, healthier firmness.

Today adopt the modern dental routine of Ipana and massage and help yourself to have brighter teeth, firmer gums, a more radiant, sparkling smile.

The greatest star of the screen!

Our Department of Curious Statistics informs us that "Mrs. Miniver" has hung up the Lost Kerchief record.

★ ★ ★ ★

It seems that more handkerchiefs were left in the seats than in the case of any previous duct-draining cinema.

★ ★ ★ ★

A more solid statistic about this M-G-M masterpiece is that from all indications "Mrs. Miniver" will play to more people than any other single film ever released.

★ ★ ★ ★

"Mrs. Miniver" is more than a movie. It's a message of moment!

★ ★ ★ ★

For a waggish lion we are sounding too terribly in earnest. If you'll promise to go and see "The War Against Mrs. Hadley"—another "Mrs."—and another motion picture that's timely, topical and top-notch, we'll get on to lighter aspects of shadow life!

★ ★ ★ ★

As for instance "Seven Sweethearts" the charmer which brings out so many talented new faces, led by Kathryn Grayson, Van Heflin and Marsha Hunt.

★ ★ ★ ★

And Red Skelton's new comic confection called "Whistling in Dixie", the ultimate in gaiety since "Whistling in the Dark".

★ ★ ★ ★

Red's maternal parent might be called The Whistler's Mother.

★ ★ ★ ★

Perhaps the best music since such things began will be Judy Garland in "For Me and My Gal". Watch as well Gene Kelly of "Pal Joey" fame.

★ ★ ★ ★

And the most effective looking morsel ever to be shot by a photographer is Hedy Lamarr as Tondelayo in "White Cargo".

We're pretty effective too—Tonde-Leo

Driven almast mad by a tyrannical mather, Charlatte Vale (Bette Davis) takes a cruise, falls in lave with unhappily-wed Jerry Durance (Paul Henreid).

MOVIE REVIEWS

By Zachary Gold

When Jerry and Charlatte miss the baat during a shore leave, they have 5 days af paradise tagether.

NOW, VOYAGER

The past few pictures that Bette Davis made led to the unhappy but pretty firm conclusion that the girl ought to see a good psychiatrist before she became known as Balmy Betty. The Brothers Warner evidently had the same idea and, having a spare psychiatrist or two left over from an old set of "Kings Row," they straightened Bette out in two hours of absorbing screen fare. "Now, Voyager" is a tender and moving love story told in the grand manner, and Miss Davis makes the most of her return to sanity.

To be sure, the picture opens with Miss Davis still holding the fort in her previous manner. Her first appearance is enough to scare the kiddies who might still remember the witch of Disney's "Snow White"; the resemblance is uncanny. Miss Davis sports thick eyebrows, glittering eyeglasses, a hair-do inspired by wet seaweed and a manner strangely similar to a cornered and terrified rabbit. Obviously she hasn't got all her buttons, and we're not referring to the dowdy dress she wears at the time.

The reason Miss Davis looks and acts like the Before section of a Before-and-After ad is a tyrannical mother who could use a few mental tests herself. Charlotte Vale (Bette Davis) was the last child of Mrs. Henry Windle Vale, of the Boston Vales, who went the Cabots one better and didn't speak even to God. Child of middle age, unwanted, Charlotte has been repressed, to put it mildly, by her mother's mid-Victorian ideas. At the time the story opens, Charlotte is twenty-eight, looks forty, feels eighty and is on the verge of a nervous breakdown.

Enter the psychiatrist, Dr. Jaquith (Claude Rains), who whisks Charlotte off to his sanitarium in the mountains from under Mrs. Henry Windle Vale's startled nose. She reaches a point, finally, where no one can help any longer except herself. Dr. Jaquith suggests a sea voyage alone and on her own, quoting a bit of Walt Whitman at her: "Now, voyager, sail thou forth to see and find."

Charlotte sees an enchanted world, the islands of the Caribbean, a moon-filled sea, a beauty-struck old church, a road winding along a palm-lined shore. And she finds underneath the horror mask she used to wear as a face, a startling and soul-satisfying beauty. Wearing, for once, clothes that fit and flatter her, she finds men eyeing her admiringly. Learning to laugh a little, she finds a bit of happiness to store against the (Continued on page 11)

In psychiatrist Dr. Jaquith's (Claude Rains) sanitarium she meets Jerry's ill-adjusted child and adapts her.

Charlotte returns to Boston a totally different girl, proclaims her independence to her mother (Gladys Cooper).

During a particularly bad set-to, Mrs. Vale drops dead. Charlotte thinks she has killed her.

MOVIE REVIEWS

rank bitterness that had been her lot.

And aboard ship, she finds Jerry Durrance (Paul Henreid).

It's a curiously moving and touching love story, for Jerry Durrance is already married, and they find each other at first only as a refuge against the loneliness that had been their share in life. Jerry is married to a shrew of a woman who has nearly ruined his life and is ruining the life of his child, Tina, whom Charlotte immediately recognizes as a younger counterpart of herself. Driven by their loneliness, the two fall in love, knowing that nothing can come of it, that they will each return to their separate worlds once the trip is over.

It doesn't work out quite that way for them, however. Charlotte returns to Boston and to her triumph over her mother, who, she discovers, can no longer harm her. Her new-found beauty and poise bring her new suitors; but always in the background of her mind is the memory of Jerry. And through Tina, who is being treated by Dr. Jaquith on Charlotte's recommendation, she and Jerry meet again—a bittersweet ending.

Miss Davis is radiantly lovely in the sympathetic role of Charlotte Vale. She has the happy faculty of portraying a woman in love with grace and maturity and without a single moonstruck simper. She acts the role with all the brittle intensity that has become her trademark, but, whether due to her own discretion or the direction of Irving Rapper, with none of the annoying mannerisms she sometimes employes. Miss Davis, in short, is superb.

Matching her performance in a role as difficult as her own, Paul Henreid gives depth and perception to his portrayal of Jerry Durrance. While Henreid is not new to Hollywood, "Now, Voyager" is likely to make him a sought-after leading man. He's handsome, charming, a fine actor and has the neat ability of lighting two cigarettes at a time.

The cast as a whole rates applause for their performances. Claude Rains, Gladys Cooper, Ilka Chase and Bonita Granville handle their roles effectively; and Janis Wilson, as the girl Tina, is a miniature Bette Davis.—War.

P. S.

Miss Davis did a bit of shuddering when she first glimpsed herself in make-up for the early sequences of the film. A wig, false eyebrows, cotton padding and glasses were used to make her up as an old maid. Bette, always frank, told pals, "I might look exactly like this right now if I didn't diet, didn't take exercise, just let myself go. What an object lesson I am!" . . . Letters written for the screen (called 'inserts') are seldom photographed using the star, but Bette wanted to do hers herself. The closeness of the camera, set over her right shoulder, gave her her first case of camera fright, so she's never going to do it again . . . The kissing scenes consumed 8 hours and 5 minutes, and three complete lipsticks. Bette's face was made up four times during the day, twice before and twice after lunch . . . Ilka Chase was hired to play Bette's sister-in-law because Director Irving Rapper thought she'd be good for the part and not because she'd written a book . . . Between scenes, Claude Rains worked out plans for his new cattle business, recently started on his Pennsylvania

CAIRO

When boy meets girl in the movies these days, one of them is sure to be a spy or at least is suspected of being one. Love exists by sanction of the FBI in our troubled times; you're never sure, watching some moonstruck couple wander along a secluded path, whether the next move is going to be a kiss or a quick grab for the secret plans. It would be no surprise at all to find Dan Cupid himself decked out in a false mustache in some future film epic.

In "Cairo," for instance, such personable Hollywood people as Robert Young and Jeanette MacDonald play this confusing game of spy-spy-who's-the-spy. Robert suspects Jeanette; and Jeanette keeps a wary eye on Robert. It may please you to know, however, that despite suspicions, they manage to fall in love.

"Cairo" begins in Cavity Rock, California, where Homer Smith (Robert Young) is about to leave for the Egyptian front for the Cavity Rock Leader, billed as "America's foremost small town newspaper." Somewhere in the Mediterranean, Homer's ship runs into a torpedo, and Homer runs into a full blown spy plot.

Following his thread of clues, Homer reaches Cairo, and whom do you think he suspects of being the leader of the local Nazi agents? It's one Marcia Warren, a beautiful American movie star (Jeanette MacDonald). Homer has his own methods of operation, and in order to get the goods on the gal, it seems that he has to take a job as her butler. It seems, too, that he falls in love with her, though that wasn't strictly necessary.

As an extra incentive, there's a secret weapon added to all the spy chasing in "Cairo." And before Homer knows it, he finds himself in a radio controlled bomber off to sink a transport ship; there's nothing much he can do about it except sit tight and hope for the best. But Marcia has been hot on his trail, and through a clever device, manages to trap the real spies just in time. Homer's radio controlled plane is shifted to another wavelength, and he wings back to Cairo and Marcia's loving arms.

Starring Jeanette MacDonald, "Cairo" naturally has its share of songs. Miss MacDonald's high C's are as polished as of yore, and while you may or may not regret the absence of Nelson Eddy, she has an effective, if non-singing partner in Robert Young. Ethel Waters has a role in this one, too. And flitting in and out of the story, you'll find Reginald Owen, Grant Mitchell, Lionel Atwill, Mona Barrie and Eduardo Cianelli.

Just a few added notes about the film. Miss MacDonald plays a movie star in the film and rewards her new husband at the end of the picture with a contract to co-star with her. Neat. And item two: Lionel Atwill is listed in the cast as a Teutonic Gentleman. Is there really any such thing?—M-G-M.

P. S.

Jeanette MacDonald spent her spare time between "takes" planning programs for her army camp tours . . . She balances her selections between sweet and hot, says the most requested song is "Indian Love Call" . . . Ethel Waters says jive talk is just 25 years too late. In 1917 she was billed on theater marquees as "Sweet Momma Stringbeans" . . Bob Young did his traveling to and from studio via motorcycle—25 miles twice a day . . . White mice used for one of the scenes caused every femme present to make for the chairs. Except Mona Barrie, who thinks they're "cute" and fed 'em out of her hand! . . . Lena Horne, sepia-skinned songstress, spends her evenings singing at Hollywood's favorite night club, Mocambo . . . Pyramids were specially built before the new $5000 ceiling on set costs was put into effect. More than an acre of ground on the back lot was roped off so there'd be plenty of room for their construction . . . 1890 candles were needed for one sequence. They were found right in the studio's own prop department; part of a consignment shipped from Egypt after the head prop buyer's last trip there to purchase authentic furniture and objets d'art.

BELLS OF CAPISTRANO

"Bells of Capistrano," Mr. Autry's latest, is as good an example as any of what's doing in the western world these days. Like everything else, the Western has changed with the times. Trucks and automobiles share the screen with the horses; and guns, while worn, aren't handled with quite the freedom they were in the days of William S. Hart. Then, too, as you may know, Gene Autry sings. "Bells of Capistrano" is something in the way of a musical.

The story is concerned with the World-Wide Wild West Show and Rodeo, on the verge of bankruptcy due to the competition of a rival outfit. What's more, Jennifer Benton, the young and pretty owner of World-Wide has half made up her mind to marry Stag Johnson, who runs the competing rodeo. That's the point at which Gene ambles in on his horse with a guitar tucked across the saddle. Gene sings World-Wide into solvency and Jennifer into a state of bliss.

But before either of these two things is accomplished, there's a bit of fighting and riding. This is done in a lusty, free-handed style which is the trademark of the Western. The two competing rodeos tangle in a gusty free-for-all, a fire rages through the World-Wide tents, and Gene is all over the place, as handy with his fists as with his voice. There's no lack of action to fill the spaces between the songs.

In the best tradition of Western heroes, Gene is modest, unassuming, tough and hard-riding. He doesn't talk too much, praise hannah, and when action will do the trick, he's all for action. He knows what's right, he's loyal to his friends and courteous to the ladies. There's nothing about Gene Autry to shame the long line of western stars who preceded him.

You'll find Smiley Burnette, Lucien Littlefield, Morgan Conway and Charles Cane parading their wares in "Bells of Capistrano." Virginia Grey is the beauteous Miss Jennifer. Modest and unassuming as its hero, "Bells of Capistrano" is apt to prove as entertaining as many a more publicized movie, if you like Westerns. And who doesn't?—Rep.

P. S.

Cast and crew worked night and day to finish production before Gene Autry's Army induction date . . . Most illustrious set-visitor was Sister Kenny, who was brought on the lot by Claire Du Brey, working in the film. Autry is the Sister's favorite screen personality . . . An entire town, built on Republic's back lot and condemned to be torn down, was burned down instead for the film's spectacular fire sequence. The scenes had to be shot before the dim-out law went into effect. Near-casualty was Joe Strauch, Jr., who plays the part of Smiley Burnette's brother. He was saved from serious injury when Smiley fell on him, pushing him out of the way of some falling, burning timber . . . Joe was grateful, of course, but told Smiley later the tumbling wood couldn't have bruised him much more than the 230 Burnette pounds . . . Virginia Grey got half a course in rope twirling from Gene between scenes. Will have to get the final half via correspondence from Santa Ana, where Sergeant Autry is temporarily stationed . . . "Champ" will be retired at Gene's ranch for the duration. Likewise all those fancy cowboy outfits . . . The team of Autry-Burnette chalked up a total of 53 pictures together . . . Burnette's little girl, Linda Dallas, came home after seeing an Abbott and Costello picture and burst into tears. They had to wait 'til Smiley came home from work to find out why she was crying. Confided to him she had the weeps because she had discovered a fatter comedian in pictures than her daddy!

A YANK AT ETON

M-G-M is probably the only studio in Hollywood which has the neat habit of making two pictures sprout where only one bloomed before. There's no doubt at all that the gentleman who makes all this possible for M-G-M is Mr. Mickey Rooney. Let Spencer Tracy do a stint before the cameras as Thomas Alva Edison, and almost immediately Mickey is doing himself proud as young Tom; a little while ago Robert Taylor was cavorting around local screens as a "Yank at Oxford," and now up pops Mickey as a Yank at Eton. For M-G-M, it's a little like playing poker with two aces in the hole. I suspect that M-G-M makes all costumes with one pair of long trousers and one pair of short pants, just in case.

"A Yank at Eton" has all the staples of a good Rooney show. Mickey plays Timothy Dennis, a brash, tough little Yank whose widowed mother marries an Englishman. Before you can say Berkley Square, he finds himself neatly installed at Eton, a smaller edition of Oxford, chiefly famous for Eton collars and playing fields where, Wellington once remarked, the battle of Waterloo was won. This fails to impress young Timmy, particularly since he's had his heart set on going to Notre Dame on whose playing field, if you remember Knute Rockne, the forward pass was discovered.

As a matter of fact, young Timmy doesn't take at all kindly to Eton ways. He objects to "fagging" which seems to be a minor form of slavery; he pops an "upper former" in the teeth for bullying, which seems to be bad taste. He applies a little Yankee ingenuity to a purchasing problem and is accused of racketeering by the headmaster. To make matters worse, his love life is blighted by a flashing flirt aptly known as Flossie. Flossie plays the field with gala abandon while Timmy grits his teeth and groans. All in all Timmy and England mix just about as well as oil and water.

Things come to a head when Timmy, egged on by Flossie and wanting to show off a bit, takes out Bonnie Warrior, his step-father's prize jumper. The horse breaks away from him, runs riderless across the field, stumbles and falls; the horse has to be shot. And Timmy, convinced that he's made a mess of everything, is prepared to run away to America. He's stopped by his step-father who pleads with him to stay and try again.

Timmy returns to Eton, determined to make good. And in the manner of these things, he does. He stays in the good graces of his teachers, he wins his colors at the English sports, and he slowly begins to like and understand his English friends. There's one more big crisis when Timmy, to shield another lad, accepts the blame for an automobile acci-that "VAN" is here again!

BY SYLVIA KATZ

Van Heflin, starring in "7 Sweethearts," is here to stay!

There they were, sipping their Martinis and telling each other the New York stage was shot to hell, when a lanky kid popped in, duffle bag in hand, to ask his cousin's hospitality. It seems his freighter had just docked in New York. He liked the tall shafts that shot into the New York skyline . . . wanted to see something of the city. If he liked it, perhaps he'd stay.

"And do what?" his cousin wanted to know.

"I don't know . . . be an actor, maybe."

People dropped their Martinis and raised their eyebrows. O.K. . . . so they'd go along with the gag.

"What about starting bright and early tomorrow morning?" they asked, with innocent smiles stretched across their actors' pans. He'd find out it wasn't as simple as all that . . .

"And why not?" Van answered.

"Bright and early tomorrow morning" . . . ship time . . . means six o'clock. Van waited in Producer Channing Pollock's office till noon.

"I don't know why he took the time to see me. It must have been my persistence . . . or naiveté." Anyhow, he gave me a letter of introduction to Richard Boleslawski, whom I tagged in a theater during a rehearsal. I gave him my letter and waited. What magic that letter contained I never knew. But the final result was a part in "Mr. Moneypenny."

All right . . . so that made him an actor. But there are two kinds of actors . . . those who can take it straight and those who can't. Emmett Evan Heflin, at that point, wasn't quite ready to take his acting straight. He was still too much the daring young man. He liked freighters . . . and there was South America to see . . . and the Orient . . . and Alaska. There was that year at Yale Dramatic School he'd promised himself . . . and the preliminary undergraduate work it required. So it wasn't until five years later that Van was back on Broadway.

During his second play, reviewers deluged him with attention. As one of them tenderly put it, "He's an unreasonably bad actor" . . . and little wonder. With that slouchy, loose-jointed stride of his, he looked as though he might do better in a cotton field. But still worse, his Oklahoman accent poured out like rich syrup, though he tried madly to lose it.

In those days, when he wasn't supporting his weight by a stage prop, he was draping himself gracefully over a microphone. All told, here were 2,000 radio performances. As to the amount of coffee consumed in that strenuous time, he tells you, "I used to fortify myself with a swig every time I came to the line that read, "Betty, you didn't . . . you couldn't have . . . not that!"

Where all this was getting him, he couldn't have guessed. But no longer does he need to. Van Heflin has arrived. He is in, with an M-G-M contract that's as good as Social Security.

Fate, or whatever it is that sends us spinning in particular directions, has consistently shunted Van in the direction of Kate Hepburn. His very first movie role was opposite her in an RKO thing that's practically a collector's piece, by now. Then there was a two-year stint as the reporter in the stage version of "The Philadelphia Story," in which Hepburn had the lead. They tagged each other from Hollywood to New York and back again while people began to wonder.

People were wrong. . . . Van was thinking along matrimonial lines . . . only the gal wasn't Katharine Hepburn . . . it was Frances Neal, whom he married in Santa Barbara last May.

Hepburn, however, was one of the few people who were not at all surprised when word filtered through about the sneak preview of "H. M. Pulham, Esq." That preview was prophetic of (Continued on page 79) dent and as a result is threatened with expulsion from Eton. But things are cleared up in the nick of time, and Timmy turns out to be not only the pride of the school, but also the winner of the big steeple-chase race.

Freddie Bartholomew, Edmund Gwenn, Juanita Quigley, Ian Hunter and Peter Lawford share the screen with the irrepressible Mickey. But as in all Rooney films, he carries the story. And as M-G-M has discovered to its endless delight, Mickey Rooney, like an industrious ant, can carry several times his own weight.—M-G-M.

From Shaw came a copy of his play, "Man and Superman," with a note scribbled on the flyleaf: "You may borrow the name but not the genius. That would be a miracle!" . . . FOREST RANGERS

To a city slicker who sees perhaps five or six trees a year, and those usually in decorative boxes around a sidewalk cafe, a forest ranger is a strange and awesome creature. Like a lighthouse keeper, he's supposed to live in lonely splendor on some inaccessible mountain top, keeping a benevolent eye on the birds and bees and occasionally brushing the dust off the leaves to keep the forest tidy. In the estimation of the city slicker, it's an occupation for hermits, misanthropes and butterfly chasers.

It may come as something of a surprise, therefore, for them to discover Forest Ranger Fred MacMurray prancing around in the company of two such undeniable nifties as Susan Hayward and Paulette Goddard. It may come as a further surprise that a forest ranger's job is hectic, dangerous, important. Out where the sidewalks end, you do not break the glass in case of fire; you ring for the forest ranger. He is a combination hook and ladder company, bucket brigade and fireman without red suspenders.

"The Forest Rangers" undertake to let you in on the secrets of the trade. It begins with a forest fire, ends with a forest fire and in between features a series of minor blazes of the kind a couple of beauties can light in a man. Out in the big tree country, District Ranger Don Stuart (Fred MacMurray) is hot on the trail of an arsonist who's been setting fires throughout his area. And hot on Don's trail is Tana Mason (Susan Hayward), an outdoor gal who runs a nearby mill and still manages to look pretty. Don's all wrapped up in arson while Tana dreams idly of a parson.

Tana's plans hit a pretty big snag, one fine day, when Don returns from Hallis, a town nearby, sporting a new bride, Celia Huston (Paulette Goddard), a debutante, socialite easterner. It was one of those wirlwind romances, and it blew all of Tana's hopes into a cocked hat. But Tana doesn't quite give up; she's determined to show up Celia as the dude she undoubtedly is. As a result, Celia finds herself dragged through forest undergrowth in silk stockings and high heels, dunked in a millpond, bewildered by the jargon of the forest rangers and generally about as comfortable as a Dodger fan at the Polo Grounds. But she stays in there fighting anyway; Celia may be cuddly, but she isn't soft.

Meanwhile the mysterious forest fires are still popping up around Don, and one of his prime suspects is found with a bullet hole through his head. It all winds up in one whopper of a forest fire with the two girls trapped in the inferno below and Don hustling to the rescue via airplane. Celia proves her courage, Don gets his arsonist, and Tana returns gracefully to her sawmill.

"The Forest Rangers," filmed with the cooperation of the U. S. Forest Service, is full of eyefilling landscapes and breathtaking panoramas. It's a sturdy account of the work the Forest Rangers do. Besides the stars, you'll find Lynne Overman, Eugene Pallette and Albert Dekker going through their paces. All of it, blazes and kisses, is filmed in furious Technicolor.—Par.

P. S.

Location work was cut short by rain and hail. The film had to be photographed early in the season, so the fire fighting equipment loaned to the studio would be returned in time for the dry months . . . behind asbestos shields retreated only when the paint on their instruments began cracking, a warning that they were too close . . . The plane Regis Toomey flies in the picture was a Ryan B5 that had to be crated in Hollywood and taken to location via truck. The Air Traffic Control had to be notified each time the plane was ready to take off, so the Fourth Interceptor Command could give orders to prevent its being fired upon as "unidentified aircraft." Even then, the moment the plane's motors began warming up, jeeps full of soldiers appeared to investigate . . . The State Redwood Park at Big Basin was transformed into "Bolderoc National Forest" by means of studio-manufactured signs. Extra men had to be hired to assure tourists who came through that they were actually on the right road. The park's main administration building was tagged "Indian River Ranger Station," and a duplicate of it was built at the studio in Hollywood for further scenes . . . Close-ups of the fire scenes were made at the studio, where the flames could be controlled. Fred MacMurray, Paulette Goddard and Susan Hayward were sprinkled with hot ashes from specially constructed containers of blazing excelsior and paper bits, swung over their heads out of camera range. Firemen with hose stood by in case one of them caught fire.

PANAMA HATTIE

"Panama Hattie" was a raucous, good-natured musical when it played the boards in New York not so long ago. While the screen version is not quite so brassy as the original, it's still a romping frolic of love and life around Panama's big ditch. Ann Sothern escaped from the Maisie role long enough to climb into Hattie's fabulous wardrobe, and Red Skelton makes with the gags while keeping an ever-watchful eye on the Canal.

The story is concerned with Hattie Maloney (Ann Sothern) who sings a sweet song and shakes a mean hip in a Panama City night club. Hattie's the love of the Army, the light of the Navy and the girl the Marines chased from the halls of Montezuma to he shores of Tripoli. It's a sad day for the Services when Hattie falls for a soldier boy named Dick Bullitt (Dan Dailey, Jr.). Dick's not a garden variety army sergeant, by any means; he's Philadelphia, Main line and Society with a capital S. To do things up in the proper manner, he brings his seven-year-old daughter, by a former marriage, down to Panama to meet the future Mrs. B.

The kid comes down, complete with an old family retainer (Alan Mowbray), a command of English as spoken in Philadelphia and a marked distaste for dresses overwhelmed with doo-dads and fussy furbelows. This incipient Quiz Kid takes one good look at Hattie and promptly remarks that she hasn't seen anything so funny since she last saw the monkeys at the zoo. That's what a Philadelphia education did for her.

Hattie's first impulse is to drop the kid in the nearest canal (and there just happens to be one handy) and be done with it. But after taking a good look in the mirror, she decides that maybe the kid has something there, after all. So with everyone chipping in to smooth the way, she and the kid declare a truce, and Hattie starts taking lessons in how a lady should look and act. To her vast surprise Hattie discovers, for instance, that jewelry, when worn, should not imitate a battery of searchlights picking out an enemy bomber. This is, of course, a sad shock.

Meanwhile Hattie's Navy friends, Red and his gang, have nothing better to do with their time than hunt out a spy or two. In the usual Skelton manner they uncover the spies by stumbling backwards into them. Red mixes with a haunted house in this one, gets involved with a bevy of ghosts and ducks assorted bullets and knives. He's assisted in his shenanigans by Ben Blue and Rags Ragland. Among the three of them they make a complete circle of the Hollywood zany circuit, and you get slightly dizzy watching.

There are a few other minor plots threading through the story of "Panama Hattie," and Hattie herself has a bit more trouble before she lands her man. At the final curtain, however, the Canal is still in one piece, and Hattie's love life is once more smooth as the water in Gatun Lock. Spotted throughout the picture are tunes from Cole Porter's original score, and a C.P. score is nothing to sneeze at. It's all staked in M-G-M's best Central American style with everybody going one-two-three-bump all over the place.—M-G-M.

Her Fitch Shampoo and hairstyle by Charmode Beauty Salon, Palmer House, Chicago

I Bought His Love

"Not for love or money!" I heard him say. No—Joe would never take a girl with dandruff to the party, and I had the worst case of dandruff in town. Yet, the very next day, he actually begged me to go with him! My white-flecked hair was transformed into a silken glory overnight. Joe saw me as a new and radiantly lovely person, all because I purchased a bottle of Fitch Shampoo at my favorite toilet goods counter.

I discovered that Fitch's Shampoo removes dandruff with the very first application. Its rich lather rinses out completely, leaving my hair shining clean. Actually, it penetrates tiny hair openings, helping to keep my scalp in normal, trouble-free condition. At the beauty shop or at home, I now insist on my weekly Fitch shampoo to keep my hair lovely and free of dandruff, the way Joe likes it. When I bought Fitch Shampoo, I bought his love!

GOODBYE DANDRUFF!

Fitch's is the only shampoo whose money-back guarantee to remove dandruff is backed by one of the world's largest insurance firms. Use Fitch Shampoo regularly each week. It reconditions as it cleanses — economical, too!

P. S.

Annie Sothern received a brand new title while working in "Panama . . ." A football team in the east dubbed her their "Inspiration Girl" . . . Carmen Amaya and her family got along all right in Hollywood knowing only one word in English:—"Terrific" . . . Red Skelton showed up on the set one morning and announced he had had a dream about Hedy Lamarr the night before. "I couldn't catch her—as fast as I ran, she ran faster!" The company waited for the tag-line. "Tonight," finished Red, "I'm putting my scooter bike next to my bed!" . . . Ann Sothern spent time with Ethel Merman, star of the stage version, talking over the role and getting ideas for her characterization . . . Director Norman McLeod spent what spare time he had working on illustrations for a children's book of nursery rhymes . . . Unofficial dialogue coach was little Jackie Horner, who knew everyone's lines including her own. She's a whiz on the piano and has been offered several guest spots with well known symphony orchestras . . . Dan Dailey, Jr., trains and rides his own horses at the local county fairs . . . Rags Ragland says he got his nickname when he was a little boy. His clothes were always patched in the appropriate spots so his school pals used to call him "Raggedy" Ragland. The nickname wore down to its present length . . . For a film involving so much music and so many rowdy funmakers, the set was always rather quiet. Director McLeod abhors noise, and it isn't unusual to find even the "grips" talking in whispers.

SEVEN SWEETHEARTS

Joe Pasternak, who guided Deanna Durbin to such soaring heights, is now trying to do the same with Kathryn Grayson. Mr. Pasternak is the producer of "Seven Sweethearts" which looks, sounds and feels like a Deanna Durbin production, except that it isn't. Now, this is no reflection on Miss Grayson who is a personality and quite a charming one in her own right. It means merely that "Seven Sweethearts" uses the same formula of a joyous and light-hearted film with that streak of whimsical fantasy that seems to tickle any American audiance to death.

"Seven Sweethearts" is a fable that pretends it is real. Henry Taggart (Van Heflin) stumbles on the town of Little Delft, Michigan in the midst of the tulip festival. It's a quaint and happy place, and during the festival it is a miniature of a happier Holland. There, Henry comes to an inn run by eccentric old Dutchman, Van Maaster (S. Z. Sakall) and his seven daughters. Perversely, most of the girls bear boys' names, though in every other way they are quite en-

SEVEN SUGGESTIONS for SUGAR SAVING SWEETS from the SEVEN SWEETHEARTS SET!

By Marjorie Deen

Something pretty special in the line of recipe swapping, we heard, was taking place over on the "Seven Sweethearts" set! So we rushed over to find out what it was all about. It all started, we learned, when Kathryn Grayson turned up one day with a box of her favorite sweets—something half way between a cookie and a candy, retaining the best features of each, but making no inroads whatsoever upon her precious and limited sugar supply. Doubtless Kathryn's example was all that was needed to inspire so predominantly feminine a cast; or perhaps some of her "Sisters" remembered the sound Dutch principle that girls who know their way around the kitchen are the ones most likely to walk down a church aisle to the strains of that familiar Mendelssohn march. At any rate, it was soon seven-up on sugar-saving suggestions with each of the promising starlets vying with one another for recipe honors. And with Van Heflin Carl Esmond and the crew serving as willing jurors.

Are you wondering how one could possibly save sugar in seven different ways? Well, it can be done, as you will soon realize if you stop to think that you can use: Honey, molasses, semi-sweet chocolate, corn syrup, sweetened condensed milk and maple syrup; also, as Kathryn Grayson suggests, packaged specialties that supply their own sweetening, such as flavored puddings and gelatins, cake mixes and marshmallows.

Not all the other girls in the cast were able to find recipes that called for not one bit of sugar, but they did come through with some fine ideas for cutting down materially on sugar demands, and they're "Sweethearts," every one of them!

Kathryn Krisps
(Sweetened with marshmallows)

Turn out 1 package crisp rice breakfast cereal into large pan and heat in hot oven until very crisp, but do not brown. Transfer to a large buttered bowl. Meanwhile melt ½ pound marshmallows with ½ cup butter or margarine over boiling water. Add 1 tablespoon peanut butter; stir until blended. Stir into cereal, with a fork, until thoroughly mixed. Flatten out mixture in buttered pan with slightly moistened hands. Chill. Cut in squares.

Brownies
(Sweetened with honey and semi-sweet chocolate)

1 (7 oz.) package semi-sweet chocolate
⅓ cup shortening
2 eggs
6 tablespoons strained honey
½ cup sifted flour
½ teaspoon salt
1 teaspoon vanilla
1 cup chopped walnut meats

Combine semi-sweet chocolate and shortening in top of double boiler. Melt over hot water, cool. Beat eggs until thick, gradually add honey. Mix flour, baking powder and salt, sift together twice; add to egg mixture and beat until smooth. Stir in chocolate; add vanilla and nut meats. Turn into 8-inch square pan which has been greased and lined with waxed paper. Bake in moderately hot oven (375° F.) 35 minutes. Cool slightly, cut in 2-inch squares, remove to cake rack to cool.

Old-Fashioned Favorites
(Sweetened with molasses)

¾ cup melted shortening
1 cup molasses
1 cup brown sugar
1 cup buttermilk
6 cups cake flour
½ teaspoon salt
2 teaspoons ginger
4 teaspoons baking soda
1 tablespoon lemon extract

Mix melted shortening, molasses and sugar. When smooth, add buttermilk then flour sifted with salt, ginger and soda. Add lemon extract. Mix to smooth, stiff dough; chill until firm. Roll on floured board to ⅓ inch thickness; cut into desired shapes. Bake on greased cookie sheet in moderate oven (350° F.) 8-10 minutes. For crisp cookies roll very thin.

Lemon Oatmeal Cookies
(Sweetened with corn syrup)

2 cups uncooked oatmeal (quick-cooking or regular) ½ cup brown sugar
1 cup seedless raisins
1 tablespoon grated lemon peel
2¼ cups flour
2 teaspoons baking powder
¼ teaspoon baking soda
½ teaspoon salt
2 eggs, well beaten
⅔ cup dark corn syrup
⅓ cup milk
1 teaspoon vanilla
½ cup melted shortening

Mix oatmeal, brown sugar, raisins and lemon peel. Add sifted dry ingredients. Beat eggs thoroughly, add combined corn syrup, milk and vanilla, then the melted shortening. Combine with oatmeal mixture; mix together thoroughly. Drop from teaspoon onto greased cookie sheet. Bake in moderately hot oven (375° F.) approximately 15 minutes or until done and golden brown.

Coconut Fingers
(Sweetened with condensed milk)

Cut day-old white bread into ¾-inch-thick slices. After removing crusts, cut these into strips, ¾ inch wide by 2 inches long. Spread strips on all sides with sweetened condensed milk, covering well. Roll in dry, shredded coconut, broken fine. Brown under broiler at low heat.

And as the final, the "lucky seven" sugar saving suggestions, follow Cecilia Parker's lead. Serve as dessert—instead of cakes, puddings and pies—hot cakes, French pancakes, waffles or fritters which, with their traditional maple syrup accompaniment, will satisfy the most exacting sweet tooth.

I'm a Busy Woman

I have a family to raise and a home to keep ship-shape. I'm learning First Aid and training for Ambulance Duty. And I've got a part-time job that makes our budget a better fit.

It's exciting and completely satisfying . . . but it takes a bit of doing. I've had to learn new ways—and quicker ways—to get through the endless household tasks that use up so much time and energy.

For instance, I've just installed the Fels-Naptha Soap System. I use this wonder soap to clean bric-a-brac, to brighten silver and flatware—and for all sorts of time-killing cleaning chores that keep a conscientious wife 'tied down.'

My precious silk and Nylon stockings last longer under the Fels-Naptha Soap System—and they're easier to do. I wouldn't trust my baby's things with any other soap. As for the family wash—I've just whisked through that and I'm off to another round of traction splints and pressure points.

Yes, I'm a busy woman and thanks to Fels-Naptha Soap—I love it!

dearingly feminine. And very flirtatious.

There is, for instance, Regina (Marsha Hunt) who is the eldest and fancies herself a great actress, indeed. There is Billie (Kathryn Grayson) who looks and sings like an angel. Then in rapid order there are Victor, Albert, Cornelius, Peter and George. Surrounded by such a bevy of beauties, it's no wonder Henry has a bit of trouble with his heart.

The girls, as a unit and singly, are intent upon one thing—marriage; and they are particularly intent upon the marriage of Regina, since she, as the eldest, must marry first before they can make tracks to the altar themselves. So very cunningly they set out to match our slightly bewildered Henry with Regina.

But they hadn't counted on Billie's charms or her voice. Billie sings her way into his heart quite unaware of what she has done. Very promptly and quite properly Henry makes his overtures to the head of the Van Maaster clan for permission to marry his daughter. He's in seventh heaven when the permission is gracefully forthcoming, but to his horror, he discovers that the old man has okayed his marriage to Regina, not Billie.

Well, in a situation like that, there's only one thing to do: duck and run. Henry beats it back to New York. But while he's trying to forget Little Delft, the seven sisters keep him sharply in mind. Regina turns up to announce she wants his help in getting on the stage. Billie turns up to say that she loves him, and no matter what, she wants to marry him. Old Van Maaster turns up, and he's not bringing tulips to market.

Shake well for a reel or so and then separate. The upshot of the whole matter is that Regina gets her chance for glory,

THE WAR AGAINST MRS. HADLEY

'Twould seem that the attack on Pearl Harbor annoys Fay Bainter (Mrs. H.). Her maid has a brother at P. H. and nervously drops teacups. Her daughter works in one of those vulgar canteens, and marries a sergeant. And Richard

Ney, Mrs. H.'s nasty son (the dissipated wretch), gets shipped off to the army, to both his and her regret. (Darned if he doesn't get a citation for heroism.) Then Mrs. H. is real proud, and her daughter has a baby, and she (Mrs. H.) marries her old beau, etc. We forgot to say that the butler upset her terribly by becoming an air-raid warden.—M-G-M.

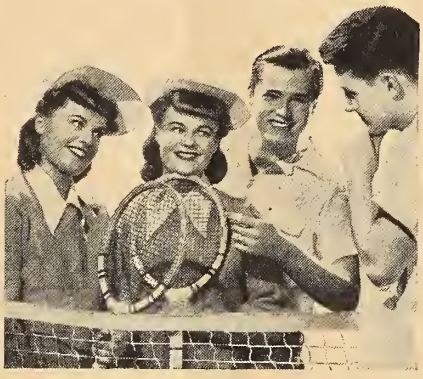
Rick Twins discover Pepsodent Powder can make teeth far brighter to the naked eye, too!



Photoelectric eye proof of Pepsodent's superior polishing ability convinced scientists. But not the Rick Twins. They wanted to see just how good Pepsodent was without scientific gadgets—when it was used in the practical way—the way anyone would brush teeth. So they tossed a coin to see who would use Pepsodent, and Margaret won. Marilyn chose to test another leading tooth powder.

People always had a hard time telling them apart . . . they were that alike. But that was before the test started. Then, admitted Marilyn, "Did I learn about tooth powders! Our dentist was skeptical at first . . . then amazed that Pepsodent made Peg's teeth twice as bright as mine! He said he never saw anything like it. Neither did we! Pepsodent showed us how really bright teeth can be!"

. . . and the Rick Twins' dentist says:

"Of course, I was skeptical. Pepsodent's claims sounded just too good to be true. However, this Rick Twins' test convinced me that the statement of The Pepsodent Company is accurate and truthful."

Independent laboratory tests found no other dentifrice that could match the lustre produced by Pepsodent. By actual test, Pepsodent produces a lustre on teeth Twice as Bright as the average of all other leading brands!

Nope, we gals can't do much with a gun. But we can do a bang-up job of keeping morale on the up-and-up!

Comes October, and every year you whip out the old calendar to mark off Columbus Day. Whee—holiday! Sleep and fun and everything rosy for twenty-four schoolless hours! Until now, however, there's been nary a thought to the guy who's responsible for all this bliss. This year, somehow, you've been thinking about Chris himself. You feel kind of a bond with the old boy, 'cause you too have been discovering America. It's suddenly hit you how mad for the place you really are, and how little you've known about it. Lately, you've been getting acquainted.

You've been looking at maps to see just where Fort Sill, Okla., is, or Fort Dix, N. J. You've been delving into how many hours by bus it is to Camp Edwards, Mass. Kentucky has been, heretofore, a kind of celestial state in your mind's eye—overrun with blue grass, colonels and mint juleps, and located in the heart of the Deep South. Yesterday you discovered it's right near Ohio, and part of it's as far north as Delaware. Boy, have you been learning things and getting a terrific thrill out of it. The lads at the USO dances alone have been a liberal education in geography. The soft-spoken ones with the lines from here to there have told you about the wonderful palm trees in Savannah. About the beautiful white beaches and the out-of-this-world women. The rangy, shy ones have told about hayrides in Vermont's Indian Summer and about skiing in their own backyards from November on. There've been sophisticated ones from Los Angeles who've seen Rita Hayworth and Gary Cooper and think nothing of it. And freckle-faced kids who speak haltingly and lovingly of something called Tomahawk, Wisconsin, where the fields are so green and the corn grows as tall as the Empire State. You've opened your eyes and your heart to all this new America that you've never even thought about before, and you've fallen in love with it sight unseen.

To sort of even things up with the boys who've given you these lovely broad horizons, why not toss 'em a party? If the boys you've actually met are no longer around, even the score by proxy. Call up the defense headquarters nearest you and ask how to get in touch with some of the boys stationed nearby. Even if you're miles from a camp, there are invariably soldiers guarding bridges and tunnels, doing searchlight duty, etc., right in your neighborhood. Invite about six or seven of them at a time, and have them over on a Sunday afternoon.

The thing to remember is this. They're fed to the teeth with organized fun; with red, white and blue crepe paper decorations, with canteen coffee. They've been to a hundred movies on the house, had a pass (Continued on page 89)

SILKIER, SMOOTHER HAIR...EASIER TO MANAGE!

Darling of the Campus! New, well-groomed version of the college casual hair-do with only a slight wave breaking its gleaming smoothness. That smart scarf tucked inside her sweater says "Bundles for America".

This film illustrates how all soaps and soap shampoos dull lustre of hair!

All soaps—and liquid soap shampoos—always combine with the minerals in water, to form a sticky scum. (Bath-tub ring.) This scum leaves a film on hair that dulls the natural lustre—and clings stubbornly, no matter how thoroughly you rinse with clear water.

But Drene is different! It is made by an exclusive, patented process. Its action in water is different. Drene does not combine with minerals to form a scum—so it never leaves any dulling film on hair. Instead, Drene reveals up to 33% more lustre than even the finest soaps or soap shampoos!

Thrilling results with wonderful improved Special Drene Shampoo containing hair conditioner! Leaves hair lovelier . . . far easier to arrange!

No matter how you wear your hair, if you want it to look its loveliest, you really ought to use the new, improved Special Drene Shampoo! For Special Drene now has a wonderful hair conditioner in it to leave hair silkier and smoother and far easier to arrange neatly—right after shampooing! If you haven't used Drene lately, you'll be amazed at the thrilling difference that added hair conditioner now makes.

Unsurpassed for removing dandruff!

Are you bothered about removal of ugly, scaly dandruff? You won't be when you shampoo with Special Drene. For Drene removes that flaky dandruff the very first time you use it—and besides does something no soap shampoo can do, not even those claiming to be special "dandruff removers". Drene reveals up to 33% more lustre than even the finest soaps or soap shampoos!

So for extra beauty benefits, plus quick and thorough removal of flaky dandruff, use Special Drene. Or ask for a professional Drene shampoo at your beauty shop!

"I WANT TO TELL YOU ABOUT ONE OF THE MOST ENTERTAINING AND EXCITING MOTION PICTURES I HAVE EVER SEEN"

— Walter Winchell

"20th Century-Fox has really reached into the heavens for this one. They scooped up all the stars and put them on the same screen . . . Yes, the greatest collection of stars ever assembled in the same motion picture: CHARLES BOYER, RITA HAYWORTH, GINGER ROGERS, HENRY FONDA, CHARLES LAUGHTON, EDWARD G. ROBINSON, PAUL ROBESON, ETHEL WATERS, 'ROCHESTER', THOMAS MITCHELL, EUGENE PALLETTE, CESAR ROMERO, GAIL PATRICK, ROLAND YOUNG, ELSA LANCHESTER, GEORGE SANDERS, JAMES GLEASON, J. CARROL NAISH, THE HALL JOHNSON CHOIR and a score of other film favorites.

"To match the brilliance of these stars, the finest writers in Hollywood fashioned the story. It takes you from a tenement to a penthouse . . . from Park Avenue to Hell's Kitchen . . . a story blending drama, comedy, music, romance and stirring action into a big-time show.

"Orchids to these great stars for their brilliant performances and orchids to 20th Century-Fox for bringing to the screen . . .

Glenn Ford grins, "The only people who thought I was comely were my folks when I was a baby." Right now he's sitting pretty enough in a spacious 8-room nest with a study jam-packed with stamps, playbills, coins, pipes and sweet-swing platters (preferably by T. Dorsey). Yips for joy when Mom serves steaks and cheesecake, and settles for ice cream by Schrafft. Runs up sky-high bills long-distance phoning. lives in casual togs and dates Eleanor Powell 5 p.m.'s a week. Thinks nighteries are too smoky for comfort, spends evenings lounging around the house reading, poring over scripts or romping with best chum, Irish setter Skippy. Is currently hitting headlines in Col.'s "The Desperadoes."

the story GABLE wouldn't tell!

GABLE, THE SWASHBUCKLER, DIED WITH CAROLE. THE REST OF HIM GOES OUT TO DO BATTLE AGAINST NEEDLESS HEARTBREAK IN A WORLD TO COME!

On August 11th two men presented themselves to recruiting officers in the Federal Building in Los Angeles, and said they'd like to enlist as buck privates. They were Andrew McIntyre, cameraman, and his friend Clark Gable, movie star. Within a space of thirty-six hours they had taken their physicals, the oath of allegiance and a train headed for the Air Forces Officer Candidate School at Miami, Florida.

Knowing its women, the army kept secret the whereabouts of Gable's induction. But Clark can't hide himself under a butterfly's wing. A girl spotted him entering the Federal Building and spread the evangel. Thereafter it took a bunch of determined m.p.'s to hold down the mob that collected outside the recruiting offices where Colonel Malcolm Andruss was administering the oath.

Gable, blue-suited, emerged mopping his forehead. By now reporters were on the scene. Pressed to say something, he asked: "What is there to say?" But someone had unearthed a human interest item. Giving them their traveling orders. Colonel Andruss had put Private McIntyre into Private Gable's charge.

For the first time in seven months, Clark's face broke into a grin that showed no sign of tension. "Fine thing. Here I'm in the service half an hour and bossing a two- (Continued on following page)

Clark took a fancy to these two Chinese kids in "Somewhere I'll Find You." Left for army at pic's end, saying he might come back to Hollywood after the war.

Sometime ago, Spence Tracy, Bob Taylor and Clark made a Three Musketeers Pledge to stick together, promising that if one joined, the others would go along in some service! Above, with Bette Davis.

Clark was jittery and shaky-handed when he was sworn in army by Col. Andruss. In Miami he lives in hotel barracks, gets up at 5:15 and works till dusk. Took salary slice from $3500 weekly at M-G-M to $66 a month in U.S.A.F.

After his 8-yeor-old mustoche wos shorn, his hoir wos cut in ormy soup-bowl style. He wos told trousers of his much-too-big uniform would shrink—ond so would he (weighed in ot 195 lbs.)!

man army already. Pretty rapid work if you ask me!"

Five days later, having been accepted for enrollment in the AFOCS, known as the streamlined West Point because of its rigorous schedule, he became Corporal Gable, since there are no privates in that man's army. They gave him his outfit, including size 11 shoes, instructions in how to make his bed and orders to remove his mustache. Till he's a first lieutenant, he won't be allowed to grow it again.

By the time this appears, he will have completed half of his twelve weeks' training course. Then it will be "whatever the army orders." He voiced his own preference plainly. "I want to be a machine gunner on an airplane and be sent where the going's tough."

It's not because Carole died that Clark went to war. Forty-one though he is, he might have gone anyway. He and Carole were always staunch supporters of President Roosevelt and his policies. They were at Johns Hopkins last year, consulting physicians about an injury to Clark's shoulder, when the President invited them to a broadcast of one of his addresses to the nation. Later they had a long talk with him, which left them deeply stirred.

When war broke out, they both wrote him, offering their services in any capacity he might name. He assured them that their most useful contribution at the moment was movie-making, that if they were needed elsewhere they would be called. The first call came for Carole. Would she go back to Indianapolis, her home town, for a war bond rally? She did her job, sold millions of dollars worth of bonds before boarding the plane that would get her back to her husband faster than a plodding train. And so his heart and life were sliced in two, and he goes to war with a difference. Nothing pulls him back, everything pulls him in.

Dorothy Canfield Fisher once wrote a story about a girl whose parents' love and dependence on each other grew with every passing year. Then her mother died. In the shadow of her father's desolation, she cried out: "People shouldn't be happily married. It's too terrible when one of them goes."

Of course she was wrong, though in first anguish many might be inclined to agree with her. Cut those three years with Carole out of Clark's life, take his memories from him, and you'd leave him an infinitely poorer man.

They'd been everything to each other, their devotion more complete than even their closest friends could have foreseen, than they themselves could have foreseen perhaps. They'd both been around. It wasn't first love for either, but that rarer thing—a perfect blend of love and companionship, undoubtedly treasured the more because they hadn't found it earlier. Carole went into marriage with the single thought of making Clark happy. His way of life—animals, farming, hunting—hadn't been hers. She made it hers, knowing he'd be miserable any other way, not caring what way she went so long as it was with him. So they lived on a twenty-two acre ranch, and she hobnobbed with beef and poultry on the hoof and carried pitchers of milk like any farmwife to her lord and master sweating atop his tractor.

First lessan was bed-making. His preference far aerial gunnery stepped up enlistment in that branch instantly. He's practically a champ at trap-shaating!

Before their marriage Clark had had plenty of friends. Carole had always been the hub of a crowd. Now they were sufficient unto themselves. Not that they turned into solitaries; both were too warm and genial for that. But as one friend put it: "They found something in each other that took care of everything." They'd spend weeks on the farm, content to see nobody. You couldn't even get them on the phone.

Clark never wrote letters. The only exception was the letter he wrote once a year on their anniversary to the girl who was living right there in the house with him. Carole wouldn't work when he was off. He might take it into his head any old time to say, "Let's go huntin', Ma." She wanted to be free to sling their stuff into the station wagon and go. First, second and third she was his wife. Being a movie star could take its chances.

Then came the Friday when (Continued on page 93)

When army offered him private compartment an train ta Fla., he refused because he didn't want special privileges. Later taak 'em up an offer, to escape fans. Abave, with Lana Turner in "Samewhere I'll Find You."

While Mrs. George Brent was working in "Wings for the Eagle" last spring, her husband paid her a visit one morning. Ann was busy studying her script, so she merely looked up, winked, made a face denoting temporary amnesia at the script and went on memorizing lines.

George sat down on the lounge and tried to relax, but Ann noticed that he kept rubbing his chin with his left thumb—a habit he has when words are gathering on his tongue.

"Y'know," he said abruptly, "I think it would be a good idea if I joined the army."

Ann, glancing at him quickly, decided that this was an opening sentence in some elaborate rib. "Oh, sure, sure," she agreed.

"No fooling, Red. I'm serious." About his mouth was the half-smiling, half-sheepish expression that he assumes when he is going to do something that he thinks may not rate First in the Hit Parade of Ann's opinions.

George reached over to take his wife's hand. "I'm trying to tell you, honey, that I (Continued on page 90)

STORY The five-minute buzzer sounded. Backstage at the Broadway Theater the chorus girls moved swiftly into places, the orchestra music filtered through the drawn curtains, the backstage crew hurriedly shifted a prop into place, the stage was filled with the swift patter of hurrying feet. Vicky Lane (Betty Grable), the blonde half of Christy and Lane, stared nervously down the alley leading to the stage door.

Dan Christy (John Payne) was late again.

He came just as their music cue blared out from the orchestra pit, dodged a few props, grinned at the stage manager (Chick Chandler) and took his place beside Vicky just as the curtains parted. He squeezed her hand just once before they started their number.

But Vicky didn't hear the roll of applause that greeted their appearance. Vicky was smelling. There was something in the air tonight and it wasn't music. It was perfume, and unless Vicky's nose was way off, it was coming right off the lapel of Dan's handsome jacket.

Perfume!

Going through the number, she looked sharply at Dan. He smiled at her, that innocent grin of his that always covered something. No mistake about it now. She knew Dan too well. Well, which one was it this time, she thought grimly, that fake Movie Queen who turned up in Boston, the little number who modeled Samson's Sumptuous Scanties, the deb with the Vassar accent . . .

The number ended with a gay trill on the trumpets. Again the applause rolled through the house, applause for Christy and Lane, the Sweethearts of Broadway. In the wings the feminine half of the Sweethearts of Broadway was saying: "Which?"

"Which what?" Dan said innocently.

"Which girl?"

"Vicky!" Dan said. "You don't think——"

"Don't I though!"

"Don't you trust me?"

"No."

"I was getting our engagement ring, honey. That's why I was late."

"Where is it?"

"Where's what? The ring?" Dan lifted a handkerchief out of his breastpocket and wiped his forehead. "It's being inscribed. Right this minute."

Vicky's hand was swift as a snake thrust. It picked the handkerchief from between Dan's fingers. It spread the soft white linen open. Neatly embroidered in one corner was a delicately feminine initial. Just under the initial was a smear of red, (Continued on page 87)

"Nothing-But-The-Truth" Milland, they call him. He'd give you a quart of blood, but fall asleep while you thanked him!

His single superstition—if he bumps one elbow, must bump the other. Favorite books are "Alice in Wonderland," "Treasure Island." Above with Pat Morison in "Are Husbands Necessary?"

One night, several years ago, Ray Milland and his young bride sat at the Cocoanut Grove and watched Hollywood's social circus prance and preen on the dance floor. Ray was immaculate in white tie and tails, and his wife had a new evening gown. They surveyed the glamour boys and girls of the Joan Crawford-Marlene Dietrich-Norma Shearer era with amused smiles. "Good Heavens!" sighed Ray. "Wouldn't it be awful to be a part of all this?"

At that moment Ray Milland was practically unknown. He was living on pennies. For weeks he had saved to take in the Grove in proper style. But he wasn't impressed.

Since that night things have changed considerably for Ray Milland—about everything, in fact, except Ray himself. He's a star himself now, one of the hottest in Hollywood. But he's still no part of the fuss and fine feathers. He still regards Hollywood's glitter with a detached, disinterested, even disdainful air. He can't be bothered with glamour.

This has brewed the legend in some Hollywood circles that Ray is snooty, a snob, selfish, rude and even dull as dishwater. But the truth is: he's a rather special sort of guy. He rejects the Hollywood fantasy; but his own private world is every bit as fabulous. Underneath Ray's bored exterior chafes a restless, impulsive romancer, perpetually chasing adventure and as impatient about it as a terrier on a leash.

No town as small as Hollywood could ever hold a fellow like that. No profession as cut and dried as making pictures could ever satisfy him—if Ray didn't gild everything that goes on in his private life with a make-believe glint of romance.

Maybe you wouldn't call a house an adventure. But even the Milland menage is a case in point. Ray and Mal, his wife, dwell in a dream house in Beverly Hills—a model of architectural beauty without, and inside an interior decorator's vision. Seeds for the flower garden, bluebells, hollyhocks and such were imported from England. Ray got a shipment of valuable English antiques on the last boat to make the passage with such luxurious cargo. (Continued on page 80)

Greer Garson's a red-heod who's sick of playing motrons. Has hod 7 bobies in about os mony films, ond would swap sweet Mrs. Miniver for o chance to show her legs!

Whee! A porty! And Miss Gorson hostessing it, in honor of Ben Webster ond Dome Moy Whitty, obove. It wos their Golden Wedding Anniversory! Thot's Reggie Gordiner ot the left, who's just announced his engagement to Nadio Petrovo.

THE SECRET LIFE OF MRS. MINIVER

She has Irish wit, a sherry taste—and legs, but H'wood hides Greer's light under a bustle!

Greer Garson didn't want to play Mrs. Miniver. Which has so humbled her esteem of her own judgment that she'll probably never voice another opinion. Till this humility passes. Miss Garson has the tongue of the Irish. You think you've got it pinned down, and lo! it mocks you from the other side of the fence.

The fact remains that she didn't want to play Mrs. Miniver. Having read the book, she thought the lady delightful. And real. She has aunts like Mrs. Miniver. Twenty years hence she might be Mrs. Miniver herself. Right now she's too young and gay. Anyway, we take it back. Twenty years hence she'll still be Greer Garson, whatever name she may have added in the interval. She's got the Miniver brand of grace and breeding, but her own lilt. Miniver's a still pool. Garson's a stream, with the sun dancing on it.

In the course of events she received a script, and there discovered that one of Mrs. M.'s vague, small children had grown into manhood and was coming down from Oxford to acquire a wife. This took her aback. Sidney Franklin, the producer, came over to give her a sales talk.

"No, I've just played a matron. I don't think I should play another at once."

"But this thing was bought for you, written for you."

She shook her head. "It was bought and written for Mrs. Chips. I'm not Mrs. Chips."

She did suggest a possible way out. If they'd let her use character make-up—interesting horn-rims, say—she liked horn-rims. No, they wanted her to play it straight. "Like this?" (Continued on page 76)

Her 1st Hollywood visit was awful. The one paper to bother with her at all, noted, "Greer Garson, an English actor, arrives today." Above, with Mom at home.

Insiders say she'll wed Richard Ney (her son in "Mrs. Miniver"), but Greer won't tell. Confides she's off cigars for life! They made her light one in a wifely way for Mr. Miniver, and on the 3rd take, she turned so green, they got scared!

Now that hubby Louis Hayward's a first lieutenant in active service at Quantico, Va., Ida Lupino solos it at Hollywood parties. Above, at Mocambo next to a handsome lieutenant.

Lana and Steve Crane strictly twosoming it at Mocambo. Her shortwave broadcast to Australia was briefest on record—at soldier's request, she sighed once and went off the air!

Blonded Ginger Rogers is staying that way—at request of soldiers from nearby comp to whom she's turned over her tennis court and pool. Above, with Randy Scott on double date with Astoires.

Despite a raging feud over Bun Gronville, Jockie Cooper tossed o sleek party for his marine-bound rival, Jackie Briggs. Now he ond Bun hove been blissfully dueting. (Above, at Charlie Foy's.)

hollywood hands

Hedy Lamarr's lovely hands are a sight to behold. They and Hedy do some superb acting in "White Cargo."

WATCH Gene Tierney turn a doorknob. Study Ann Sheridan holding a cigarette or Marlene Dietrich spooning her consomme . . . and keep your eye on Lana Turner as her lively gestures punctuate the dialogue. Nice hand work, you'll admit, and probably heave a sigh for your own slightly battered mitts!

Hollywood hands are just as busy as yours. When they're not active at the studio, they're sewing, knitting, rolling emergency bandages or digging Victory gardens. Film fingers are found in every defense pie, but it's part of an actress' job to be fit to the fingertips, and her hands are always well groomed, smooth-skinned and shiny tipped.

Regular care does the trick in Hollywood or Hoboken. A thorough, bang-up manicure is a weekly must. In addition, cuticle should be creamed or oiled every night, especially in chilly weather. A rich lotion or cream must be smoothed on your paws at bedtime, massaged with the motions you use to pull on tight gloves, working from fingers to wrist. At the same time, rub a bit of the cream or lotion on your elbows, to help keep those neglected patches soft and sleek.

If your polish chips in cold weather, that may be because your nails are peeling off in layers . . . a pesky condition often caused by dry air, steam heat, careless diet and lack of sunshine. Make up for the hardships of fall and winter with oil finger-baths and extra cuticle creaming. Eat plenty of calcium producing foods—cauliflower, cabbage, lettuce, brussel sprouts and milk. And don't go around with fringed nail polish on your fingertips. When it chips, remove it completely or artfully patch it. If you dent a nail tip, stick Scotch tape or tissue paper over it and cover with polish. If a nail breaks badly, keep the secret to yourself because friends aren't interested in hearing you moan. Buy a replacement at the local variety store and fixed up your nail good as new.

Do your hands tell that the temperature is dropping, by a mottled red effect? Select gloves large enough (tight ones are poor vanity; they cut off circulation and make hands colder). Apply hand lotion after every washing, before every stepping-out. Stand a giant bottle over your kitchen sink, another in the bathroom cabinet. Carry a miniature size in your purse . . . and keep one at office or factory if you're a working gal. Quantity produces quality here. The more hand lotion you use, the prettier and whiter your hands will be. Don't let yourself forget it.

While you're saving tin, rubber, newspapers and so forth, give some thought to conserving (Continued on page 96)

Eyes like the Stars

By CAROL CARTER

Hedy Lamarr, M-G-M

Joan Fontaine, Warners'

Rosalind Russell, Columbia

Paulette Goddard, Paramount

THE next time you sit in a darkened movie palace, watch the leading lady's eyes. See how she uses them to flirt, tease and smile—show sympathy, sorrow, excitement or woe. Then look at the eye-views above of Hedy, Rosalind, Brenda and the rest. Their shining orbs are no different from yours, except that they've learned to give them a sparkle of glamour. A little time—a few simple rules—and you'll know how, too!

How Do You Wear Your Brows?

The brow-beating days are over, praise Allah, and no girl has to yank her eyebrows into queer looking arches or dagger-straight lines. Brenda Marshall does no tweezing at all, but most gals look better if they dispense with the stray hairs that grow over the nose and under the arches. To make the plucking easier, soften the skin first one of two ways. Either massage it with a little cream or hold a washcloth wrung out of hot water over the area a minute or two. With your tweezers, clutch the hairs close to the roots and pull in the direction in which they grow. Daylight is best for the operation, and a magnifying mirror helps a lot. When possible, do the tweezing the day before you go all-out for eye lure, because the pulling may redden or puff the skin.

If you don't have enough eyebrows to make a clear outline, sketch some in with a brow pencil. Draw each hair individually, not just one harsh line. Uplift the ends with a slight twirk, for a bright, bewitching effect. Use the shade of brow pencil that most nearly matches your hair.

The lassies who have enough brows and need only color, can use either mascara or dye. If you choose the mascara method, have the brush dripping wet before you color it—and stroke lightly, delicately, please. If you prefer to use dye, go to a good beauty parlor. 'Tain't safe for little girls to play with!

Sparkle Hints

Outside of falling in love, the easiest way to have sparkling eyes is to get eight hours sleep each night and eat vitamin foods like eggs, butter, cream, leafy vegetables and (the better to see with in blackouts) carrots.

Be kind to your eyes if you want them to shine and twinkle. Give them good working lights and restful interludes between hard jobs. Stare into space occasionally, or place a palm over each eye and look into absolute darkness. Exercise the muscles by blinking rapidly, like an owl. Above all, wear glasses if you need them. Specs of modern design can actually improve facial contour. Harlequin frames are cute and whimsical—a too-square face can be made more interesting with glasses wider at top than at bottom—and a round face appears less pie-shaped with glasses that have a straight, high bridge line and elongated lenses.

Stars use eye make-up as regularly as lipstick. Apply it artfully . . . to have eyes that sparkle and shine.

Sparkle also comes in eye lotion bottles. A refreshing rinse with an eye cup, or a couple of drops in each eye with a dropper, will brighten tired twinklers quick as a wink. When you're really all in and your eyes show it, lie down for a five-minute rest cure with eye pads on your lids. Cotton dipped in iced eye bath, witch hazel or cologne makes a reviving eye sparkler, and warm tea leaves wrapped in a pad are very soothing and quite restful.

For Larger Looking, Limpider Orbs

The size of your eyes can be exaggerated by long, heavy lashes. Those tiny eye curtains (there are usually 100 to 115 on each upper lid) grow lighter at the tips and thinner on the sides, so they need mascara to show them up to best advantage. Painting it on is as simple as a nursery rhyme. Take your choice between cream or cake form, and see that your brush is clean and unclogged. Since warm water is a better solvent than cold, moisten the brush from the tap marked "Hot." Use brown mascara if your hair is light, black if it's dark. Movie stars say unanimously that two coats are better than one, so do your hair or your lipsticking while the first layer dries, and then put on a second.

If your lashes are too few and far between, paste on some false ones. They can look very natural if carefully done and can be trimmed to the same length as your real ones. A coat of mascara to finish, and no one need know that your smoky fringe of lashes actually came from the cosmetic counter!

An eyelash curler "opens" the eyes by turning the top lashes skyward and curving the lower demurely under. The "wide-eyed" look adds interest to your expression. It's a quick pick-up for a tired and harried face.

Another way to make eyes look larger is to rim them with a thin line of eyebrow crayon all around the lids.

Deanna Durbin, Universal star, will next be seen in "Forever Yours."

Put an extra dot at the outer corners if your eyes are set closely together, or at the inner corners if they're too far apart. Then blur the crayoning until it's hardly discernible except as a dark, mysterious background.

Add a Dash of Color

Eyeshadow intensifies the color of the iris and makes the whites look whiter. If your eyes are blue, they'll look more heavenly with blue eye shadow smoothed on after mascara-ing. If they are gray, decide whether you want to add blue or green highlights, and choose your shadow accordingly. Brown shadow is for brown eyes, and hazel eyes can wear either brown or violet.

GENE'S IN THE AIR CORPS NOW—WHERE THE HORSES FLY, AND WHAT GETS ROPED ARE "LITTLE YELLER FELLERS"!

The telephone jingled at Melody Ranch. "Santa Ana calling Mrs. Gene Autry," said the operator. "One minute, please."

"Hello," said Ina Autry. "Is that you, Gene? How's the army?"

"Why," came a familiar Okie drawl, "This G I rig's right comfortable, and the grub's great. I guess," concluded Sergeant Gene Autry, "that the army is mucho okay! But Ina—look," said Gene, "can you send me down some pajamas?"

"I put some in your bag—some silk ones."

"I know, but—well—I'm right anxious to keep 'em buried there in the bag. Send me down some cotton ones, will you? The boys might—"

"I see," sighed Ina Autry. "But what did you sleep in last night?"

Something like a blush came over the wire. "I slept," confessed Gene, "in my shorts."

One day, a few weeks ago, a good-looking, open-faced guy wearing a powder-blue cowboy suit, a grey shirt with fancy piping, a wide, white sombrero, his best butterfly boots and a flashing smile rolled up in a big Cadillac to the Santa Ana Air Base, sixty miles south of Hollywood.

At the gates, the famous smile wavered for a second. "Say," the cowboy whispered to the pal who had driven him down. "Get rid of this fancy wagon, will you? I want to walk in like a soldier ought."

Gene started down the long barracks street, clomping along in his high-heeled Texas boots. Some doughboys passed and cracked friendly grins. "Hi, cowboy!" they greeted. Another group approached. "Hiyah Gene," sang out a Texas twang. A fair sized company of sun baked, friendly soldiers surrounded Gene by the time he'd progressed to headquarters. They were chattering away in Sooner drawls and Panhandle patter, talking horses and guns and cattle and ponies. The commanding (Continued on page 105)

Although "Junior Miss" is going off the oir (sponsors con't get materiols for their soop), two other rodio shows are ongling for Shirley. Above, Brown-Derbying with Pop and brother Jack's pretty wife.

Nope, 'tisn't the boudoir of Helen of Troy, but just port of Miss Temple's suite. As though thot weren't enough, lucky Shirley's been promised o complete Adrion-designed wordrobe purty soon.

Shirley's passion for dolls has given woy to o more moture sort of collecting. She hos hundreds of rore miniotures sent her by fons from oll over the world.

I think it was H. G. Wells who said once, "She totally disarms you. She lifts you off your feet." He was talking about a girl he'd met in Hollywood—Miss Shirley Temple. That was a few years ago.

It seems only yesterday that I dropped in at a party of Shirley's. She wore a pink dress, I remember, and she was a dish, as sweet a dish as the heap of strawberry ice cream before her. I disgraced myself promptly at a game called "Coffee Pot." I was too dumb to play. Shirley told me so. When I missed a coffee-pot, or whatever it was you missed, she said, sympathetically but quite distinctly, "My, but you're dumb!" I was, too. Because right after that, Shirley sensed easy game.

"How do you pronounce 't-o-o'?" she asked innocently.

"Too."

"And how do you pronounce 't-w-o'?" I pronounced it.

"Now," pressed Shirley, "how do you pronounce the name of the man who wrote 'Tom Sawyer'?" I obliged. "Say them all together," commanded Shirley.

"Too-two-Twain."

"When you get a little older," remarked Miss Temple, dipping demurely into her ice cream, "you'll probably say 'locomotive'."

I don't know why I bring all this up, exactly, except that—well—I am a little older and so is Shirley. I think she was six or seven then. Now she is fourteen, a sophomore at Westlake School for Girls, and, from what I'd heard, quite a grown-up young lady. I hadn't seen her myself for some time, and I thought I'd drop over for a heavy date to find out a few things. Frankly, I was frightened. Not about (Continued on page 70)

Ten Day Dream

Dream-walking up the Avenue, hand-holding at the Stork—the Bill Holdens crammed heaven into their 10 magic days together!

She snailed the grey Cadillac along Hollywood Boulevard. No hurry. He wouldn't be there when she got home. No big blond monster leaping at her behind the closet door. No long tweed legs to fall over every time she moved. No beautiful asphyxiating pipe smoke. (Oh, my darling, what am I going to do without you? Darling, what do people do?) Out of the corner of her eye, she saw two soldiers tearing along the street. She pulled over to the curb. "Want a lift, boys? I'm not going any place special."

"Oh gosh, thanks. We're practically A.W.O.L." She drove them down to the station, and it turned out that they were from Brooklyn and stationed at Ft. MacArthur. They liked the army fine—but "you get so damn lonesome." The blond one lit a cigarette for her. "Gee, you're Brenda Marshall," he said and was suddenly shy.

"Yes." And in the flickering light she could see how very young and good-looking he was.

"Bet half of female Dodgertown is pining for you," she grinned.

"Nope. Just one. My wife." And somehow, the way he said it with a funny catch in his voice made her heart all tight and queer.

"Oh," she said softly. "I'd like to swap places with her. You see, my guy's just left for Ft. Monmouth."

Driving home, she felt strangely comforted. A girl in Brooklyn was lonely for a kid at MacArthur. Someone else felt this way, (Continued on page 102)

GUTBUCKET GABRIEL

Washed up at 6! But Harry James jus' blew and blew till the world fell into his lap.

Gassips say Harry "Don't Wanta Walk Withaut" Helen Farrest, wha put that ditty over. Below, in "Private Buckaraa."

By KATE HOLLIDAY

THE first billing Harry James ever rated was as "The Youngest Contortionist In The Business." That was at the age of six.

Now, some twenty years and 9,693,015 trumpet notes later, he's famous as the guy who made "I Don't Want To Walk Without You" a national anthem, a 1942 epidemic. He's the gent for whose music a fabulous stream of nickels packs juke boxes every week. He's the character whose personal appearances cause police departments to dream up new ways of keeping order. He's the boy Twentieth Century-Fox just paid $50,000 for a stint in "Springtime In The Rockies," Universal anteed $32,000 for "Private Buckaroo," and RKO summoned for "Syncopation" after he had been voted top trumpetman in a Saturday Evening Post poll.

In other words, chums, James is a sensation of no mean order. But I don't have to tell you that. His band's rise in three years seems unbelievable and has been looked upon as the type of feat that went out with Horatio Alger. And his tender, torrid or triumphant trumpet has caused shivers to run down the spines of nine-tenths of America. (The other tenth doesn't count. They're ickies, anyway.) (Continued on page 97)

Hollywood Diary—November

Sat., Aug. 1st: Let no one say Oleg Cassini hasn't the proper background for the perilous Coast Guard! Anybody with the courage to build a house on the precipice he selected, and the steel nerves to climb its terrifying heights, is more than ready to face the threats of the Pacific.

But, li'l black book, it's a beautiful home the Cassinis have on their mountain top! Just back from there with Rosemary Layng who interviewed Gene, her mother and her kid sister, Pat. Mrs. Tierney and Pat aren't living with Gene because the house is too small, and Seaman Cassini comes home week-ends. Brings his soiled laundry, too. And Gene, dutiful wife, has it spruced up and ready when he needs a fresh change.

Gene's proud as the rest of us of her man in the service. She still teases Oley, but gently, about his first day at sea. He'd put in long, exhausting hours on shore, and that night in the boat began to get drowsy. As he was about to slip into slumber a sailor nudged him. "In this navy they shoot you for falling asleep on duty," he whispered. Oleg jerked back to consciousness—and spent the rest of the night slapping his face to keep himself awake!

Pat Tierney's a good-looking girl. Still too young to be as curvaceous as Gene, but shows great promise! Gene is official sponsor of Pat's movie career. Not afraid of the competition, either. I liked the way she kept reminding Pat how to sit gracefully, how to walk and how to use her hands. Actressing is a fine art, and if Pat wants a career she'll have to work hard at it the way Gene did!

Tues., Aug. 4th: Darned decent of Clark Gable to give up one of his last evenings as a civilian to entertain the boys already in the service. Tonight I watched him m.c. "Command Performance, USA," the star-packed show that's short-waved to United Nations fighting men the world over. Poor Clark! He was scared stiff! First time he'd faced the terrifying "mike" in two years. He had a tough time holding his script steady, and once or twice lost control of his voice.

Backstage later to congratulate him on his Air Corps enlistment, and say good-by for the duration.

Mon., Aug. 10th: Set-called at Fox and found Ida Lupino and Monty Woolley making with the chit-chat between takes of "Life Begins At 8:30." Ida looks frailer than ever. The gal's pining away for Hubby Louis

MARTHA AND FIANCÉ on campus of Clemson College, S. C., last spring before Niles became an Aviation Cadet, and she went into training for her mobile laboratory work. She's just as sweet and feminine looking now in her crisp lab uniform, so flattering to her soft-smooth Pond's complexion.

GUARDING HEALTH OF BOYS AT ARMY CAMPS while her fiancé flies for Uncle Sam . . . Martha is at Fort McPherson now in the Field Laboratory of the Fourth Service Command.

MARTHA'S RING is unusually beautiful—a 2-carat diamond in a simple platinum band.

She's ENGAGED!

MARTHA GAFFNEY'S engagement to Henry Niles Nelson, Jr., unites two fine Southern families. She is great, great, great grand-daughter of the eminent statesman, John C. Calhoun.

MARTHA'S HEART is with her aviator fiancé—but her skilled hands and highly trained mind are given to her important war job with the Fourth Service Command's mobile laboratory.

"We work like mad," she told us. "We do blood and disease tests regularly, of course—and test just about everything in sight as well—water, milk, ice cream—anything that might contain harmful bacteria and cause illness among the boys at the camps."

Martha has a particularly lovely complexion—creamy smooth and white. She says: "My lab work makes me a stickler for cleanliness. That's why I'm so fond of Pond's Cold Cream. It cleanses so thoroughly—and leaves my skin feeling soft and dewy."

• • •

Use Pond's Martha's way, you'll love it, too. First—pat Pond's Cold Cream on your face and throat—gently, quickly. Tissue it off well. See how it softens and releases dirt and old make-up. "Rinse" now with a second lovely Pond's creaming. Tissue off.

Do this every night—for daytime clean-ups, too. You'll see why war-busy society women like Mrs. W. Forbes Morgan and Mrs. Ernest du Pont, Jr., use Pond's—why more women and girls use it than any other face cream. Ask for the larger sizes—you get even more for your money. Popular in price, at beauty counters everywhere.

Yes—it's no accident so many lovely engaged girls use Pond's!

She's Lovely! She uses Pond's!

Due to strict wortime dimout regulotions in Los Angeles areo, "Toles of Manhattan" premiered at Graumon's Chinese Theoter without benefit of sirens or sky-sweeping searchlights. En route from car to lobby with A. C. Lyles, Jone Withers wos besieged by autograph hounds.

Hayward who's stationed at the Quantico Marine Base. Phones him several times weekly, but their conversations are small comfort. Seems Louis is always too busy rattling on about his work to give out the sweet talk she craves! Before he left, Louis turned back his membership card to the Screen Actors' Guild and swore he was through with greasepaint. After the war he'll come back to Hollywood, but as a director or cameraman. Doesn't mind if Ida continues her career since "acting is a woman's job anyway!" Woolley, when he heard that, snorted and walked away!

Over to the "Undying Monster" stage, and a talk with Heather Thatcher who's just come from London after a risky Atlantic crossing. She'll raise funds for British War Relief and make a few pictures before going home again.

Heather believes it's impossible to overestimate the morale of the English people. She told a wonderful story about a little Cockney girl who spent a hellish night seeing her home bombed to bits. The next morning the child appeared at school, her small face grimy and scratched, her dress ripped and her eyelids heavy with needed sleep. In her fist was clutched a letter from her mother to the teacher. "Dear Ma'am," it read. "Please excuse Maggie for coming tardy. She only got dug out at eight!"

Back to the office and drove by the house where George Montgomery lives with his family. A car parked at the curb looked suspiciously like Hedy Lamarr's, practically confirming the rumor that George and Hedy are seeing each other quietly. Of course, Hedy's very fond of George's parents. Could be she was merely making an afternoon call on Mom and Pop Montgomery.

Fri., Aug. 14th: Over to Warner Brothers' where we went in to see Bette Davis. Bette was in her "Watch on the Rhine" make-up and looking none too attractive! Throughout the picture she's padded to appear matronly—and her studio-made wrinkles are something no well-dressed woman would like to wear! Farny, her husband, left the other day for a tour of Army Air Corps bombardier bases. He's an exec in a firm which manufactures precision instruments for fighting planes. His trip is supposed to be on business, but Bette says he took one glance at her "Watch on the Rhine" get-up, and ran away!

Bette finishes "Watch" in the next few weeks and then takes off on a bond-selling junket through the East. She'll come before audiences in an Arch Oboler skit entitled "Adolf and Mrs. Runyon." Bette's "leading man" in the role of Adolf Hitler will be Martin Kosleck, a loyal American who simply can't escape Nazi roles!

Stopped by the Music Department. Found Dennis Morgan about to record a number for the "Desert Song." His wife called from the hospital just then, so Denny propped the phone on a table and let her listen to a rendition of "One Alone" that must have made her well immediately!

Thurs., Aug. 20th: Ran into Lois Andrews lunching alone at the Players. Lois wasn't very hungry. A morning session with her divorce lawyers and George Jessel hadn't done much for her appetite. Seems George objects to publicity notices which refer to his young ex-wife as Lois Jessel. He feels that since they've parted she ought to resume her own name—Andrews. Lois's reply that she's not responsible for what the columnists print and that if she wanted George's name she wouldn't be divorcing him, didn't help the situation any. She's also burned up at writers who want the "inside" story of why her marriage failed. "How can my marriage be called a failure," she challenges, "when it gave me such a beautiful baby!" Well. . . .

Greer Garson and Cynthia Miller confabed this afternoon. Joined them at Greer's long enough to take a quick tour of the new Garson home. Greer's terribly proud of it and should be. It's an ideal backdrop for the lovely furnishings she's been amassing since she came to Hollywood. The redhead's an antique hound. Haunts the dustridden shops and loves it! Latest acquisition is a mirror framed in delicious, fat angels which hangs in her living room. She let us touch her set of solid silver plates engraved with the crest of Napoleon, but it was "hands off" her Toulouse-Lautrec poster! Think Cynthia got a specially good story. Greer is brilliant copy.

Sat., August 22nd: Mmmm. What a party! Gregory Ratoff tossed it at the Beverly Hills hotel to honor pianist-singer Hazel Scott who's in his new picture "Something To Shout About." Felt sorry for Hazel when she first sat down to play. She was faced with a sophisticated, entertainment-wise audience, with a "show me" chip on its shoulders. Well Hazel showed 'em! The dusky doll beat that piano till it jumped. Before she was through, she had Margaret Sullavan, Mary Astor, Zorina, Louis Bromfield and Don Ameche pleading for encores.

Wed., August 26th: Lunched at Warners' with Ann Sheridan and Jeanne Karr. Ingrid Bergman came striding in (and I do mean striding. The gal takes huge steps!) dressed in one of her famous cotton wash dresses. Wears them constantly, and they're always the same cut—tight in the waist and very full skirted.

Later, a strange creature stuck its head in the door and scared the devil out of the innocent diners. Turned out to be Alexis Smith made up as the elderly Mrs. Mark Twain. She was even more startling when the rest of her appeared. Sixty-five from the neck up, she looked about sixteen from the neck down, togged out in short-sleeved blouse, culottes, bobbie socks and tennis shoes.

Visited the "Princess O'Rourke" set to see Olivia de Havilland and Bob Cummings. Bob blushed, then growled when Olivia talked about his "happy glands." She insists he has 'em 'cause he keeps her spirits bubbling all the time—he's that funny.

Olivia's been furious with herself for days. Seems Jimmy Stewart phoned over the weekend and asked for a date. She couldn't accept because she was working the following day. She turned him down politely—then couldn't think of another thing to say! Just dried up! Recalls she kept repeating that she'd heard him on the air the night before, and that he was very good. But beyond that she was stuck. And so was Jimmy. They hadn't seen or talked to each other in two months and stutter as they would, just couldn't get on common conversational ground. Olivia was relieved when she hung up, and she's certain Jimmy was, too.

Short Shots

As the result of a pact, Clark Gable's enlistment may find Mickey Rooney, Robert Taylor and Spencer Tracy following suit by the time you read this. . . . They say they're still friends, but Margaret Hayes refuses to dinner-date Leif Erickson, the man she's in the process of divorcing. . . . Singer Helen Forrest underwent a nose trim before making a try at the fillums in the Grable-Payne pic, "Springtime in the Rockies." Incidentally, Harry James and his wife arrived at a no-divorce-but-no-reconciliation-either agreement. . . . W. C. Fields didn't witness his son's wedding to a Rhode Island debbie, but his wife was present.

Joan Crawford's Phil Terry is the most ardent Bible student in town. Knows his Good Book—and abides by it. . . . The Ol' Professor, Kay Kyser, gets high score in Linda Darnell's datebook. . . . Carmen Miranda is really an ash-blonde! Wears a dark bleach 'cause Americans like to think all South Americans are brunettes!

Face on the Cutting Room Floor

A guy doesn't have to be nasty to enjoy his revenge. He just has to be normal. And Phil Terry is exactly that. A sweet, ordinary gent who's been kicked around plenty and is finally having his inning.

Before Phil wed Joan Crawford he was under contract to Paramount. To the studio he was just another kid named Joe. They patted him on the head and told him he was a good boy. But when he pleaded for a break they only slung him another quickie role. His last assignment, before his option was dropped, was in Paramount's he-man epic "Wake Island." And in that one the studio topped its previous indignities by ordering Phil out to location—and then asking him to do extra work!

Now that he has acquired a famous wife, Paramount head men are looking at Phil with a new glint in their eyes. They're eagerly scraping the cutting room floor for discarded "Wake Island" clips, and discovering that young Terry isn't such a bad actor after all. They've even drawn up a new contract and are begging him to sign it. But Phil remembers the brush-off they gave him, and he's returning the compliment in kind. He won't go back to Paramount—and he won't check in at any studio until he's certain he's wanted as Mr. Phil Terry—and not Mr. Joan Crawford!

A Bundle for Blondie

Don't ignore the rumor from the East that the Stirling Haydens (Madeleine Carroll) are readying a baby buggy. Those who know Madeleine are certain there's a junior Hayden already on the way—and that if there isn't, there will be soon.

Madeleine's never been coy about her yearning to be a mother. Her intimates will tell you a baby is the one thing in life she's wanted for years. Before she met Stirling friends urged her to adopt a child. But Madeleine always refused. She knew some day she'd remarry—and wanted her family the old-fashioned way.

Well, now she is married. And if she and Stirling, two of the most beautiful people in the world, don't increase the citizenry, dog-gone—it'll be a crime against humanity!

Animal Kingdom

You can cancel all that gossip about Linda Darnell feuding with her family. Linda gave the lie to the rumor when she purchased a beautiful home in Brentwood and handed it to her parents as a gift. There are only two strings attached to the present: 1. The Darnells must not ask Linda to live with them. 2. They must get rid of all their pets, except the dogs.

The family has adjusted itself to the first proviso, but the second will cause some hardship. They've always kept a number of unexpected animals around the house, and you will remember that Linda herself had a favorite rooster called "Weedy." That was all right as long as the Darnells lived in less swanky neighborhoods. But Brentwood residents have a distinct aversion to goats, rabbits and snakes—all of whom dwell in the Darnell household!

Love Is News

This is the tale of a little actress who came to Hollywood full of bounce and beauty and a devouring ambition to be famous. Her first project was to get herself engaged to a handsome leading man, a poor fellow who was too trusting to realize he was just a means to her selfish end.

When the leading man was called to the service before she could get him to the altar, the actress's publicity promptly took a nose dive. But not for long. In a fresh bid for newspaper notice she embarked on another romance, and this time climaxed it with a runaway marriage.

Six weeks after her elopement she realized she'd made a mistake. She would seek a divorce, she confided to a few friends. But please, she begged, would they keep her plans a secret? She was faced with a great personal problem, and until it was settled she did not want the news of her domestic strife to leak to the outside world.

Her friends were flabbergasted. The girl was a publicity fiend. They knew that. Then why the plea for secrecy? And what was her great problem? Bluntly they put their questions, as they were devoured with curiosity.

"Well, dears" replied the actress. "You might as well know. Besides you may be able to help. I can't decide which columnist ought to get the scoop on my divorce! One appears in more newspapers. But the other has a radio program in addition to a column. She might mention me in both places! I don't know what to do. What do you think?"

What her friends thought was unprintable. As one person, they rose in disgust and left our sensitive heroine to settle her "problem" alone!

Good News About Peggy Moran

A wise old fortune teller once put his hands on her shoulders, and looking into her eyes, said, "You will be a very great actress." And it made such an impression on young Peggy Moran that she hasn't stopped acting since. . . . Still, she choked so terribly on her first professionally smoked cigarette, she darned near busted up the Junior College play (was supposed to represent a super-slinky character who lived on the weeds). . . . Once had a dramatic teacher who cried and cried when she was pleased by pupils' work, and used oh, such bad words, when she wasn't. . . . Then in Hollywood, Peg, hurt and bewildered because of an encounter with the rather frank coach who was to help her in a screen test, decided she couldn't act after all. Her mother came to her and said, "You don't have to be an actress. It is unimportant whether you read those lines to satisfy that coach, but it is very important whether you are brave enough to go back and face her." She went back. . . . Her idol for years and years was Fredric March, and she was thrilled to meet him. As a little kid, she used to dream of his marrying her mother, giving little thought to the desires of Mrs. Moran, Mrs. March or Freddie, himself, for that matter. Speaking of marriage, one of the fan mag's came out with a story called "I Want A Husband says Peggy Moran." And though she really wasn't in the slightest hurry about the whole thing, she got 50 letters of proposal, quick as anything. . . . She says, "I've only been in love about a half a dozen times, unless you count the time I had the measles." Her really truly forever and ever love is going to have to have the same sense of values as the lovely Miss Moran. She's a bit wary about spilling her philosophy of life, though, because sadly enough, so "many of the things a person believes in, he does not honestly live up to."

A kiss from Anne Shirley was one of more tantolizing gifts donoted by stors for War Work Haspitol fund. Auctioned off by Bob Hope ot Morian Davies' gorden porty, Army sergeont bought it for 15 smackers!

Although their romonce wos originolly cooked up os publicity stunt, Craig Stevens ond Alexis Smith odmit it boomeranged into the reol stuff. It's rumored Alex will wed him before his droft boord nobs him!

She does say that nobody's ever as good or as bad as you're apt to think them, so don't expect too much, and you'll have no disappointments. We've got an idea that someday she's going to meet someone she'll think is perfectly you-know-what, and no matter how much she expects, she won't be disappointed. . . . On the lighter side, she's simply crazy about breakfasts of eggs scrambled with tomatoes and cheese. . . . She says "You know," after every second (well anyway, third) word, which makes it extremely difficult, because even if you don't "know," you can't disagree with a pretty girl. . . . She loves Tschaikowsky, bread and milk, and (omigosh-so-she's-another) slacks! . . . She's 24 and luscious, with laughing blue eyes and frankly brown hair. Incidentally, are people never satisfied? She wishes she looked like Vivien Leigh!

Her Poppa Done Tole Me

As we go to press the Glenn Ford-Eleanor Powell heatwave looks a cinch for an early altar-ation. The kids have that marriage look in their eyes, and no mistake! They've even made plans for Elly's post-war retirement from the screen. Toe-tapping may be important, Glenn tells us, but he and Elly agree it won't mix with being Mrs. G. Ford!

Now that he has the lovely Miss Powell on the way to the preacher, it's odd to contemplate that only a few short months ago Glenn was reportedly on the verge of tying the knot with Singer Dinah Shore.

"It was all a publicity gag," Glenn confides. "But it sure got us into some embarrassing scrapes! I'll never forget the day I got a long-distance call from Georgia. The man at the other end said he'd been reading all about Dinah and me in Walter Winchell's column, and he wanted to know what went on. When I asked him what concern it was of his, he told me he was Dinah's father!

"Mr. Shore was awfully nice. But can you blame me for feeling silly when I explained about Hollywood 'romance'!"

The Master's Voice

Tommy Dorsey's turning into a musical softie. And you can blame it all on a dynamic old gent called Arturo Toscanini.

A few weeks ago, when Tommy was tooting at the Palladium, Toscanini dropped in with a group of friends to watch the jive maestro do his fancy stuff on the trombone.

As the music blasted louder and louder, his friends noticed that Toscanini shuddered. Concerned for his sensitive eardrums, they inquired if he wished to leave. Perhaps the din was too great, they offered. Perhaps they shouldn't have come in the first place. If the conductor heard them, he gave no sign. He remained motionless in his chair.

Came the intermission, and Toscanini suddenly rose. Marching up to Dorsey, he casually introduced himself. "Your music, I love it," he said, "but if I may offer an opinion, your band is a trifle too loud."

Did Tommy toss him a you-tend-to-your-knitting-and-I'll-tend-to-mine answer? He did not! He was so bowled over by the Master's interest that the next day he rushed out and added ten new strings to his orchestra! And who said "never the twain shall meet?"

Bonds purchased by "Yankee patrons" in $25 to $25,000 denominations, totaled $5,800,000 which paid for 3 or 4 cargo ships! Arthur and Bette Farnsworth crept in unnoticed, but were coaxed outside to take a bow with Treas. Dept.'s Howard Mills.

After a brief honeymoon, Ruth Hussey and brand-new groom C. Robert Longenecker rushed back to the Coast—she to a new picture; he to wind up his radio business prior to taking on a new job as private in the army! Above, Ruth with Judy Garland and Cary Grant.

Over 5,000 fans lined up at entrance of Grouman's Chinese to cheer Mr. and Mrs. Eddie Anderson (Rochester) and other stars of "Tales." There was no speechmaking over public address system, but actors how-de-dooed from a specially built platform above the crowd.

Paramount's Betty Hutton, soon appearing in "Happy Go Lucky," thinks this is the time to dress up if ever and shows you how to look lovely and keep warm, too, in a bottle green velveteen and striped taffeta dinner dress. Take velveteen to your heart because it's warm, comes in lusciaus colors.

Triple Treat

Take a tip from three dancing Hollywood stars who make personal appearances at Navy benefits, tour the country selling millions of war bonds. They've solved the clothes problem by bringing it down to the simplest ABC, by knowing just what they do and do not like. Betty Hutton settles for a simple black day dress, Ann Miller collects suits, and Marjorie Reynolds dotes on big-brimmed black hats.

Effervescent Betty Hutton entertains the swing shift in glamoraus black net with sequins. If you want one really super-sophisticated dress, look na further.

Marjorie Reynolds believes in dressing for the men as who doesn't? They like clothes dramatic but feminine, so we all agree on this day-or-night faille-yoked teddy bear.

Astaire-teamed Marjorie wouldn't put even her closest rival in a peg-top skirt, she hates them so. But a madified dirndl in green? She'll keep it for herself, thanks.

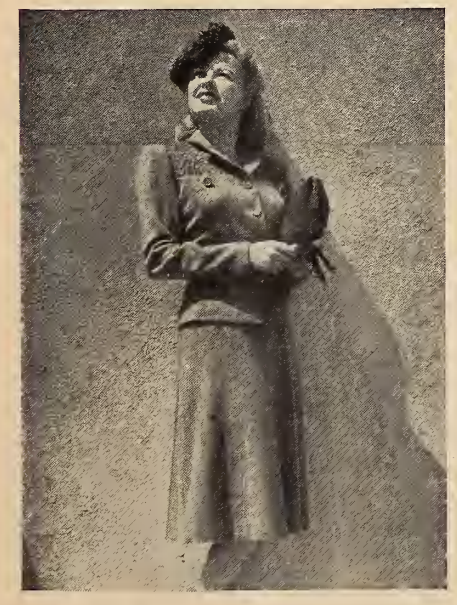
Dramatize your black drawstring dress with light cyclamen, as shown an Ann Miller, who loves slacks, fads like quilted skirts, and a few very, very good clothes.

Now that she's blonde, Ann Miller, soon to appear in Columbia's "What's Buzzin' Cousin," finds herself wearing black instead of white at night; pastels, sports clothes, instead of brightly colored fussy dresses, thus giving her locks the lead. Whatever you are, try white lace on black velvet.



'Member we told you to watch for violet wools? Marjorie models one, a soft dressmaker suit with criss-cross yarn. How about embellishing your own suit?

LITTLE BUG

being ribbed again. I knew I was still pretty dumb, but that wasn't what worried me. I thought surely Shirley had changed, and I thought any change from the dimpled darling of yesterday couldn't help but be for the worse. Good Heavens, she might even be in "that awkward age"!

wee bit . . .

"Hello," smiled Shirley. I felt a wave of relief. She was wearing a pink dress. And she still looked as sweet and fresh as a dish of strawberry ice cream. H. G. Wells' observation still stands. She totally disarms you. She lifts you off your feet. That's still Shirley Temple—thank goodness!

Shirley is fourteen, but she's not all arms and legs. She is petite and dainty. She is 5 feet, 1 inch tall, and weighs 102. She takes a size 9 dress, and it has to be cut down. Her hands and feet are tiny, her features small and delicate. All this was something of a surprise to me, because as a baby star Shirley was solid and chubby. Right now Shirley shows no signs of being large like the rest of her family—brother George, for instance, the marine, who weighs over two hundred, or Jack who's six feet-three.

This dainty development preserves for the girl Shirley the same doll-like beauty Baby Shirley had. It's hard to realize when you catch her growing wit and intelligence, and at the same time see every sign of the beauty she had from the day she was discovered.

Her skin still has the rose-ivory look of an expensive bisque doll which even Technicolor has never caught. Shirley always looks as if she had just been rubbed with a wash-cloth. She takes a tan, but a light, golden one. Her brown eyes have the same baby brightness they had when she was five years old. The famous dimples are still deep, round and flush at the corners of her mouth, as if they had been drilled there with a pencil point. Her hair, thick and still naturally curly, has darkened to chestnut, but the gold shines through. Her cheeks are still appled, her eyebrows are delicately lined and dark. Everything about Shirley's face and figure spells neatness, naturalness, budding life, beauty.

By now, of course, Shirley uses some cosmetics and beauty aids. Not at school—they're strictly banned at Westlake—but the minute she leaves the campus Shirley lays on lipstick—like all her girl friends. How much is always good for an argument between Shirley and her mother. But compared to other charmers of her age bracket, Shirley is fairly conservative. She doesn't use rouge at all—doesn't need to. Her nails are polished with a pink polish. She spends hours on her hands and they show it. If Shirley had her way, the nails would be much longer than they are now, but Mrs. Temple has a thing or two to say about that still. Shirley seldom powders her nose. But she dabs a spot of perfume on her hair when she steps out at night. Not that it needs it!

Shirley still wears her curly tresses loose and girl style, a 'teen-age modification of the tumbling crown of her baby days. The curls now fall almost to her shoulders in thick waves. Evenings she tucks in an orchid or gardenia, and at school she sometimes nips it up with a ribbon. But she has never experimented with fancy coiffures or beauty shop creations. One day a while back she did get to work on it herself, parting it in the middle with a sophisticated arrangement which she flashed on the gang at her radio show. "They almost ran me out of the place," grinned Shirley. "Nobody liked it but me, so then I didn't like it!"

In most every beauty department Shirley shows the good taste that has been a part of her raising.

In spite of a theatrical childhood, she's not showy; on the contrary, she's conservative and ladylike in her tastes. She likes nice things. Shirley grew up in custom-made clothes as a tot, when studio designers whipped up special creations for every picture part. She still isn't satisfied with department store hand-me-downs, no matter how well made. She has shopped several times, by herself and with her mother at Bullocks-Wilshire, Magnin's and other Los Angeles style centers, but she's "picky" and hard to please. Most of her things are specially made for her today. She has Irene suits and Greer dresses in her closet—along with wash dresses the family dressmaker has sewed up.

Right now Shirley's clothes are mostly of two kinds—nice imported sports things and evening "formals." At exclusive Westlake, she wears uniforms—a white one in warm weather and a dark blue silk when it's colder. Off campus, Shirley changes to tailored sports dresses, jackets, sweaters and skirts and neat short-sleeved summer dresses with puffy little skirts. Shirley is a sucker for shoes of all sorts, especially wedgies for sport, and she adores French heels for evening—the higher the better. Her color tastes run to off-shades, mostly off-shades of red and blue. She likes plain jewelry and real. She doesn't own a piece of the costume stuff, if you can except all the cadet wings, victory "V's", service buttons and insignia which she's collected since America's military expansion began.

Naturally, by now Shirley owns some lovely bits of jewelry, pearls, diamonds and such. But her favorites are her gold wrist watch, a plain gold bracelet and a gold band ring with the raised letters "Shirley" around it.

Such a dream supreme as Shirley is something to make the boys swoon right away at this stage. And they do. She's extremely popular. Shirley would be a belle even if she had never had her picture on the screen or in the paper. On her freshness and budding beauty alone she'd crack the hearts of all males within sight. But, having additional glamour of years as America's girl goddess behind her, Shirley is practically a panic with young masculine America. And in some ways it's a problem.

Fortunately, Shirley Temple's Romeos fall in two groups: the boys she knows and goes out with and those who worship from afar. With the first squad, Shirley's movie glamour doesn't mean much; with the second it means plenty.

sweetheart of the yanks . . .

Oddly enough, Shirley at fourteen is one of the prime sweethearts of our fighting forces. We have a young army, and most of them, though several years Shirley's senior, remember her as their dream darling in her early pictures. Shirley is the Three Little Sisters rolled into one. The army, navy and marines all bombard her with ardent, wistfully romantic notes. On leave, they come right up to her gate and hang around, too.

A few have even climbed over the fence. The mailbox and bell plates in front of the big electric gate at the Temples' Brentwood estate are black with penciled messages to Shirley signed with names from every whistle-stop in the Union. The police have had to be called a time or two.

Shirley's favorite suitors are less impetuous. They're mostly boys she's grown up with in the Brentwood-Santa Monica district or met at dances around California prep schools, military academies and colleges. All applicants are pretty carefully looked over by the Temples before they can take Shirley out, and then they don't go out alone. There's either a group, well chaperoned, or if that's not the set-up, transportation is Shirley's car and chauffeur with a member of the family or staff along.

Except for chaperonage, Shirley's folks aren't prudish or persnickety about her social life. They don't treat her like a precious china doll. In fact, they're pretty broadminded. There's no particular time she has to be in of evenings; for instance. They leave that to Shirley's sense of the proper things to do, and Shirley hasn't failed them yet. She can go wherever she likes that nice kids go to dance and have fun. Shirley has taken in the Cocoanut Grove, a venerable Hollywood glamour room. She has been to most of the better hotels to dine and dance. She hasn't made the jitterbug palace, the Palladium, yet, but it's only because she's afraid she'd get trampled in the rush of rug cutters and prancing cats.

Friday and Saturday are Shirley's nights to howl. That's when everybody who is anybody goes places and see people. Friday, especially, is the high school and college scat night. During school season Shirley's social life revolves pretty much around the Westlake Cotillions, formalish affairs patronized by the local adolescent elite. She takes trips often to the better boys' schools scattered around California, which are always giving hops. At the Webb School in Ojai, thirty boys cut in on her during one dance number for some sort of a record. "I got a little dizzy," sighed Shirley, "but it was swell."

She has a ballroom of her own and all the music and makings for home dances, but Shirley seldom throws a hoe-down at home. Most of her home parties are strictly female. Like all young ladies, Shirley prefers to go out among 'em to dance. Right now the Del Mar Club, on the beach at Santa Monica, is her favorite. The Temples have belonged there for a long time, and that's where Shirley gets her daytime beaching in. She trips down during the week for luncheons with "the girls" and on Friday night dolls up in decolletage for the younger set dances.

Shirley is a good dancer. She does everything, including the jitterbug, but what she really goes for is the rumba. The conga was a favorite for a while but it was pretty tough on some of her evening gowns. "They get all split up bending down," said Shirley. Shirley knows a thing or two about swing music. Her favorite bands are Harry James, Tommy Dorsey and Glenn Miller in the order named. If she had her way, more boys would take dancing lessons with emphasis on the rumba. "Why is it," Shirley wanted to know, "that all girls can rumba, while most boys just two-step around? They ought to go to Arthur Murray in a hurry," cracked Shirley.

Shirley still has her bodyguard, Palmer (the kids call him "Palmtree"), who hovers in the background like a potted palm, at that. But he's popular with everyone, and because they know he's there, Shirley's folks allow her more running around than she'd get otherwise. Under Palmer's watchful eye she can stay out late enough for a feed at Simon's Dairy Lunch on Wilshire or Carl's Drive-In on the Coast Highway, two popular hamburger spots with Shirley's set. Bars, of course, are still out of bounds, even for soft drinks. Shirley doesn't go in yet for cocktails and cigarettes, although she's pretty grown up in most other ways, particularly in her tastes for escorts.

Shirley likes all men, but she prefers them older than herself. Older men like her, too. Shirley's face first beamed at me from the dresser top of a man slightly older than Shirley. She was five then, and the gent in question, Adolphe Menjou, was—well, he was older. Adolphe was a bachelor then and a crusty one. But he'd played in a picture with Miss Temple, and here was the evidence of true love—the only framed photo in the Great Fashion Plate's bedroom.

Of course, anybody would tumble for Shirley at any age, particularly this one, her loveliest. The day I called, I watched a mayor, chief of police and Rotary Club president call to thank her for a personal appearance at something or other. They all looked smitten and acted like bashful boys, although all were crowding the fifty mark. Shirley's preference for grown-ups is perhaps traceable to the years she spent with them on the set, the famous adults she's met in her travels and the fact that she's always been a step ahead mentally.

The Shirley Temple stag line today lists eligibles all the way from fifteen to twenty-two. Most of Shirley's boy friends work in defense factories, Douglas and North American, near Santa Monica, so they've some money to spend. A lot are in the services, too—the older boys, while the wet-eared set are starting college or finishing off prep school. Shirley tosses off suggestions of a particular prize sweetheart and Sunday man with, "Pooh! Of course not!" but when you suggest she's shopping around she grins. Mrs. Temple married when she was seventeen, and it wouldn't surprise me if Shirley waltzed off to the altar at a fairly early age. The Temples all have minds of their own and manage to use them.

Jack married very young. George hopped off right in his teens and enlisted in the Marine Corps without telling his folks a thing about it. He's a gunner on a bomber right now, and he was all through the Pearl Harbor fireworks. "Just about the most dangerous spot he could have, I guess," said Shirley proudly. They're all pretty proud of George now. All the things every Temple does independently and sometimes tempestuously, seem to turn out perfectly swell.

Of course, Shirley faces no rash decisions now. In fact, while she's budding into a belle more every day, boys are still mostly a feminine conversation topic and a curiosity more than anything else. Shirley's in the age now where girl friends loom large in her daily life. She's popular with the girls. They call her "Shirl" and, very grown up, sometimes "Temple." Like all kid stars, plopped into the realistic world of school, Shirley had to break down a natural standoffishness at first. Her first week at Westlake a few of the girls gave her the business. One caught her in a conspicuous place and cracked, "H-m-m-m—I see we have a movie star in our midst!" The crack, intended to be devastating, wilted against Shirley's frank friendliness.

Shirley has always been able to step gracefully down from her pedestal position, because when she's with people she's more interested in them than she is in herself—a pattern for popularity and a sure cure for self-consciousness. She has always been gregarious, sociable, active and circulating like a lead quarter. All the time she was a baby star at Twentieth Century-Fox, Shirley was organizing clubs, conducting campaigns and prying into everything on the lot. She is still a great joiner. But the more fearsome endeavors, like the Shirley Temple Police Force, Junior G-Men, etc., have given way to ladylike projects.

Shirley's a member of things now like The Nightingales, The Silver Spoons, Bluegate Cottage and The Thrifties. They're all junior social aid clubs, objects: fun and sweet charity combined. They keep her buzzing around to luncheons and meetings of all sorts with her particular girl friends, Phoebe Hearst, Nancy Slessinger, Nancy Majors, the Lloyd girls and dozens of others.

But all is not frivolity in Shirley's existence. Not at all. For one thing, she has, while it lasts, her program, "Junior Miss," which means weekly work. As in pictures, Shirley takes it in stride; she has always loved any kind of acting and still does. "Everyone on the show gets nervous," chuckled Shirley, "except me!" Instead of being bored by now with making movies, Shirley, despite a series of none-too-good pictures, is just as hopped up about them as ever. After "Little Annie Rooney," which didn't turn out as the Temples had hoped, there was some family discussion, in which the suggestion was made that Shirley forget pictures for a while. "I don't know that I want Shirley to make pictures any more, anyway," said Mrs. Temple.

"Well, I want to make them!" objected Shirley. "I like to make 'em." She does, too—stinkers or not. She always has and probably always will. Shirley still takes tap dancing lessons every week. But it's the only professional program she keeps up. No singing lessons, no musical instruments, no dramatics. Shirley hasn't any plans about her adult career or ideas now whether or not she'll be an adult actress. She doesn't even know yet that she'll go on to college or where, although she kind of favors Stanford. What she is concentrating on is growing into a normal, well-rounded and all-around young lady—which in these times seems the best way to point.

Shirley is athletic but she's no muscle maiden. Badminton is the game she likes best. She's just fair at tennis, a pretty good swimmer and terrible at golf. The last big links match she had—with her old pal, J. Edgar Hoover, at Yosemite Valley—Shirley dug up the course disgracefully. "When I yelled 'fore,'" she admitted, "everybody ran!" The ponies Shirley used to own are gone now. She's not horsey, particularly, though she can ride. Shirley has no patience with an athletic pose. Nor does she care about running around smelling of the stables as so many upper class girls of her age love to do.

On the domestic side, Shirley is so-so. She takes care of her own quarters, her daintily decorated bedroom, sitting room and bath. She's neat and even a little fussy. She can cook a few things, but what really intrigue her are fancy dishes, fixing up a natty looking salad plate or arranging party fare.

Sunday evenings are Shirley's favorite times for turning kitchen conscious. She has been known to bake a cake (with questionable results), and several times she has managed to get together, all alone, refreshments for her girl friends' parties. But pots and pans and real businesslike cooking don't appeal to her as fun, and she's frank to admit it—although for daily diet she's still a meat eater—has been ever since the late Will Rogers saw her nibbling spinach grimly in the Fox commissary years ago. Said Will, "Ain't it about time Shirley tossed over that rabbit's food and started chawin' a steak like a big girl?"

Shirley can't sew worth beans, but she's careful about her clothes, supremely neat and clean. She picks tub baths over showers and still, as a hangover from her kiddie days, has a swimming doll floating around in the suds. A while back, Mrs. Temple thought the doll had seen its best days and that Shirley was too old for it, anyway. She suggested sending it off to the Good Will. "Certainly not!" vetoed Shirley, indignantly, "the doll still swims very well." It's still there.

The big and famous doll collection, however, is neglected pretty much now. Shirley collects silver miniatures, Dresden and Royal Doulton figurines for a more mature hobby. On the cultural side, she's symphony happy. "Fantasia" gave a boost to her big-time interest in music, although Brother Jack began it years ago when he started collecting symphony records at Stanford. Shirley has inherited these now for her big Capehart along with a stack of others. She's a Tschaikowsky fan.

Shirley paints and sketches a little, writes an interesting letter and sings well (although her voice has gone higher from the husky low one she had as a baby star). She belongs to the Book-of-the-Month Club, devours the adult best sellers, grim ones like "Darkness at Noon" and meaty, informative tomes like "Inside Latin America." Nobody supervises her reading or bans realistic adult books. Shirley is smart enough in school study subjects, but she's no A-scholar or whiz. In her baby star days some wise man was always coming up with an analysis of Shirley's great cerebrum, tagging her I.Q. in astronomical figures and making her a prodigy. It wasn't so. Shirley is talented and bright, she always has been, but she is no intellectual freak—thank God!

Her sense of balance extends to almost everything. With money, for instance, Shirley is not restricted to a fixed spending allowance. She can spend what she wants if she has a good reason. Her bank wealth, as such, never seems to interest her. Generally she dribbles away three or four dollars a week, but if she needs more she spends it. Shirley has never had an automobile; in fact, as far as her mother knows, she has never driven a car, although Shirley looked interestingly wise when I mentioned it. She has her ideas about what the car is to be though—a black convertible with a white top. "If," amended Shirley, "there are any cars by that time. Maybe they'll all be airplanes."

If so, Shirley will be out of luck. She has never been up in the air and doesn't want to. She was in Honolulu when Will Rogers made his last tragic flight in Alaska, and the news of her studio pal's tragic death has stayed with her to this day. Last spring the boys at Princeton University invited Shirley to a round of house parties. The invitation was pretty cute, too. "We wish to assure you, Miss Temple," it read, "that our intentions are unimpeachable!" Shirley's radio job made it impossible unless she flew East and back. The temptation was pretty keen, because Princeton house parties—wow!—that was real glamour for Shirley. But the airplane ride tabooed it.

There may well be many changes to come in Shirley Temple's life because of that certain December Seventh at Pearl Harbor. When Shirley heard the news about her favorite island she was so stunned she didn't speak for an hour. Then she burst into uncontrollable sobs—mainly because she was horrified and worried about Brother George, who was there. J. Edgar Hoover made it a point to verify that George was all right and let the Temples know promptly.

Today she's a busy war worker, with frequent black and blue fingers from autographing war stamp books and bonds, and she has set some sales records, too. No army camp shows as yet. Shirley, Mrs. Temple feels, is at a bad age for that sort of strenuous campaign. Not young enough and not old enough.

Yes—there will doubtless be many more changes in the new world for Shirley Temple as there will for all in her budding generation. But I'd be willing to bet something important, like a defense stamp, that Shirley herself won't change—not very much. I first met her ten years ago and underneath, Miss Shirley Temple today has the same spritely spirit and irresistible charm.

Then, I remember there was a wise-crack gay Hollywood bachelors used to toss back when anybody inquired if they'd ever settle down. "I'm waiting for Shirley Temple to grow up!" they'd say.

It's a little dangerous to sound off like that today. Shirley Temple is almost grown up. But from the results so far, I'd say it's still a pretty wonderful idea.

Do you save pennies in your piggy-bank and turn 'em into defense stamps? Did you plant a victory garden? How are you getting the money to buy bonds for victory? Write us, and the best letter will receive $5 in War Stamps. Address letters to MODERN SCREEN, 149 Madison Ave., New York, N. Y. And don't forget that you're never too young to do something. Just look at this month's prize winner!

I am 12 years old, and I ran a Summer Camp for young children in the neighborhood. It started at nine each morning and ended at twelve. The children played games, made beads and modelled clay. My helper, named Susan, taught the children craft, and I taught them games. We used our own things and had from 12 to 17 children every day. This camp cost each child 10c a day. Their mothers thought it was a fine idea and were happy to let them come. Camp was under 6 big trees, and we always started with a flag salute and the children singing "America." We did our own bookkeeping, and each week Susan and I divided the money. Maybe this will give others an idea as to how they can raise money for War Stamps.

How do they do it?

YOUR first day on the job . . . and your confidence has done a blackout. You wonder if you can stick it out . . .

Those other girls—they work day after day—do their shopping during lunch hours—even give evenings to war work. They must have "difficult days," too!

But they're so sure of themselves—laughing and wise-cracking. Discussing dates (when you're thinking of breaking yours).

Then the girl nearest you strolls over to be helpful...and you begin to talk. Funny, isn't it, how you'll confide in a stranger?

"But you're not different," she says ..."it's just that you haven't learned about Kotex sanitary napkins." It was as simple as that . . .

What they can do, you can do!

Kotex is made for girls who must keep going in comfort every day! For girls who take their work—and their play—in stride!

Why? . . . Because Kotex is made in soft folds, so naturally it's less bulky . . . more comfortable . . . made to stay soft while wearing. A lot different from pads that only "feel" soft at first touch.

Your self-confidence need never miss a beat! For Kotex has a new moisture-resistant "safety shield" to give added protection, an extra margin of safety. And flat, pressed ends that keep a girl's secret safe!

Now, at last, you understand why more girls choose Kotex than all other brands of pads put together!

THE PRIVATE LIFE OF MRS. MINIVER

She was wearing a slim green sports dress, and her hair floated in a coppery cloud to her shoulders. "Because I won't do it in a chignon, that I promise you."

He went away sad and left her in the same state. She'd been looking forward to working under him and Wyler.

Then the front office ganged up on her. Louis B. Mayer said: "We're so sure this will do for you what Mrs. Chips did and more, that we're willing to gamble on it. We'll give you a seven-year contract without options." Grateful but firm, she declined. It was Eddie Mannix who applied the back-breaking straw. To play the part was her patriotic duty. The picture would present the ordinary people of Britain in a sympathetic light, make for better understanding.

She knows when she's licked. "All right, I'll do it and do the best I can, but I warn you it will probably break my heart." With which pathetic sentiment she swam out, to enter upon four months of misery. True, now and then as they worked, her spirits lifted. "Could I be wrong? Could this be wonderful?" But most of the time she thought she was cutting her throat. It became a fixation with her, she couldn't sleep, she drove her mother—who takes her one chicken's troubles hard—to the brink of distraction.

Frazzle-nerved, Mrs. Garson went to a studio projection room to see the picture. Greer was working in "Random Harvest." Anyway, only a pistol could have driven her anywhere near that projection room. Later her mother came out to the set. She didn't say much, but the strain of weeks had given way to a kind of peaceful exultation. "Darling, I can't talk about it. You're my own daughter, but I never thought of that. One just loves that family and suffers with them. Nothing else matters. I've got to go home now and plant more beans and buy more bonds."

That was the first shaft of light to pierce the gloom. If she was Mrs. Miniver to her mother, the public shouldn't be so tough to persuade.

Came the Hollywood premiere. Fortified by a couple of anacins, Greer tottered to her seat. The combination of picture and audience reaction sent her forth shaken and humble. So humble that she sat herself down and wrote to Louis B. Mayer the kind of note it's not easy for her to write. "You were right, and I was wrong. I salute your judgment. Many, many thanks." His magnanimous answer was a case of champagne.

She and her sweet-faced mother live together on a basis of mutual adoration which their surface exchange of banter fails to conceal. "This is my mother," says Greer. "It's not really my mother. It's a prop I brought home from the wardrobe department to enhance the domestic scene." They've just acquired the house of their dreams. Mrs. Garson was always serenely confident that they would. Not Greer. Only recently has the ground of Hollywood ceased quaking under her apprehensive feet.

First, after a year's anguish-in-idleness, there was Mrs. Chips. That gentle dove, she was sure, would never be noticed. It was made, you remember, in England. She fought against returning except to a definite part, but they yanked her back by the scruff of her contract. Her mother approved. "Your home is here. You're going to be a success in Hollywood."

More months of waiting. In despair and exasperation, she thought maybe she must play the Hollywood game. She rented a big house. It did no good. She was taken ill. Before entering the hospital, she got herself an agent. If she died, there'd have to be someone to paste labels on her mother's trunks and send her home. Instead of dying, she went into "Remember"—touted as an enchanting light comedy—"so light," flipped Gloomy Greer, "as to be invisible." Everyone was kind—"the right part will come along," they said, but she remained the girl with a load of misery.

on the up grade . . .

More months. Then "Pride and Prejudice," after which the ground steadied a little. But it wasn't until "Blossoms in the Dust" started sprouting that she opened both eyes, drew a long breath and looked around. Maybe the time had come for her mother to reap the reward of faith. She loathed living in rented houses, bless her. As for Greer, she'd always known what she wanted—not jewels, not a fabulous wardrobe—a restful sweet house where you could put up a shelf, break down a door, plant a seed and still be around to sniff the flower.

They started hunting and drove agents mad. Houses, according to Greer, are like people. You can't make yourself like them if you don't. They'd drive in, take a look, she'd kick her mother's foot or vice versa, meaning, let's get out of here in five minutes. While she was working, Mrs. Garson made the rounds alone. There was a house in Bel-Air—she'd seen it on a cloudy day—"I don't know—it seems a little dark—I think you'd like it—" this with a downward inflection that defeated the words.

Still she kept harking back to it, though in mournful numbers, so after

"Miniver" Greer said, "Let's go see this house." The day was sunny and light abundant. They stepped through the doorway into a gracious room, timbered in bleached oak. A carved staircase of the same wood rose and turned a square corner. All the rooms opened into one another, giving an effect of endless space. There were French doors on a garden Greer couldn't believe.

"If I ever have a home of my own," she was wont to say, "I want a natural garden—big old trees, not too many flowers, up-and-down ground, a little brook. This one met every specification, even to the brook, in a country where running water takes on the radiance of a miracle. She kicked her mother's foot—meaning, darling, this is it. The deal was closed that day—not without trepidation. On stormy nights, she vows, you can hear the mortgage settling.

Two months later, taking advantage of a long week-end off from "Random Harvest," they moved in. The gossip columns had a field day. Nobody knew where Greer Garson was, they shrieked, and the freer spirits came right out with what they termed the inside dope—she'd gone off to marry Richard Ney. Actually, she was toting lamps and bric-a-brac from house to house, getting the piano where she wanted it, then deciding she wanted it somewhere else. She was glad to return to the picture for a well-earned rest.

And talking of Richard Ney, you can speculate till you're blue. All you'll get from the fountainhead is a lovely, impenetrable smile and the information that he's a midshipman in the Naval Reserve, studying on U. S. S. Prairie State in New York, that he writes vastly entertaining letters and that she misses his gay company. To this she adds thoughtfully that the French poodles, Gogo and Cliquot miss him, too. If that leaves you thirsting for more, we're in the same boat.

Her zest for living is such that she deplores the fate which metes us out one niggardly life apiece. She could use at least five. She'd be an art connoisseur, a gypsy roaming free, a whiz with skate and ski for which she hadn't the strength as a child and now hasn't the time. One life she'd devote to field and flower, feather and fur. She also wants to be an actress—this above all.

So she throws herself into her work like any zealot—sees nobody, writes no letters, loses all her friends and every four months or so has to lure them back by stratagem, art and wile. She lays claim to a split personality. As the working-girl, she's brisk and efficient. As the duchess between pictures, she specializes in languor. Her idea of languor includes waking up early. Winters she sleeps in a nightgown, summers the nightgown hangs over a chair. Unless it were hanging there, she'd feel unrespectable. She scrambles into it and a dressing gown, as the maid approaches with grapefruit and tea. Only if there's a lot of phoning to be done, does she stay in bed. Otherwise she's off for a swim. Walking, riding and swimming are her favorite forms of exercise. Told she swam like a duck, she begged, "Make it a cormorant. Ducks waddle."

After showering, she skips round the place in a zip-up dressing gown—British for housecoat. There's still so much to be done to the house that she hates showing it, because she can't resist explaining how she's going to have this and that, and people look polite and say oh! and she wants to brain them. lunch she slips into a sports dress, uses only powder and lipstick unless she's going out, in which case she darkens her brows and lashes which are very fair.

bill of fare . . .

Lunch is generally a salad. She also favors cheese soufflé, nubbly brown bread and cold boiled chicken in jelly. Her Hungarian cook makes delicious mousse and upside-down cake. Greer ogles them fondly and turns them down. If necessary, she could live on mounds of whipped potatoes with a hole in the middle and roast goose gravy in the hole. When you dropped in at a cottage in Ireland, that's what they gave you. Indeed, she finds food of all kinds but too appealing. Her childhood was spent avoiding the caraway seeds in seed-cake. And crystallized ginger. You got that for being good. So little Greer was naughty.

She doesn't smoke nor drink strong waters—hard liquor to you—but considers a glass of wine with one's dinner a nice genial custom and, by her own reckoning, has a fine palate for wines. She ignores labels. If she likes it, it's a good wine.

Not much of a café girl, she loves dancing so dearly that once in a while she goes. She constantly meets people she'd like to be friends with, swears she's going to cultivate them and never finds the time. Partly because she prefers small groups to large, six at a dinner table is ideal—you can talk to each of them. More than eight is too many and hard on the household help.

Her idea of an agreeable session at home is one spent with three friends not long ago. They swam, dressed, had a glass of sherry, dined and, since they happened to have quite a lot to say to one another, sat around talking on general topics and particular. Greer plays the piano badly enough to exasperate herself, which exasperation fails to dampen her pleasure in playing. She feels guilty about the extravagance of owning two Steinways and explains that one was bought secondhand at a great bargain. "It's been played only by Hofman and Rubinstein," they told her.

"If Rubinstein played the 'Fire Dance' on it once, it's twenty-five years old already." But she couldn't resist it.

The bargain Steinway will eventually move to the little storybook house she bought at Del Monte. She and her mother have a passion for Del Monte. When a vacation impends, they say, "Let's go to such a place, but first to Del Monte for a rest," and never budge from Del Monte. This toy house was unearthed by an agent friend. Mrs. Garson looked at her daughter who was already looking at her mother.

"It will save hotel bills."

"If I ever have the misfortune to lose a limb, I could brood nicely here."

On learning who wanted it, the owner sat down abruptly. "My favorite screen star! She won't want to be bothered getting silver and linens. I'll sell her the place as is."

By movie standards she spends little on clothes, likes dramatic evening gowns but otherwise doesn't fuss except for pictures. Gabardine suits are her favorite wear, and her color sea-green-blue. She'll use slacks in the garden but nowhere else. Hats she can take or leave, and thinks she looks best in extremes—huge cartwheels or tiny lightheaded numbers, nothing in between. Lily Daché, whom she met in New York, decided to run up several little fantasies for her, but Greer seldom wears them.

Mostly she does her own manicures, and her nails are rosy, not gaudy. Flasks of perfume marching across a lady's dressing-table move her to wonder. First, they deteriorate in the light, and then she's a believer in ah! sweet mystery of scents, refuses to tell what kind she uses and is driven mad by people who ask. She'll relent sufficiently to say she likes them balanced—too heavy a perfume changes its nature and becomes disgusting—too light a perfume tends to be volatile. Hers are probably blended. One shouldn't be able to sniff, she contends, and say—oh, Shocking. The ideal is subtle, tantalizing and nameless.

You'd be hard put to it, however, to keep the secret of your own boudoir from Miss Garson. As others pride themselves on perfect pitch, she's proud of her nose—the organ, not the feature—which can spot violets at a hundred paces.

Tired at night, she takes a warm bath spiked with various lush herbs and oils—not-so-lush Epsom salts if she's been riding. Dosage is proportioned to mileage—a pound of salts to every five miles on the horse. In London she drove but doesn't here. Her mother must have someone to drive her—what's she going to do? Bicycle? Skate?—so he might as well drive Greer, too. Anyway, she's sleepy going to the studio and tired going home.

Having read far too much through her bookish girlhood, she's now what she calls happily illiterate. "Mother keeps up with the tide of modern print, strains it and feeds me the cream." Her cure for edginess is music. She likes sweet swing, winces at boogie-woogie but, being open-minded, listens occasionally and is beginning to appreciate a little the intricate cunning of its arrangements. By choice, though, she'll take the classics. When the Russian Ballet danced at the Bowl, she went every night. She can wax lyrical over the ballet—its thistledown dancers dedicated like anchorites to the last shrine of glamour and poetry, archaic already in this grim world of ours. She's had friends among them for years. They came over one day to swim in the pool of the tree-shaded garden. "One of those small dreams come true," says Greer happily.

the inner woman . . .

The click of handbags gives her goose-flesh. Mice and moths don't. Her uncle's influence maybe. She used to catch mice till severely bitten for her impertinence. As for moths—we love butterflies, why hate them because they fly at night by another name? While she doesn't make pets of spiders and centipedes, neither does she mind them. Her heart, however, is reserved for Gogo and Cliquot, who have but one flaw between them. They insist on saving her when she swims, let the nips fall where they may.

In a shop she's a pushover, so confines herself to notions, by secretarial advice. "You can't spend much there." She set out fascinated with the notion of buying notions, which to her were small ideas or trifling inspirations. She found them to be things with safety pins and spools, costing from five to fifteen cents, dispensed at a counter which in the old country they used to call haberdashery. Her secretary proved oversanguine. She managed to roll up a bill of forty-eight dollars.

The scarves she knits are well-meaning but ill-looking, and those who know best advise her to save her energy for selling bonds. She made one trip to Canada and spent September touring the east in Secretary Morgenthau's intensive Salute-to-our-Heroes campaign, three towns a day. Lots of us can knit scarves. Few can talk with such compelling effect as Miss Garson, who not only feels deeply but gives words wings. Fewer can look like her. And don't tell me that doesn't pull its weight.

She has sundry bad habits. Steals pencils, for instance. Okay, she doesn't steal them—says, "This is a lovely pencil, may I have it?"—so where does that leave you? She loves timepieces of all periods and descriptions, but is never by any chance on time except at the studio. That, she explains, is because time's a measure of enjoyment. When you're doing something you like, a day is an hour and the other way round. She loves to collect things but finds them a nuisance when collected; so she meanly makes a virtue of her own weakness, gathers up glass cats, china pigs, old books on etiquette, and presents them to her mother who probably hates them but says, "How lovely, darling."

By and large she's a nice girl, though—makes it a point last thing at night to go out to the balcony of her bedroom, look at the stars and count her blessings.

Perhaps her outstanding accomplishment is one left over from childhood. She can bite her toe-nails and put her heel in her mouth. Asked when she indulges, she eyes you blandly. "Usually at symphony concerts or when entering a fashionable restaurant."

THAT VAN IS HERE AGAIN

beautiful things to come. Beautiful for both M-G-M and their red-haired lank from Oklahoma. There was something about the guy you couldn't ignore. Mostly it was the supreme nonchalance with which he lounged through the film, as though he'd been Bill King always, and couldn't be anything else. And his masterly way of underplaying a scene!

Actually, Van's an old hand at that kind of thing. He laughs when you mention it. He remembers the day his Dad brought home a brand new car. Van bounded out of the house like a gazelle, rounded up his pals, and brought them home to see . . . and to suffer. Swaggering like a lord, he threatened the guys with their lives if they dared lay a smudgy finger on the shiny thing. The car in itself was good enough . . . but as an ego-builder, it was strictly from heaven. The fellows regarded the car, and him, in fitting awe . . . which was all fine except that Van's pop decided, overnight, to return the car. The next morning it was gone . . . and don't think the guys didn't turn the worm. It was their chance to gloat now, and Van's to squirm. Only he didn't. Instead he shrugged through the day with that nonchalance of his . . . and got away with it.

Van remembers, too, the few times his Dad found it necessary to dust his bottom. On such occasions, Van would submit to the indignity without a word . . . then stalk off to the attic and sulk there for hours . . . quietly, but effectively.

Strangely enough, Van says, his years at sea were darn good training for his precious knack of understatement. It taught him things. There was the time, for example, his boat landed on the coast of Florida with a highly inflammable cargo. Lightning shot through the sky, perilously close. Waves rolled over the deck in great columns, splintering the boat. As the crew scrambled overboard, one of them yelled, "Here goes nothin'!" After that, Van says, there was no chance of his ever overplaying any scene.

LAUGHING CAVALIER

Everything about the Milland's home is perfect. Building it was Ray's great adventure of the moment, that's why. Ray spent his spare time for weeks digging up this and that to make the place unique, and everything he did was swell.

He scoured the country for old heavy beams for his living room and finally carted them away himself from a tumbled-down bridge in the run-down part of East Los Angeles. He modelled his den after his favorite pub in London. He did this and that, all in the sharpest taste throughout. When his British furniture arrived, Ray met it in person at the harbor. He wanted it sent right out to he house—that minute. The local truckers said maybe next week. Ray chased around the harbor area and finally at two in the morning, he found a party he could bribe to send it up that night!

quick-change artist . . .

The Millands have lived in Ray's dream house three years.

In that time it has suffered three remodellings. Now Ray wants to sell it. He has full plans for another!

The guy is that way about everything. When Ray contracts a burning passion for something he tears himself to pieces making a private adventure out of it. Once he's succeeded—he's tired of it. Then something new comes along.

The last few years, boats have enchanted Ray. The first one he owned he had specially made. Every night after work Ray drove like Barney Oldfield down to the harbor personally to supervise every beam and davit. It was to be finished on a certain Sunday, and Ray, happy as a kid, arranged to have a christening party aboard. But a hitch developed the night before. Ray hustled down frantically with extra workmen and pitched in himself. He stayed up all night, without a wink of sleep—but the boat was ready for the party, and Ray was in Heaven. He can't stand being disappointed.

Ray received his last boat, "The Guardsman," the very day the navy ordered all private boats kept in harbor. He had already planned a private shakedown cruise for himself and his friends. The order cramped Ray's style, but he refused to be dismayed. On the appointed day he trooped his pals aboard and cruised around in circles, right off the dock. Everyone was having a swell time when a Coast Guard cutter rushed up and hailed them down. Ray was taking pictures, it seemed, and that was against navy orders. All was explained, the camera confiscated, and the party proceeded. What Ray especially liked about the whole event was the Coast Guard raid. That smacked of adventure, and that's the stuff Ray thrives on. Adventure to him is anything that looks different, and he obeys every impulse.

Once, in the days when Ray seldom had the faintest idea where his next month's rent was coming from, he spied an old Dusenberg on a Hollywood used car lot. He had to have it right then—even if the down payment he talked the dealer into was about enough to finance the spare tire. Mal almost fainted when he drove the thing home. Of course, after Ray got it he couldn't afford to keep it; he couldn't even afford to run it, as a matter of fact!

Another time Ray trotted home with a piano accordion he'd bought for the simple reason that the down payment was $2, and he had that amount in his pants! And once, Mal remembers, she almost passed out at a Milland inspiration.

It was in the early days of their marriage. They were living in a tiny bungalow, poor but blissful. Ray had a birthday, and Mal planned a surprise party. To get Ray out of the way (he wasn't working) she talked him into taking a horseback ride, which he's always easily talked into. She figured he'd be back by six o'clock or so. The guests assembled at the bungalow drinking and making merry, but no Ray. The guests got merrier, drank up all the refreshments, and some of them tottered off home—still no Ray. Finally, as the party was breaking up, Ray appeared, leading a horse. "Mal," he yodelled happily, "Look what I've just bought!" It was a good thing, Mrs. Milland recalls, that most of the guests had left anyway. The party was over right then. They barely had room enough for themselves in the bungalow—let alone a horse. As for feeding it!

Fortunately, the rise in Ray's fortunes has made his impulses less wild than they used to be. But they're no less trigger-quick, volatile and speedy to fizzle out.

Skiing had him Sun Valley-happy for a while. Ray made his own skis at home and lugged them to the mountains every day he had off. He eased off that one with a twisted ankle which prompted the studio to step in. Before that, aviation had Ray in the clouds half of his waking hours. On his first solo flight his motor died on him, and he made a forced landing the like of which has never been seen before or since in aviation circles.

Since then Ray has gone overboard on home shop work, laying out time and money for lathes, bandsaws and such and getting on the credit side a few Milland-built knick-knacks around the house like his dinette set—and the debit—almost losing a thumb. In turn, he has got himself hipped on athletics, archery, playing the piano, learning French and giving it up to learn Spanish, making records, shooting home movies, and so on ad infinitum. Right now Ray has just finished a night course in navigation at UCLA.

A while back he was nutty on the subject of flamenco music—a Spanish sort of rhythm he'd run across in Latin America. One night at Mocambo Ray heard a string trio give out with a very special bit of flamenco. He rushed right up and wanted them to record it for his collection. The next morning they did—and that one record set Ray back plenty.

But—also always—Ray switches his interest like a football coach changes quarterbacks. Before the war shortage he changed automobiles three and four times a year. He kept his new boat all of six months, then sold it. He has a horror of monotony in any shape or form.

close-ups . . .

Well—you ask—what's wrong with a guy like that? Why should Ray Milland be considered a queer duck in Hollywood? He sounds as full of bounce as a golf ball and stimulating to know.

Ray is—if you know him. But he takes a lot of knowing. One of his best friends insists: "Unless you know Ray well, you don't know him at all." The friends he has are close friends, but he hasn't many of them. He won't bother himself with people he doesn't like. He won't pose or put on an act. There's no more ham in the guy than you'd find in a kosher restaurant. He absolutely lacks subterfuge. As a result he often seems downright rude.

The other night some people dropped in unexpectedly. In the middle of the evening, Ray complained of a headache and trotted up to bed, making the briefest excuses. Rest of the evening his guests heard his radio playing away. When they left the light was still on in his room. Headache? Well—it's the guess of his intimates that Ray has "convenient" headaches when he just can't think of any other way to do what he wants to do when he wants to do it. They know Ray and understand. Someone else would feel like shooting him.

He can irritate people maddeningly that way—no doubt about it. He's too frank. A friend of his wife's dropped by the house the other day wearing one of those hats you could fasten a motor to and fly over Tokyo with. Ray took one look. "Good Lord!" he exclaimed. "Please—don't wear that hat any more. It looks awful! Listen—if you'll let me burn it up I'll buy you another one!"

The lady, happily, knew about Ray and just kidded the episode away. But she looked a little shaken when she left at that. She knew Ray meant exactly what he said.

The truth is—Ray is fastidious and he has perfect taste in clothes, food and all the refinements of living. He has insisted on them all his life, no matter the state of his pocketbook.

He thinks nothing of dropping in Lily Dache's when he's in New York alone and picking out a mess of bonnets for Mal. She's always crazy about them, too. He's acutely distressed with anything but the best. He has never been seen in a gaudy sports coat, neckerchief or a pair of suede shoes—the sure sign of a Hollywood sport. In clothes taste, as in everything else, Ray just is no actor. He has fine tailored suits, cut by Mitchell and Hague and is always a walking ad for the well-dressed young man, no matter where he is.

Fine things actually thrill Ray. He spent months designing a gorgeous diamond ring with platinum petals for his wife's Christmas present and another one or two taking it around to his friends for opinions. "Everybody knows about my present," cracked Mal, dryly, "except me!" But that's Ray. He's careful that everything is perfect. If not, he really suffers.

In his travels—he's round-tripped the Atlantic 17 times—Ray has picked up a million ideas about food and good living. He loves to reproduce them in his home. In fact, any reminiscing of the highspots of a trip is his idea of Heaven. He has made all the world's capitals in style, dined at every famous restaurant and lolled in the most gilded hotels. One of the most famous stories about Ray is what happened to the $17,000 inheritance he got as a very young man. He spent it—all but $50 in less than a year painting the Continent red. With the remaining fifty he dolled up in tails, beaned a famous

1. Did he hate me . . . the husband I loved so much? I couldn't guess what had changed our happiness to . . . this. Harsh words . . . frozen silences . . . loneliness . . .

2. One day, I spied my doctor's car next door and hailed him . . . to ask for a sleeping powder. But, wise doctor! He went straight to the cause of my troubles. Then he explained. "Often a man can't forgive one neglect . . . carelessness of feminine hygiene (intimate personal cleanliness)."

3. He recommended a gentle yet thorough method of feminine hygiene . . . Lysol disinfectant. "You see, Lysol won't harm sensitive vaginal tissues—just follow the easy directions on the bottle," he explained. "Lysol is a famous germicide. It cleanses thoroughly and deodorizes, as well!"

4. I took my doctor's advice and found Lysol disinfectant so easy to use, so inexpensive. And now my husband and I are happier than ever before in all our days!

Check this with your Doctor

Lysol is NON-CAUSTIC—gentle and efficient in proper dilution. Contains no free alkali. It is not carbolic acid. EFFECTIVE—a powerful germicide, active in presence of organic matter (such as mucus, serum, etc.). SPREADING—Lysol solutions spread and thus virtually search out germs in deep crevices. ECONOMICAL—small bottle makes almost 4 gallons of solution for feminine hygiene. CLEANLY ODOR—disappears after use. LASTING—Lysol keeps full strength indefinitely no matter how often it is uncorked.

London stage star to Ciro's for a champagne evening and the next day—went to work as a movie extra!

Even now the mere remembrance of an exciting foreign dish will send him off in a rhapsody and nothing can rest until the dish is presented on his table. "Mal," he'll exclaim when the conversation suggests it, "remember the crepe suzettes we had at the Crillon? Let's have them right now!" Then nothing will do but the bewildered cook, aided by Ray in an apron, attempt the creation.

A prodigal guy—when he wants to be. That's Ray. A pack of fun, a circus, a treat—if Ray Milland pleases himself to be. Otherwise, he can be as sullen and humorless as a wooden cigar Indian. He can be even moody and unpleasant. It all depends on whom he likes and who likes him. Ray, for instance, once feuded with Dottie Lamour. Why, I don't know; maybe Ray didn't himself. Around Dottie, and they've been in several pictures together, he was cold and austere and unpleasant. He's that way because he's frank. Obviously he disliked her then. On the other hand, although Claudette Colbert once blackballed Ray for her leading man in "Midnight" and thereby handed him a setback in his career, he's always liked her, and around Claudette is as much of a charm boy as you'd want to find. Eventually, too, his liking for Claudette paid off. She finally did pick him for "Arise My Love," much to Ray's surprise, and since then he's done his best pictures with her—the ones, in fact, which have made him a star at long last.

Mal, his wife, is more amiable than Ray. She's more of an extrovert, for one thing. Muriel Milland, née Webber, is a tall, pretty brunette with prematurely gray hair which she didn't get being Mrs. Milland. Sometimes when Ray gets a wild notion, he'll pop up from the dinner table and drive away in his car without saying where he's going or why. Once he wired Mal from some distant place like Montana or Mexico. The next day he was home again, no questions asked, no explanations given!

Ray met his wife in typical Milland fashion. He first saw her at a cocktail party. He had brought another girl, but Mal caught his eye, and it was one of those things at first sight. Without any hesitation or qualms, Ray made a "sick" excuse to his date, got another guy to take her home and whipped off—with Mal. They got married a year later.

Mal was the daughter of a prosperous Hollywood agent who didn't have much time for actors. Ray was an actor without a job when Mal married him. She gave up a house with servants and the easy life for love. She has never regretted it. And beneath Ray's unpredictable whims, they are probably as deeply devoted as any couple in Hollywood.

sentimental gentleman . . .

For one thing, Ray, young and adventurous as he is, is a nostalgic, sentimental fellow. He's deeply loyal to old friends; in fact, most of his close ones in Hollywood are people who befriended him when he was earning his cakes and coffee. In those days he slept on plenty of couches in more affluent friends' apartments. Now they can sleep on his—and freqently do—no matter how far their fortunes have sunk or Ray's risen. A drug store at Hollywood and Laurel used to stake him to credit when he needed it. Now Ray drives clear across town to patronize the place. He's that kind.

Ray is a tender sort of chap, too, around kids. He is a doting dad to his boy, Danny, now two years old and starting to raise a little Cain. And for several years Ray has been a real big brother to Mal's kid brother, Bobby.

Bobby was left pretty much without a family when his father died. Ray took over the big brother job at once and loved it. He makes plane models and things with the boy in his shop, they collect guns together and their recent launching was a more auspicious event to Ray than to Bobby.

Ray isn't really social nor sociable. He's too moody. He likes people, but he won't put himself out for them. He likes to be alone a lot. Sometimes he'll drop into a restaurant or dance place and sit for hours watching other people, sipping coffee and not making a move himself. The only thing that irritates him beyond measure is loud women. The other night Ray and Mal were in a Hollywood café with booths. Next booth down, a tipsy babe was getting loud and hilarious. Ray quickly got up. "Let's get out of here," he said. "I can't stand it!"

Probably what Ray enjoys as much as anything is an evening at home with some friends. Parties like these have to just happen, though. If anything is planned by Mal, even an hour in advance, it meets stubborn resistance. If Mal calls Ray on the set and tells him she's having people for dinner that night, she knows the complaints she'll get. "I'm tired—I don't want to come home to all those people! Make it some other night." On the other hand, if she goes ahead and says nothing to Ray about it, he's pleased as a kid at a birthday party—particularly if they'll encourage him to talk about his travels, and entertain him with their wit.

Ray is addicted to the idea of travel like a toper to his booze. Train, plane or steamship travel folders are like narcotics. His one ambition in life is to go everywhere and see everything. Just a chat with someone about a remote place will send him scurrying there. Right now Ray is crazy about Mexico. He got to talking to Margo one day at the studio. Mexico is her home, of course. Within a month Ray was there, doing everything from Taxco to the bull fights. He and Mal had just got back from mañana land when I talked to him the other day. Ray was bursting with Mexico. He absorbs foreign color like a sponge and will squeeze it out at the slightest provocation.

Ray is a facts and figures guy, however. He's no great wit. In fact, unless he's in the right mood, he's pretty reserved. But he loves other funny people, especially those who can burlesque walks of real life. George Murphy, for instance, wows Ray with his take-offs on show business patter. Ray loves for other people to perform, but is bashful about it himself. Every time Ann Sothern (who calls Ray "Marlene Milland" because of his shapely calves) comes into the house she has to go through an hour's coaxing to play the piano and sing, whether Ann feels like it or not. Music is a reminder to Ray. He associates pleasant events with songs. That's why he's so nutty about music of all kinds. A tune brings him back to a night in Paris, or a sunny day on the Riviera in his gay days. He's always begging people to sing or play, and his collection of records touches the ceiling.

Matter of fact, few actors in Hollywood are as well rounded and sophisticated as Ray. Besides his vast knowledge gathered from his trips, he reads everything. His mind is restless and retentive, too. He never studies a script, just reads it over once and goes into it. A while back, when Ray was up for his American citizenship exams (he's a native Welshman, you know), he miscalculated the exam date. Somehow it arrived a week early, and Ray realized it the morning he was due to buckle down, Winsocki.

He hopped in his car with a chauffeur at the wheel and a copy of the Constitution of the United States under his arm. By the time they arrived at the Federal Building in downtown Los Angeles, about a half hour's drive, Ray had everything under control.

It's this quick elastic mind that has enabled Ray Milland to go through the motions—and successfully too—of being an actor. He's really no actor at heart. Ray has never taken a dramatic lesson in his life. He's not too interested in the theater. He abhors the spotlight. Radio terrifies him. He has made a bunch of very bad pictures in his time, and he admits it. The scene that boosted him to the big time, the drunk scene with Loretta Young in "The Doctor Takes a Wife," was almost pried out of Ray. He was actually cornered on the set, after planning to flee it—and he gave the performance of his life.

But with Ray Milland the emphasis will always be on living rather than acting, no matter how great a star he becomes. He acts to live and shrewdly realizes that he's lucky to have such a lucrative racket. No Hollywood star pays more attention to business. Ray has never taken a suspension in his life for temperamental cut-ups. He has kept a business manager all the time, and his checks have been wisely salted away. He's a clean, healthy liver who takes care of himself—a one-cocktail-before-dinner drinker and an early-to-bed guy. He's good at athletics, tennis and swimming particularly, and if that isn't enough he takes body massages to keep in trim—although he's so impatient he can't stand more than fifteen minutes of rubbing. But Ray's that way about everything. When he gets a haircut, he has to get up and walk around five or six times during the operation!

Some day Ray may escape to the blue horizons which continually beckon, away from even the golden shackles of Hollywood. Until then, Ray will go on imagining himself on the royal road to romance in everything he does.

yankee doodling . . .

He may hear the call to a different sort of adventure. A call to the skies or the grey battleships. And a helluva fight. Not yet, because of his several dependents and his morale work and the fact that he's studying so he'll be ready to meet what's coming more than half way. Because it is coming—it's in the air and the terrible urgency of the times. And it's coming swiftly. But Ray has never disdained adventure.

Want to find out what he's doing now? Don't ask Milland. He won't tell you he's given his blood to the Red Cross. No one knows about the nights when he, as an air raid warden, patrols Hollywood Dam until the morning. He has to be on the set early and is plenty tired, too. But he won't admit that. It sounds too movie-actorish. He's asking lonely soldier boys to dinner, and incidentally asking Hedy Lamarr to drop in. He's visiting the camps and buying books to send them. Ray was in that picture where the entire cast donated their share of the proceeds to help England. "So what?" he'd probably say. Mal is teaching a Red Cross class at home with such pupils as Ann Sothern and the Mrs. Bob Hope, Wayne and MacMurray.

So the Millands aren't letting very much pass by them in this struggle. Ray is in it partly because it's a fight, but mostly because it's a fight for the stuff called freedom.

Meanwhile the Milland yen for freedom extends from the sublime to the ridiculous. Just the other day Ray had workmen in to remodel his bathroom. He had a shower stall with walls. The plumbers tore it out and fashioned, under Ray's personal supervision, a big steam shower room. vast enough to shampoo an elephant.

"What in the world prompted all this?" a baffled visitor asked Ray.

Replied Ray without batting an eye, "Those walls were closing me in!"

Jane Withers fancied herself a Lamarr till Bud Westmore took her in hand. See what he can do for you!

Jane Withers was going to have her portrait painted by Peter Fairchild just before her sixteenth birthday. It was a crucial occasion, and Jane was in a whingding. After all, stills and glamour shots and fashion poses are all in a day's work, but there is something terrifically special about an expanse of canvas and a palette covered with oil paints.

Jane spent two hours in front of her mirror, I have been told, getting her hair JUST RIGHT for the preliminary sketches. She finally tucked the last bobby pin into place behind a pompadour so regal that it would have made Du Barry look like a goon. She proudly marched downstairs and beamed upon Mrs. Withers and Mr. Fairchild. (Continued on page 100)

Jane Wyman, W. B. cutie, presents a Composite Triangle (narrow braw, wide jaw and chin line). Highlight forehead, add length by tapknatting hair.

Joan Leslie, W. B. actress, has square face (straight hair line, square jaw). If that's you, soften hair line, madify sharp jaw angle.

Take a tip from smart young Hollywood stars who add bond-selling and USO-ing to their studio work. They've solved the clothes problem by bringing it down to the simplest ABC. There just aren't any in-between dresses, and Arleen Whelan, who doesn't own an afternoon dress, claims it's because there isn't that kind of time. Doesn't that go for your home town as well as Hollywood?

Neither you nor I remember the famous Chanel chemise dress of World War I, but better get used to hearing about the 1942 version. It goes by different names, the favorite being drawstring. Lack of zippers and love of the princess line have brought it forth and you will surely want one if time means anything to you.

Fireside fashions, the gay dirndls and pretty playclothes that started as after-ski clothes, have moved into the casual, entertain-at-home front. For instance, a printed challis play suit just begs you to sit on the floor and talk to your friends!

SPRINGTIME IN THE ROCKIES

vivid lipstick. "How are you having the ring inscribed?" Vicky shouted, waving the handkerchief under his nose. "To Vicky—with daggers?" Then the handkerchief was on the floor and Vicky was gone. The dull sound of her dressing room door slamming echoed through the theater. Over it came the applause of an audience calling for the Sweethearts of Broadway—Christy and Lane.

The Commissioner (Jackie Gleason), agent for Christy and Lane, found Dan in the same bar where he had found him for every day of the past three months. Dan was staring soberly at a glass of water. But that didn't fool the Commissioner. Dan always stared at water and drank whiskey.

"Dan," the Commissioner said, "I've got something lined up for you."

"Good," Dan said. "I want to go to work."

"Bickel and Bickel (Frank Orth and Harry Hayden) are all set to back a new show."

"Bickel and Bickel," Dan chanted softly. "Two for a nickel."

"Cut the comedy," the Commissioner said. "It's all set. Except for one thing."

"They want a pound of my flesh?" Dan said. "They can have it."

"They want Vicky Lane with you," the Commissioner said bluntly.

"Don't they read the gossip columns?" Dan said. "We're all washed up."

"Without Vicky," the Commissioner said, "you're the one who's washed up, Dan. That's straight."

"Vicky isn't here anymore," Dan said. "She's out at Lake Louise. Dancing with somebody named Victor Prince. I hope he breaks a leg."

"You can go out there," the Commissioner said. "She still goes for you. You know that. Get out there. Get under the moon. Talk to her."

"No."

"You've got to, Dan."

"No."

The bartender (Edward Everett Horton) suddenly arrived with another bottle. "Anything else, sir?" he said to Dan.

a little direct action . . .

The Commissioner leaned across the bar and slid an envelope over the polished surface. "Look," he said to the bartender, "there are plane tickets to Lake Louise in that envelope. See that he gets on the plane. There's also some green stuff in there for you. Right?"

"Yes, sir," the bartender said.

"No, sir," Dan said.

"Why don't you cut it out, Dan?"

"Okay," Dan said. "For you. No more rye for Danny."

"What are you going to do, Dan?"

"I'm going to get drunk on scotch instead," Dan Christy said.

Dan Christy woke up with a trumpet blasting in his ear. What's more there was a mountain outside his window. On top of the mountain there was a glacier. At the foot of the mountain there was a lake. Any way you looked there was assorted scenery, stuff like trees and grass and rolling meadows. It was the neatest job of camouflage he'd ever seen. Why, the last time he'd looked, New York had been full of skyscrapers and sidewalks, cement and neon lights. You never could tell what that La Guardia was going to do next.

"Lake Louise," a voice said in his ear. "The beauty spot of the Canadian Rockies."

"Lake Louise!"

"We're here, sir," the voice said. "Beautiful Lake Louise."

"We? Who the devil are you?"

"McTavish, sir," the voice said. "Your valet."

Dan Christy cocked one eye upward cautiously. He saw a lank figure, a vaguely familiar face. That face . . . the bartender . . . New York . . . the Commissioner . . . plane tickets . . . Lake Louise . . . Dan Christy came out of bed in a bound.

"You're the bartender," he said accusingly. "I remember you."

"I was the bartender," McTavish said. "You hired me as your valet."

Dan groaned. "Look, it was all a mistake. I don't want to be here. I don't want to see Vicky. I just want to send a wire to the Commissioner right now telling him I'm on my way back."

"Your secretary will send the wire for you," McTavish said.

Dan whirled. "My secretary? I haven't got one."

McTavish shrugged and walked to the door. He opened it and five feet of bouncing energy (Carmen Miranda) came through and grinned at Dan. "Hallo," it said.

"Who are you?" Dan said.

"Rosita Murphy."

Dan said carefully: "Look, the Rosita is fine. If ever I saw anyone who looked like a Rosita, you're it. But cut out the Murphy. You're kidding."

"Kidding? What's kidding who? I am Rosita because I came from Brazil, but my father, he came from Ireland."

double trouble . . .

It was downstairs that he was able to place the trumpet that had been ringing in his ear earlier. It was coming from the Terrace, and it wasn't a trumpet alone; it was a full band. And there was no mistaking that clear full tone. Harry James. Dan walked closer to get a better view of the Terrace and the band. He was just in time to see Vicky and Victor Prince (Cesar Romero) finishing their number. He watched fascinated.

Vicky and Victor took their bows and then crossed to a small table at one side of the terrace. Victor was like a gallant Prince squiring his lady. They sat down. A napkin fluttered to the floor and Vicky bent for it, and Victor bent for it. And just as their heads passed, Victor stole a kiss. Vicky didn't seem to mind. Three months, he thought angrily, and she's kissing the guy. "Come on, Rosita," he said. "Let's take one quick dance." He twirled her around the floor to the soft, soothing music. He watched Vicky until he saw her stiffen with surprise when her eye caught his. He pretended he hadn't seen her. But he knew she was watching. Moving through the press of dancers, he swung Rosita around until they were dancing just in front of Vicky's table. Then as the song ended, he bent swiftly and kissed Rosita. Vicky must have seen. Only then did he look up, and he hoped he looked properly surprised. "Well, well," he said, "look who's here! How're you, Vicky?"

She was ice. "So nice to see you."

Dan grinned jauntily. "It's a small world, isn't it?" He turned to Rosita. "Rosita, this is Vicky Lane. You've heard of her, of course."

"No," Rosita said.

Dan shrugged: "Rosita's my secretary. She only reads shorthand."

"How nice," Vicky said icily.

Dan turned slightly. "You must be Victor Prince," he said. "I'm Dan Christy. Vicky forgets me sometimes."

"So sorry," Vicky said. "I should have introduced you, of course."

"I know all about you," Victor said. "Vicky told me. No secrets between engaged people, you know."

"So you're engaged," Dan said. "Congratulations."

"Thank you," Vicky said.

"Got to be running," Dan said. "See you again."

Back in the lobby of the hotel, Dan made straight for the elevators. Rosita plucked his sleeve. "Tickets," she said.

"We're not going back," Dan said.

"Going back. Not going back," Rosita said. "Why?"

"She's jealous," Dan said happily. "Didn't you see it? She's jealous."

Dan skipped down the hall and flung open the door to his room. "McTavish," he said. "Unpack. We're staying."

There were eight other people in the room besides McTavish. Dan eyed them warily. "Who are they?" he said.

"My brothers," Rosita said. "They play music."

"You hired them in St. Paul," McTavish said.

Dan played his cards carefully that night. He arrived in the ballroom with Rosita on his arm—a Rosita gowned to kill. There were eyes staring at them from every corner of the ballroom when they made their entrance. And with everyone else, Vicky was staring, too. Good, Dan thought. They crossed the room casually, and Dan, quite accidentally, stopped nonchalantly at Vicky's table. He stopped there until Victor was forced to invite them to sit with them at the table. And very promptly Dan pulled up a chair next to Vicky. Dan grinned at Vicky; Dan grinned at Rosita; Dan grinned at Victor. Then he just sat grinning at anyone who passed until Victor asked Rosita to dance with him. Then very promptly Dan stopped grinning, and without a word led Vicky out on the terrace . . . to the moon . . . to the soft breeze . . . to the breathtaking view of the mountains beyond. . . .

"Pretty, isn't it?" Dan said.

"Very," Vicky said.

Dan paused and lit a cigarette: "How do you like Rosita?" he said.

"Quite a girl," Vicky said. "How do you like Victor?"

"Seems to be a nice chap," Dan said.

"He's more than that," Vicky said. "He's fine and gentle. He's thoughtful and handsome, too. I feel about him—"

"The way I feel about Rosita—"

Vicky laughed suddenly. Dan looked at her suspiciously.

"What's the matter with you?"

"So you're in love with Rosita?"

"Maybe."

"Even though you only met her last night in Detroit?"

"How'd you know that?"

"Didn't you ever hear of a Powder Room, Dan? That's where girls go to fix their lipstick and tidy their hair . . . and talk."

"So you've talked to Rosita."

"A mouthful, Dan Christy."

"And you know the whole story?"

"Including her eight brothers."

Dan sucked on his cigarette thoughtfully: "Well, that makes both of us liars, I guess. We're even."

"What in the world are you talking about?"

"That lug you pretend to like. Victor."

"So you don't think I'm in love with Victor?"

proof's in the pudding . . .

"I know you aren't. I knew it the minute you laid eyes on me. If you'd give me half a chance, I could prove it to you."

"You want your chance, Dan? You want to try your line again? The sweet words and the sweet music? You think I'd fall for you all over?"

"Maybe," Dan said. "Stranger things have happened."

"All right," Vicky said tensely. "Go ahead. Do all the tricks. Roll out the moonlight and see what effect it has."

"It's a date," Dan said.

So Dan rolled out the moonlight. He rolled it out one beautiful night on Lake Louise, drifting idly in a canoe under the stars. It was all there, the backdrop to see Brooklyn play the Yanks, congaed with a dozen gorgeous debs—and what the poor kids want more than anything in the world is a magic carpet to take them home for just a couple of hours. You can provide said carpet.

Give them a heavenly late Sunday dinner. Fried chicken or roast beef or whatever is your family's favorite. Have quantities of food—mountains of mashed potatoes and great dishes of vegetables. Have big glasses of milk and plenty of extra touches. Jelly and Worcestershire sauce and pickles; all the things they took for granted at home and long for now. For dessert, how about mammoth dishes of home-made ice cream and million-calorie chocolate layer cake.

You'd think with that kind of food, they'd just automatically have an elegant time, but there's another vital element. Atmosphere. See that mom's at her most momish. Sweet and sympathetic, and with her hair done that way you love it. Beg dad to carve, just this once. Don't ostracize your fiend of a little brother from this party. He's atmosphere.

After dinner, some of your very nicest cronies can sort of casually drop in. But don't make the mistake of instantly pairing everyone off and then railroading them into a series of games. Have the funnies on the coffee table, loads of cigarettes handy and the newest B. Goodman in evidence around the victrola. Let the aforementioned fiendling show his model airplanes and have your nondescript pup come in and be patted. Keep things as completely home-like as you can, and watch the lonesome kids relax and all talk at once and tell your kid brother to "hey, shut up." Just like he was theirs or something. Then you'll know you've got a honey of a party.

Maybe you're discovering America the hard way. The boy you love very much is enlisting in the Army, and you've had some long serious discussions about it. He's made you realize for the first time what the world could be like if he and others like him simply didn't care. He's helped you discover the joy of an early morning walk through un-storm-troopered streets, the quiet happiness of church on Sunday, the fun of choosing your own pet newspaper from the dozens on the newsstand. He—your funny-faced, long-legged honey bear—has actually made your throat ache and your eyes sting when he's talked about things that you once considered simply routine. When he leaves for camp, how about giving him a heck of a send-off?

Get the whole gang together some night just before he leaves and dig yourselves the best party you ever had. Nothing farewell-ish, nothing soupy. Just a party, but good. If your crowd's idea of super fun is a hayride, make it a hayride, complete with portable radio, refreshments and harvest moon. If you've never gone on a hayride, this isn't the occasion for inaugurating them. The point is, make this the sort of party that has always seemed to fit your particular gang. Don't try anything tricky, any new people. Get into your own special groove, and there'll be no worrying about whether everyone's having fun.

Just a couple of fine points that will make or break the evening for him. 1) Don't embarrass him. No speeches or tin hat favors. Just let him be one of the mob. 2) Don't give him any presents. You never know what to give, and anyway they're just that much extra stuff to pack when he leaves. Instead, try this: When the party's about over, give him a set of penny post cards each of which is addressed to one of the kids. On the reverse side have typed: "Write me soon and often please at . . ." (Let him fill in his address.) And, "No hard-tack, please, but I could use . . ." (Let him fill in something he really wants, the ante for which isn't over $2.)

We're not going to give you any party ideas for this affair. No menus, no nothing. It's too intimate. Just have your kind of party and a wonderful time.

Let the memory of it be something Bill can warm his heart at in the lonely evenings coming up. You in your pigtails and his beloved two-summer-old dirndl. Red and Joe moving the piano to its traditional singing location in the middle of the room. Sue and Nick courting up a storm just as if this weren't a special party at all. And when it's time to say good-night, try to pretend you'll be seeing him again the next night. And pray like mad it won't be so very long.

Maybe you've discovered America through the eyes of a bluejacket. A long and fascinating letter from Alaska; then one from the Pacific Coast, and a couple from Galveston and Newport. And maybe in the last one which gave you no clue at all as to where he was, he said, "I'll be home next month." Boy, does he rate a homecoming? And are you the gal who can give it? Well, okay.

Don't have it the first couple of nights he's home. Let him get rested and pampered by his family first, then give it. And turn on the stuff. Make it a superb dinner party for eight or ten, not formal, but slightly on the elegant side. Mom's best china, the best silver and tablecloth, candle light and some really beautiful fresh flowers. Keep the whole dinner party-ish. Gay conversation, a wee bit unusual food. Remember this is the lad who's been eating beans and coarse bread and evaporated milk on a lurching destroyer. For weeks he's been dreaming of a really perfect meal with a couple of queens on either side of him. Don't let him down. A few new faces add a festive note, so why not ask some people you've met while he's been gone.

Let him be the center of attraction. He's tired of anonymity. Weary of being just one of a mob scene. Star him, and he'll love you for cooking the whole thing up.

We gals can't do much with a gun, but we can keep the old morale wa-ay up, and that helps. Keep your own guy happy and hopeful, and you're really doing a job. Oh, and say! This is the month to send Christmas cards and other Santa Clausishness to the A.E.F. the world over. Won't forget anyone, will you?

WHENEVER I REACHED for that laxative bottle, Betty would scream and run away. She hated the taste of the stuff and it upset her something awful! It was just too strong!

THEN I TRIED something else. But Betty raised a rumpus every time I gave her a dose. To make matters worse, the medicine didn't do her any good. It was just too mild!

ONE DAY MY NEIGHBOR suggested Ex-Lax! I gave some to Betty and she just loved its fine all-chocolate taste. Ex-Lax works so well, too...not too strong, not too mild — it's just right!

Ex-Lax is effective — but effective in a gentle way! It won't upset the children; won't make them feel bad afterwards. No wonder people call it:

The "HAPPY MEDIUM" Laxative

Naturally, like any effective medicine, Ex-Lax should be taken only as directed on the label.

want to sign up with the army air corps. I've had a lot of flying hours. . . . I could be useful."

Ann's heart tightened as if it had been compressed by a giant fist. She stared into the solemn blue-grey eyes whose every mood she has come to understand prefectly during the 10 months of their married life. She had faced the fact, in her own mind, that he might want to enlist, but she wasn't too keen about the air force.

She had told Gwenn Woodford, her secretary and best friend, "George will have to do something before long, because he's a fighter at heart, but I hope his contribution will be on the sea or in the land forces. I guess I'm just not too air-minded."

vital moment . . .

She had said nothing of this to Brent though. Now, slap-bang up against the thing she had feared, she proved once again that she's the best wife in the world for the romantic, high-strung Irishman.

"If that's what you want to do, you'll have to do it," she agreed, hoping he wouldn't notice that her fingertips under their opalescent polish had gone cold.

George looked as relieved as a collie pup who has torn up an Oriental runner and only gets a juicy t-bone as punishment. "Red, darling — you're really swell."

Ann looked down at her script while the air was thick with the unspoken things each wanted to say to the other. This Brent marriage is not a talkative relationship. Both live mental lives far below the surface, and emotionalism is embarrassing for them to express.

Casually, she said at last, "What kind of a flier do you think I'll make?"

There is a medium-sized hole in the roof of the dressing room through which Mr. George Brent went with a loud and explosive series of words.

"Why, George," protested his astonished little woman, "what a thing to say! You know perfectly well that there are women acting as ferry pilots—not only in this country—but in England where it's really hazardous work."

"It's hazardous work in this country, too!" stormed George. "I wouldn't any more want you to fly than I would think of putting a baby in an eagle's cage."

"You mean you'd be worried about me?" queried Ann innocently.

"You're darned right I would."

Ann merely looked up at him for several moments, her eyebrows arched. She didn't say a word—she didn't have to ask, "What about my fear for you?" George is a very bright hombre and savvies with great speed.

He also knows when he is licked. He shrugged as a slow grin spread across his face. "I walked right into that one," he admitted. "Like a door in the dark!"

Someone called, "Miss Sheridan—wanted on the set."

Nothing more was said about the air force, but during the month that followed it was pretty plain that it was still on George's mind. During the evening, he avidly read air battle reports while Ann was listening to the record-player. (The Brents usually build a Dagwood sandwich of records, one Spanish, then one Hawaiian, one Spanish, one Hawaiian, etc.—so satisfying Ann's addiction to rumba, and George's love of rippling rhythm.) George would occasionally throw down the paper and stride over to the window.

"I'd sure like to be in it," he said once.

"Me, too," Ann chimed in—and that seemed to settle it. But Ann is a wise wife—and she loves that big Irishman to the point where she can't be happy unless he's happy, too. She thought it over.

One Sunday morning, George was deep in the task of preparing one of his special breakfasts. On week days, whether the Brents are working or not, they have breakfast prepared for them. If they are staying at George's house, his man tosses together some tasty trifles; if they are staying at Ann's house, her maid is handy with honey and hot biscuit. If they are down at the beach house—rented by George during the summer—George's maestro of meals again graces the griddle.

As you may have guessed, the Brents are maintaining both Ann's house in the valley (she owns this), and George's rented bungalow in Burbank. When either of them is working, they find that living in the Burbank house saves driving time and expense and good old tires. When they have a day or so off, they like the valley place. And on week-ends, they hie themselves to the dimmed-out beach, where swimming is still elegant by day, and a roaring fire is romantic by night.

(By the way, Ann still has only one secret from George. When she was planning to build her house, he looked over the plans and told her about how much it would cost. She first turned pale, then turned down his estimate. "You're wrong," she said with finality. "It won't cost nearly that much."

Well, the final check came so close to George's price that you couldn't have bought an aspirin tablet with the difference, but Ann has never admitted it. She just doesn't talk about how much the house cost. (After all, a girl has a right to elude her husband's merry ha-ha whenever possible.)

But to go back to that famous Sunday morning: George put on one of the maid's aprons, and he was working around the kitchen like Frank Sinkwitch around right end. When George builds a breakfast, it is some edifice. Liver and bacon, broiled tomatoes, stacks of rye toast and a mountain of sliced peaches represents one favorite menu. Another is waffles, scrambled eggs, orange juice; or broiled small steak, eggs sunny side up, pan-fried potatoes and toasted English muffins.

He was preparing the latter with gusto and giving Ann orders left and right. "Take the jackets off those baked potatoes so I can run them through this slicing machine and fry them," he directed, while he cracked eggs and trimmed the steaks.

"If this is the sort of breakfast you turned out of the galley on your boat every Sunday morning, I'm surprised you don't weigh a ton," Ann said.

"No cracks about my weight, Tex. Gosh, how I wish we could still run up canvas and steer for Catalina every week-end," he added nostalgically.

"Miss the sea, don't you, Mister?" Ann kidded. "You should have been a gob!"

"You know it. I'm going to enter that race to Honolulu when the war is over or crack a mainmast trying."

"Think you will have forgotten much of your navigation by that time?" pursued the crafty Mrs. Brent.

George stirred the eggs, adding a cupful of diced mushrooms, some celery salt and a dash of Worcestershire sauce. "That's an idea. Guess I'd better keep in training."

"What about the coast guard? I should think that—with your experience in handling boats and in navigation, and with your knowledge of the coast line, you'd be really valuable. . . ." That is as far as she got.

George turned off the fire under the eggs and swung around slowly. "Zoot?" he asked.

This broke Annie up entirely. When anyone else hands her a French hornful of jive, she takes it in stride, but when George slides into the groove—dignified, intellectual George who can quote Shelley, Burns and other iambic pentameter hot shots—it always throws her.

"Well," said George, a little nonplussed, "zoot means on-the-level, doesn't it?"

solid sender . . .

"Darling," Ann said, "you're wonderful. Mr. Goodman Dorsey Brent—you're solid, mister. A genuine sender."

George continued eagerly, "But you meant what you were saying just now. It would be all right with you. . . ."

"I've been thinking it over, George, and no matter what branch of the service you want to join, it's all right with me. No matter where you're sent, I'll tag along if I can. And . . . I guess I won't take up flying."

"What a wife," sighed Mr. Brent with delight. "What a wife."

So, no matter what you hear about George's future in the armed forces, of one thing you may be quite certain: Annie's right there in the cheering section, aiding and abetting her man in khaki, in blue or in civvies.

"Zoot" is not the only jive that George uses regularly. He came home one night looking as smug as a tom cat in a creamery. "How about our breezing out to Bernie's for a steak?" he asked. "Bernie is a boy whose steaks are always on the reat beat. Do you dig me?"

Annie, looking as stunned as possible, said nothing. She just leaned like the Tower of Pisa and rolled here eyes.

Pleased with the sensation he had created, Brent added, "By the way, I didn't have a set call, so I spent the afternoon with the boys in the music department."

"Look—don't ever attend a mortician's convention by accident, will you?" begged Ann.

When either Ann or George is working, the Brents dine at home every night except Thursday—sacred to the cook. On that night they usually join Lloyd Bacon and his wife or the Ralph Bellamys and dine at the Beachcomber's (where the Chinese food is out of this world), or at some steak house upon which George has placed his official okay.

Occasionally Bruce Cabot drops in, after telephoning at great length from the set where he has been working in "The Desert Song."

"Tell Superman," he admonishes the servant who answers the telephone, "that one of his fans is on the wire. Tell him I've discovered a terrific new beverage that he should try at once. At least a minute sample."

Aside from kidding with Cabot about his fruit-juice lethal mixtures, George sometimes gets into hot and heavy political arguments with him—or with Ann. The three of them, along with other Sunday night guests, take Washington to pieces for hours at a time. "This gang includes the finest bleacher generals on earth," Ann told the men one night when they were yelling at each other about how Rommel should be licked. "Let's fix up the Russian campaign while we're about it."

Just about the time when someone is ready to take off his coat and get into a personal blitz, Ann usually arrives to save the situation.

One Sunday she had gone to the kitchen to make coffee in the midst of a frantic group argument over whether a second front was feasible. This same controversy was being tongue-fought over the area of our broad land at that time, so the picture colony preoccupation with it was no novelty.

George is still the Irish revolutionary at heart, but the other side of the question was being taken by an English guest who gets just as excited about his side of the question as George does. The voices went higher and louder. The former world's record of noise, held by the Tower of Babel, went down like a whisper in a flight of B 19's.

Just as the roof began to jump up and down like coffee in a percolator, Ann did a Mrs. Miniver. She rushed into the debating forum and, in a terrified voice hissed, "Does anyone have a gun? There's a bearded man, carrying a rifle and toting a Sam Browne belt loaded with hand grenades, crawling up the back walk. Somebody do something!"

If you think that didn't create a sensation, you don't know California in these days of submarine and parachute horrors. The men started in several directions, looking for weapons. There wasn't a gun in the house. There wasn't a pitchfork within twenty miles. George, an original soul, burst out, "I'll get the handle of the beach umbrella . . . maybe I can sneak up behind him. . . ."

"Cut," said Ann. "The man on the back walk is just Bruce, bringing in more wood—but he makes a swell dress extra for a thriller."

Mr. Brent caught his wife before she could escape. She sat down gingerly for the rest of the evening. Footnote: everybody talked about picture-making after that and let the war run itself.

Ann had to work the next day, but George didn't, so he had time for a secret mission. When he picked Ann up at the studio that evening, he handed her a small pop gun. A tag attached read, "For parachutists."

ivory maulers . . .

George loves to surprise his Toots from Texas with presents. He never seems to forget her slightest wish. When she moved into her new house, she looked over the furnishings and said thoughtfully, "That corner over there looks lonesome. It needs something—maybe a spinet. I'll think it over."

Came Annie's birthday, and—need we go on? There it sits, a little beauty, and after a steak dinner Annie's guests gather around some ivory mauler and massacre a song or so.

(George couldn't carry a tune in a vacuum tank. Still, a few phrases from some popular thing like "My Mama Done Tole Me" will stick in his mind and unwind themselves for days. He goes around the house, uttering sounds on all sides of the melody—like a carton surrounding a shoe. Annie pauses in whatever she is doing and studies him with the concentration of Deems Taylor. Whereupon the unsinkable Brent says with a leer, "I'm just a young singer, ma'am! Never took a lesson in my life."

valentine with a kick . . .

In addition to birthdays, George is a great believer in gifts for Valentine's Day, for Easter, for 4th of July, for Columbus Day, Thanksgiving and Eat More Grapes week.

In an offhand manner, he asked what she wanted for Valentine's Day. "With or without paper lace?" he said.

Ann struck a pose. "Something romantic! Something that will give me a terrific kick."

On February 14th, up rolled a truck—a beaming Brent seated beside the driver. Together they let down the tailboard, and pulled out a ramp. Then George entered the truck and emerged, leading—all dressed up with a collar of paper lace and a white ribbon—a baby burro!

Ann has it on her "ranch" now. "It's wilder than a deer. If a person came too close, I think that Colorado Canary would kick his head off—but I love him."

George likes to be considered a sensible, non-sentimental character. Yet, the baby burro was still so young that it needed its mother, so George bought it and established it in the corral with the baby. Even when the baby began to thrive through its own efforts, George didn't have the heart to get rid of the mother—and there it still is.

For Easter, George appeared on Sunday morning with a basket over his arm. "During my theatrical career, doubtless I laid many an egg, but none of them turned out this well," he grinned, exhibiting 24 baby chicks.

Probably the life of the Brents is best summed up in an incident that took place in the Beachcomber's a few nights ago. Brent had broken his hand in a picture fight several days before. A doctor had bandaged it tightly—thinking the trouble was only a sprain—but the hand continued to swell.

Brent doesn't ever say much about the way he feels, but Ann knew from the beads of perspiration that he kept wiping from his forehead and upper lip that he was in excruciating pain.

Every time he lowered his arm, the hand felt as if it were going to burst, and poor George turned a medium green.

"Tomorrow morning," Ann declared, thoroughly frightened, "we're going down to a bone specialist and have x-rays made. You've been through too much torture today for that injury to be a simple sprain. But right now I'm going to order a bowl of chopped ice. We'll fold a napkin around some ice and wrap up your hand."

George tried to clown in spite of his misery. "Gosh, we'd better not. If some columnist notices my hand, he'll swear that I've been beating you."

Ann looked deep into his eyes. "If anybody on earth takes a good look at me and then decides that you've been beating me—all I have to say is that every girl would like to suffer the same way. Good old beating!"

She ordered the ice, and George obeyed her instructions. And the next day, Ann spent three hours at the hospital with her husband while his hand was x-rayed, the broken bone was set and placed in a cast.

This boys and girls is known as lerve in jive.

And lerve is that old stuff that makes the Sheridan-Brent marriage one of the happiest on the face of this earth.

From Texas to . . . Success in New York

Lovely Eleanor Francis jumped all the way from Texas to prominence in New York (in "Follies Girl") largely because she keeps her complexion so entrancingly fresh, and lovely looking. She says "Since my career depends on my complexion I rely on Golden Peacock Bleach Creme for the quick results I must have so my complexion looks its natural loveliest every day."

If your complexion is not as fresh, fair, smooth as it should be . . . yes even discolored from outside causes, use Golden Peacock Bleach Creme, the active cream, as directed, for a fairer, lighter, lovelier looking complexion . . . QUICKLY. Even fades freckles, loosens blackheads. 25 Million jars already used. Guaranteed to satisfy or money back. Get economically priced jars from 10c to $1.10 wherever cosmetics are sold.

THE STORY GABLE WOULDN'T TELL

he left the studio at five to pick her up at the airport. He raised the top on the car, since she didn't like it down. With him was a friend whom we'll call Ed because that's not his name, and he shrinks from any publicity resulting from Clark's tragedy.

Ed went in to check while Clark waited in the car. The plane, they told him, would be an hour late, so they drove to a hamburger joint for sandwiches and coffee. Clark was in high spirits, because ma was coming home. When they got back forty-five minutes later, Ed was informed that the plane had come down at Las Vegas with motor trouble. Clark shook his head. "There must be something wrong." They returned to the office together.

"It's all right, Mr. Gable," the clerk said. "Just a little engine trouble. They're putting the passengers up at Las Vegas overnight."

"What hotel?"

"That information hasn't come through yet."

"Look, Clark," said Ed, "why don't you go home? Maybe Carole's trying to get you there. I'll call Las Vegas and find out what hotel they're stopping at."

"Come over to the house and do it."

"No, I'll do it here." Why he wanted to do it there he couldn't have said—call it premonition or natural uneasiness caused by the delay.

He was in a telephone booth, coins in hand, when three men entered the place. He looked at their faces, and knew the worst had happened. Heavily he hung up the receiver and walked out. "How bad is it?"

"Very bad—" They added the few essential details.

He went up to the skyroom where an M-G-M executive was dining. They phoned the studio. Eddie Mannix got the job of driving out to Clark's house. There had been an accident, he said, that was all they knew. He got back to the airport with Clark as Jill Winkler, wife of the publicity man who'd accompanied Carole, came stumbling out of her car. The radio had blared the news at her as she drove to meet her husband. Clark stiffened. His face went a shade whiter. But his mind refused to accept what his ears heard. His brain was blocked at one point. There had been an accident, that was all they knew, that was all they knew—the last trip . . .

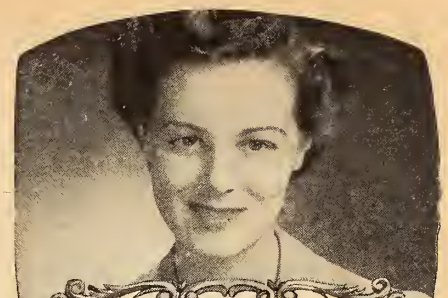
The people around him were shadows. All his will was concentrated on getting to wherever Carole was. There were planes on the field, he moved toward them. Someone led him back. Someone said they'd have to charter a plane. It wasn't easy. Planes were needed for soldiers. At last they managed to get an old crate. Its capacity was limited. There wasn't room for Ed. He stood on the field, watching it disappear into the sky out of which—short hours or an eternity earlier—they'd been waiting to welcome Carole.

On Sunday Ed went to Las Vegas to bring Jill Winkler home. Otto's body hadn't been brought down yet. The regulations were—army first, then women, then male passengers, then the crew. Carole and her mother had been found.



Are You A Young Wife Who Still Doesn't Know?

Safe New Way in Feminine Hygiene Gives Continuous Action for Hours

● Timidity is no longer the young wife's excuse for ignorance of intimate facts. Accurate knowledge is available to any woman who seeks it. Why then, in feminine hygiene, should she either place her dependence on weak, ineffective "home-made" mixtures, or resort to overstrong solutions of acids which can burn, scar and desensitize delicate tissue.

Today such risks are needless. Informed women have turned to Zonitors—the safe, new way in feminine hygiene. These dainty snow-white suppositories kill germs instantly at contact. Spread greaseless, protective coating. Deodorize—not by temporarily masking—but by destroying odors. Cleanse antiseptically and give continuous medication for hours.

Yet! Zonitors are safe for delicate tissues. Powerful—yet non-poisonous, non-caustic. Even help promote gentle healing. No apparatus; nothing to mix. At all druggists.

Clark refused to leave till they could take Otto back with them. But Jill was prevailed upon to go.

One of the friends who'd accompanied Clark met Ed. "He hasn't eaten since we got here. Go see if you can get him to eat."

"If you can't, I can't—"

"Maybe a new face—"

He went in. "Hello, Clark."

Gable lifted his ravaged face. "Hello." His eyes returned to the window. But the sight of Ed seemed to have dragged him back to the incredibly beautiful time when there had been a Carole in the world—back and then forward. He looked up again. "We didn't meet the plane, did we, Ed?"

Ed's heart turned to water. "No, Clark," he said quietly, "we didn't meet the plane."

Then, a little later, "Want something to eat?"

"No."

"Mind if I eat something?"

"No."

He ordered a hamburger sent to him there. Maybe it was a lousy idea, but what could he lose? It worked. "Think you could get me some stewed fruit?" asked Clark. Ed was out of there like a bat out of hell. He wasn't leaving this to the telephone. With the fruit, he brought back a bottle of milk. Clark finished the bottle, by which time Ed had stealthily introduced another. Clark finished that, too. No general ever got more satisfaction from a well-planned maneuver than strategist Ed.

Clark kept himself going till everything was done that had to be done. Otto was buried the day after Carole and her mother. He insisted on going. He went with Jill. Then he relapsed into what seemed a kind of stupor. They couldn't get him to move, they could hardly get him to speak. He just sat.

Gable's been rated a tough guy, who could take what blows fate handed out and come back for more. Those who wondered over his collapse are those who confused toughness with lack of deep feeling. Sure, Gable's tough, none of which precludes the softer emotions. Tenderness is none the less tender when wrapped in a gag. One day there had been Carole, warm, alive, the dear companion of today and all the years to come. Next day there was Carole, a searing pain. She'd woven herself into every fibre of his being. Torn out, he was left bleeding. She'd been the heart of his world. When it stopped beating, the world crumbled. He was in no stupor. He'd crawled into the hole of himself, because every outside contact flayed his raw grief.

The few friends he did see were those who had loved Carole, who kept their hands off his grief. Instinctively, as a child does, he drew closer to his father. It was to his father that he first spoke of Carole, and the older man silently thanked the Lord. It was like the shadow of a crack in ice. Presently he seemed to find his only relief in talking about her—this was what Carole had said, this what she'd done. He seemed to be walking with her in the past. Between him and the future rose a night of horror. He wouldn't approach it.

They'd just started "Somewhere I'll Find You" when the tragedy struck. The studio brought no pressure to bear on him. Clark had said: "When I feel I can go back, I'll let them know." It was left in his hands. Rumor said he'd never make the picture, rumor said he was going into the army. Someone in Washington did wire, asking Clark to see him if he thought of entering the service. At the time he was interested in nothing. But the picture weighed on him. Not only the studio, but actors and writers and crew were being held in suspension till he moved. After weeks he called up one Thursday to say he'd start the following Monday.

Cast and crew were called together. Whether they or Clark dreaded that first day most was a question. They were told that anyone who so much as breathed Carole's name would be fired. The warning was hardly necessary, but they were all bending over backward in an agony of protectiveness.

Not mentioning Carole's name was easy. The hard thing was to keep from running to cover, to approach him naturally, to say "Hello, Clark" as if it had been any day. They managed. So did he. The only observable difference was that, instead of chinning around with the gang between scenes, he went to his dressing room and closed the door.

Lana had a late call. Clark was already there when she reached the set, heart quaking. She'd sent him a note, saying the things one does say on such occasions, with a wretched sense of their futility.

Now she said, "Hello, Clark, how are you?

"Fine, how are you?"

She scrabbled out words about the weather, tires, the war, searching in panic for something to talk about next. Then she caught a glimpse of the strained blue eyes above her. "You darn fool," she told herself savagely. "Best thing you can do for him is go away." So she said she'd be seeing him and went.

He'd always lunched in the commissary. Now he lunched in his dressing room. "We can't leave him alone in there day after day," said Howard Strickling, his friend and head of publicity. But you couldn't force yourself in on him either. Strickling had a bright idea. Clark had always been a newsreel fan, especially keen on anything to do with the war. Otto Winkler had been in the habit of running newsreels for him every week. "How about having a tray in the projection room," Strickling suggested, "and we'll run off some newsreels?" Clark thought that would be fine. They censored all planes out of the films at first, but after one had slipped in through an oversight, left them in.

He began doing a little work on the farm, tinkered with machines again. He bought a motorcycle and, when the picture was finished, he'd go off on solitary trips, park at a lonely spot on the beach and lie in the sand, with the sea in his ears. He'd drop in to see an old saddlemaker he knew or a man who runs a gas station out in the valley. With them he was less vulnerable. He didn't feel their thoughts probing, however sympathetically, into his feelings. They didn't regard him primarily as a movie star who had suffered the tragic loss of his wife. He was a fellow named Clark Gable who liked to gab about horses and hides and motors. That's what they talked to him about. One night a friend drove into the station for gas. A bunch of motorbikes was parked in back, a bunch of cops and messenger boys was gathered round a guy who was answering questions about this clutch and that wheel. The guy was Clark, and his friend sneaked away like a thief in the night.

gable and son . . .

His father came in every morning for breakfast. There wasn't much chatter between them. Gable senior's another tough guy. Meeting him, you spot the

GUTBUCKET GABRIEL!

But, let's go back to the contortions at the age of six. No, I ain't jivin'. He used to knock himself out with the best of them.

Harry was born in a circus, you see. His mother was a trapeze artist. His father led the Number One band of the Christy Brothers' outfit. Their son's debut occurred during a one-night stand in Albany, March 15, 1916. For Mrs. James, having a baby must have been a cinch after floating through the air with the g.'est of e., for she re-joined the troupe thirteen days later and went back to work reaching for the swinging bar. (Could it be, Jackson, that her off-spring inherited some of her ability in this direction? It could be.)

sawdust castles . . .

Young Harry grew up in a story-book world. He traveled about the country with clowns and elephants. He rode the circus ponies. He watched the Big Top being put up and was a featured part of the parade. He built castles out of the sawdust. Kids in town used to go green with envy of him.

"Isn't it fun?" they'd ask. "Isn't your life wonderful?"

"I suppose it was," Harry says now. "But to me, it was just part of the routine. I was living it. I didn't know anything else."

As he grew, of course, the question came up as to what part of the outfit he was going into. The arguments were long and bitter, everyone taking a side. Father James naturally wanted his son to be a musician. But the contortionist could yell louder or something. It ended with his teaching the sprout all the tricks of his trade. Harry became a Human Eel, a part of the show with billing to prove it.

That was swell until he developed a mastoid at the end of his sixth year. The illness necessitated an operation which nearly killed him and forced him to retire. There he was, a has-been, a star on the down-grade. His career was over. What to do?

James, Sr., came to the rescue. Sympathetically thrusting a pair of drumsticks into his hand, he introduced his son to the intricacies of keeping time to the Sousa Marches and assorted oompahs which accompany The Big Show. Young Harry learned fast and soon was whacking away at a great rate. (He still is quite a drummer. Jimmy Saunders, his vocalist, says that on his occasional trumpet holidays he "bangs out solid!")

At nine, Harry got a trumpet. For the future j'bugs of America, that was a day to remember. Not that he did any jivin' then. The stuff he played was strictly corn, just the pieces the elephant swung to and the background music for Bessie, The Beautiful High Wire Queen. Harry was still with the circus, remember.

His father saw to it, however, that he learned as much about his profession as possible. When the outfit went into winter quarters in Houston. Mr. James looked up a teacher. The boy went to work studying theory and harmony and actual musicianship. The result was that, by the time he was in his early 'teens, he was a band leader himself. He took over the Number Two group of Christy Brothers, donned a coat with enough braid on it to sink a battleship, and filled in when his father's bunch got tired.

The circus—as you may have heard—was on its way out by that time, unfortunately. The people seemed to like the moom pitchers better. After a lengthy family conference, therefore, the James aggregation decided to retire to Beaumont, Texas, and see what the stay-at-home world was like. Young Harry was fifteen then, a tall, skinny, dark-haired kid whose aquiline face looked older than his age. The plan suited him fine.

By then, his contortionist aspirations were really dead. He wanted to be a musician. So he started playing around town with some of the boys. And, they didn't give with oom-pahs! They were discovering jazz, hot music that no elephant could have performed to. Harry discovered it, too. He joined a couple of local bands, blew his brains out and was finally heard of by one Ben Pollack, a gent who had a penchant for digging people out of the sticks.

That began his wanderings again. (The guy probably never will settle down, though he talks a good game of it. He says now that he'd like to be a musical director in Hollywood in five years or so, but the boys just touch their heads when they hear him.)

Christmas Day, 1937, while doing a stint with Pollack at the Blue Room in Los Angeles, he got a wire from Benny Goodman. COME ON, BOY, it said. MEET US AT THE PENNSYLVANIA. The rest, to coin a phrase, is history. James walked up to the stand, wrapped his long, thin fingers around his horn, grabbed a chorus or two and was told by the Clarinet King to draw up a chair and sit in permanently.

His own band evolved two years later. Borrowing $4500 from his boss (for which Benny got a third of the band), Harry summoned all the kids he'd worked with in his first Texas days, guys who were good but still buried on the prairies. Their initial date was a prom at the University of New Hampshire. Due to a violent snow-storm and a mud-trapped bus, they arrived three hours late, terrified that they had no audience.

"But those students waited for us," Harry says, happily. "We could have given every one of them the Congressional Medal!"

Six weeks at the Ben Franklin Hotel in Boston, followed by two at the Pennsylvania, landed Harry in band-leader's Heaven: The New York Paramount Theater. That was all he needed. From then on in, it was a success story for the books. Two months ago, in fact, he had the delightful task of buying Goodman's third back from him—to the tune of $20,000! Not a bad three-year return on $4500!

The stint in Boston was noteworthy for another reason besides a successful run at the Ben Franklin. Harry and the boys remember it now because it was there that they played a historic baseball game with the "Black Yankees," the top colored professional team in the country.

no hits, no errors . . .

This group featured a gent known as "Home-Run" Baker, whose batting average looked like a Treasurer's Report. The James crew are blissful to inform you that said "Home-Run" didn't get a hit off of them, and that they beat his gang eleven to nothing.

Baseball is a religion to James. Outside of music, it is his outstanding passion. It is also the passion of the band. They bat a ball around at the slightest provocation. When they're traveling in the bus and have a flat tire, they leap out into a field and set up a game, garnering enough men by ringing in the manager, the band secretary and anyone else within shouting distance. Helen Forrest, the dark-haired, ex-Goodman-Shaw vocalist, acts as umpire. Though a slim half-pint, she calls the boys out with a vigor that brooks no argument.

Harry has even hired men because they were good on the diamond. When blond "Corky" Corcoran, his seventeen-year-old featured tenor sax, was first considered for a regular chair, the problems were many. "Corky" was under age, for one thing. In order to play, his parents had to sign papers which made Harry his legal guardian. This they were glad to do. Harry, however, though he wanted the boy badly, wondered how good a guardian he was going to be—until he learned that "Corky" was a terrific short-stop. That was enough. Any kid of seventeen who could blow fine tenor sax and play baseball was for James. The objections were swept aside. "Corky's" been holding down the first desk ever since.

hairbreadth harry . . .

His idols are the Brooklyn Dodgers. It was a gloomy day for him when they lost the series. He couldn't understand it. He salved his sorrow somewhat, though, by getting the entire team to sign their names on the bell of an old trumpet he had around the house and making a lamp out of the instrument.

The lure of the game-of-nine nearly caused him to lose a picture contract recently. While in Hollywood, the music publishers challenged the James bunch to a battle. In the second inning, Harry caught a ball from the outfield at second base, threw it home and was then amazed to find his hand drenched with blood and gore.

He put the meat-hook under a faucet but the red stuff still poured out. There was nothing to do but get one of the boys to drive him to a doctor. Knowing nary a medical man for miles, they asked a policeman for information. The result was a motorcycle escort to a hospital and three stitches in the James paw. Harry was due on the set the next day but managed to hide the war wound from the camera until it was healed. (P. S. James: 10; Music Publishers: 8.)

Outside of baseball, Harry loves "burnt" steaks, fried chicken and good spare ribs. He sports a mustache because it affects his playing lip to shave.

(The highest note he ever blew was High B above High C!) He adores Westerns. He's sentimental, claims that he can never tear up or throw away a picture, and continues to wear his wedding band, though his wife wants a divorce. This goes on the fourth finger of his right hand, together with a diamond solitaire which is a family heirloom.

He likes to listen to other bands. "It's a 'must' in my business," he says. He thinks that Tommy Dorsey, Duke Ellington and Jimmy Lunceford are just about tops, but has never allowed them to influence him. On the contrary, he has probably influenced them: Tommy recently added a string section to his group, just as Harry augmented his by four violins and a 'cello a year ago February. In his odd moments, he likes to go over scores instead of curling up with a weighty tome. "I can learn a lot that way," is his reason for doing it.

Another passion of The Great James is clothes. I asked the boys in the band how many suits he has. They rolled their eyes.

"No one knows!" they answered in awed tones.

They do know that he carries twelve suits with him on the road, three of which are sets of tails. (These are midnight blue, cost between $125 and $150, and are very sharp.) He also totes numerous pairs of shoes, ties, shirts and other gadgets. He designs some of his things and has a tailor in New York who puts the stuff together. He also designs the uniforms which the boys wear and doesn't seem to know when to stop. To date, the band has nine outfits to play in, including black pants, cummerbunds and red mess jackets, two sets of blue dinner clothes, blue business suits, tweed jackets and slacks. To carry all this, Harry presented each man with a large, white wardrobe trunk last Christmas. Baggage-masters faint when the band arrives at a station.

"He looks like the suave, Mandrake type," one of the boys told me, "But, he's really a little boy. He loves to let his hair get mussed up and lie on the floor and read the funny papers. He's delighted with the house he has in Hollywood and sits by the window in the living room for hours looking out over the town. He gets a kick out of making movies and meeting people and, above all, blowing his horn!"

I asked Jimmy Saunders and Helen Forrest what they thought of Harry.

"He's a great guy!" Helen said, while Jimmy nodded affirmation. "In the first place, he's considerate. He doesn't believe in sweating music out of his men or me. If he wants something, he asks for it in a quiet tone or takes you aside and shows it to you. His criticism is constructive, mostly on the phrasing of tunes. He's a phrasing fool, you know; you can tell that from his playing. He doesn't yell. He doesn't bulldoze people like some of the other leaders, but he gets what he goes after!

"And, believe it or not, but I have never heard him swear. In fact, he won't let the boys cut loose when they're around me. And, in this business, that's something! . . . Like working for Harry? Sure, I like working for him. I'm a 'night person,' I guess. I like this kind of life—and I like that horn!"

Jimmy couldn't wait 'till Helen finished. "You know, she's right about that consideration stuff," he said. "The first time I sang with the band he did something that I'll never forget.

"I had come from radio, from WCAU in Philadelphia, and a 'live' audience was just a rumor to me. When I realized I was going to have to sing where the people could see me, I was—well, let's just say I was nervous!" Jimmy grinned.

"Harry seemed to know all about it," he went on. "And every time I'd go into a tune, he'd smile and half wink at me, as if to say, 'Don't worry. You're doin' fine!' He was completely relaxed himself, and somehow I began feeling that way, too. After a couple of tunes, I was singing for dear life!"

Boyer stuff . . .

It was Jimmy, too, who told me of Harry's love of routines, of the serious way the two of them discuss subjects in phony English accents, of Harry's delight in imitating Charles Boyer. (He isn't bad, either. I heard him.) They both explained—partly—why he can play as fast a tune as "Flight of the Bumblebee" on a trumpet: because the valves on his instrument are set four inches farther out than on the ordinary one. It was Helen who told me of his love of his work.

"He isn't only serious about it," she said, thoughtfully. "It's that he doesn't really need anything else. Music and blowing that horn completely satisfy him."

We were sitting in the Hollywood Palladium during an afternoon rehearsal at the time. The tables and chairs around us were empty, the lights off. The band was on the stage in civvies. Helen was wearing a green wool jersey suit and mad shoes that I was coveting. Harry, comfortable in slacks and a sweat shirt, was running through "Body and Soul," the sweet music from that golden trumpet floating across the deserted floor towards us. Suddenly, his manager, PeeWee Monti, rushed in.

"Harry! Harry!" he yelled, doing adagio leaps in the direction of the stage. "I just heard! We're the 'Band-Of-The-Week' on the Coca-Cola show for the seventh time! And, this Saturday, they're going to give us a gold plaque instead of a silver one!"

He leaped onto the stand. The band broke into cheers. Mickey Serima did a long, ecstatic roll on his drums. Harry turned and grinned over at Helen. (She did the vocal on "I Don't Want to Walk Without You," you know.) Then he went back to blowing that horn. He was a happy guy. For the seventh time, a Harry James disc had sold more copies in seven days than any other record in America. And that's not bad for The Youngest Contortionist In The Business!

WHAT MOVIE STAR DO YOU RESEMBLE?

Madeleine Carroll, Par. player, is ideal Oval Type (forehead slightly wider than chin). Keep lips and brows natural.

"Jane!" cried Mrs. Withers.

Mr. Fairchild smiled behind his tactful hand.

"Well, what's wrong?" demanded Jane.

"Your hair, darling! Don't you realize that the extreme pompadour is just a fad? In three or four years you'll be doing your hair in an entirely different way—we don't want to date the portrait that way."

"I look my best this way," said Jane with belligerence. "I want to be painted just like this."

Any girl who has ever tried an exotic hair-do on her family knows what happened next. Jane gave sixty good reasons why the pompadour was wonderful for her type of face. Mrs. Withers held out for a simple center part, a soft updrape at the sides, and a few girlish tendrils showing upon Jane's shoulders.

P.S. Mrs. Withers won—another maternal triumph over Jane's budding tendency to kick the glamour gong around.

Several nights later Mrs. Withers surprised Jane before her mirror. Her cloud of black hair was parted in the middle and cascaded on either side of her face. "Offhand, would you say I look quite a bit like Hedy Lamarr when my hair is done this way?"

glammah lips . . .

Away back, two years earlier, Jane had done her first experimenting with lipstick. She had saved her allowance for several weeks. Then she and one of her girl friends slipped off to a dime store one day, and Jane bought one each of every kind and color of lipstick. Thereafter, in the privacy of her room when she was supposed to have gone to sleep, she painted on different mouths. She tried the sulky lower lip of Garbo and the straight upper of Crawford.

She is still experimenting with shapes, although she mostly stays within her own personal and private contours for public view. First, she brushes on the lipstick very thickly, then she powders—with a puff reserved for this purpose alone—over the lipstick. Then she closes down on a folded tissue.

Having temporarily licked the lip problem, Jane turned eager attention to her complexion. Of course, regulation movie make-up is too dark for social wear, so Jane tried a base two shades lighter. The trouble was that, though it gave her a nice suntan, the paint didn't quite meet her hair line. A neat border of white skin showed between powder-base and pompadour. So she tried a slightly lighter shade, then a very much lighter shade until finally she was walking around with the opalescent countenance of Elaine the fair.

"All you need to look like Lady Macbeth," observed one of the Terrific Teens, "is a pair of jade green earrings."

"Earrings!" shrieked Jane in the voice of a cat with its tail caught in a door. "You're off the beat. You've gone ickey." Unscrambled, this mean that the topic of earrings was a tender one.

Jane started to collect lobe gadgets when she was about 14, but she was never allowed to wear even her most precious ornaments outside of the house. For this reason, when between pictures, she has been known to change her earrings five or six times a day.

A fatal blow fell the night Jane came downstairs ready to go to a party. Her powder base was on like Goodman in the groove; her lipstick was a smooth match for her dress and nail polish; her pompadour was strictly from Versailles; her perfume deep from the heart of the never-never land.

Mr. Withers peered over his paper and sniffed. "What," he demanded, "has died?"

So nowadays Jane is forbidden to open the gift bottles in her enormous collection of perfumes.

"About all I can do for scent is to walk rapidly through a bed of petunias in bloom," she told June Carlson. How can you be a femme fatale without fragrance, I ask you."

June shot her a sympathetic glance. "I tell you! Let's go ask the Westmores!"

transformation . . .

They fairly flew crosstown to the Westmores' sleek salon on Sunset Blvd. But once on the doorstep, Jane had cold feet. "I'll bet you ten to one, Bud and I have a knock-down, drag-out battle over every item from hair-do to perfume."

And right she was! One look at her, and he whisked her into a make-up booth and slapped handfuls of cleansing cream on her face. "Quicker we get this death mask off the better. You look like something out of Inner Sanctum."

Ann Rutherford, 20th-Fox player, is Diamand Type (narraw braw, braad jaw, narraw chin). Keep an eye an adding width at chin.

Eyeing her critically, he picked up some rouge and delicately dabbed a little on her outer cheek at a point level with her eyes, smoothing it up toward the temples and downward to faintly shade the jaw.

"Aren't you the smart one," cried Jane. "I never realized rouge could make my roly-poly puss look thinner. How come?"

"The rouge absorbs light just as it does on the screen and cuts off the outer portions of your face. Incidentally, here's how to make your mouth irresistible to AC, Buddy, Freddie and company!" With a lipbrush he drew the outline of her upper and lower lip, following each to its greatest possible width, and filling in the outline with a medium shade of lipstick.

By this time Jane was perking up at the gradually blooming beauty in the mirror before her. But she still hung out for a little glamour. "How's about the hair, Bud? Doncha think this is kind of kiddish?" eagerly.

"Nope. Your mother was exactly right. Your hair is perfect for you—soft and full above the ears to give length to your face."

"Bud Westmore, don't you dare tell me earrings will make my face look moonier!" "I won't go quite that far," Bud laughed, "Earrings can do wonders for you as long as they're small and chicly simple. Large, round ones will raise havoc with your facial proportion. And, as for dangling ones—well, let me know when you take up fortune-telling!

"People don't like acting off-screen, and if in your get-up, you're trying to be other than yourself, then you are doing off-screen acting. Okay?" "Okay," wailed Janie, yearningly looking forward to a sirenish twenty-one!

* * *

Here's a chart Bud refers to when making up the cinema-gals. It'll work for you, too!

Round; Square; Triangle.

Make-Up: Wear your rouge on the outer portion of your cheeks, carrying it up toward the temple and down so that it shades the jaw very faintly. Use the darkest tone of rouge that will blend with your complexion, because while light rouge accentuates fullness, dark rouge creates shadow and reduces the width of the face. Use a foundation cream darker than your complexion.

Retain natural eyebrow line, starting the brows directly above the inner corner of the eye. Arch slightly.

Make up your mouth as wide (this does not mean lip contour) as possible and create a graceful curve to the lip line, upward at the corners.

Hairstyle: Round—(Round hair line—round chin line.)

Bring your hair in soft waves up from the forehead and dress it full and soft above the ears.

Square—(Straight hair line—square jaw line.)

Dress your hair softly and loosely, with fullness at the sides to minimize the sharp angle of the jaw.

Triangle—(Narrow forehead, wide jaw and chin line.)

Brush the hair back and up from the temples to create the illusion of width in the forehead and length in the face.

OBLONG

Make-Up: (Long, narrow face with hollow cheeks.)

Apply your rouge in a carefully blended circle in the center of your cheeks. Use the lightest tone of rouge possible.

Use your natural eyebrow line, starting on a line directly above the inside corner of your eye. The distance of the eyebrow from the eyes should be equal to the height of the eye itself when it is opened normally.

Make your lower lip full at the corners with your lipstick.

Hairstyle: In getting width into the type of face, hair-styling is even more important than make-up. Fluff the hair at the sides of the face so it is on a horizontal line with the chin or have it full behind the ears. Wear it flat on the top of your head.

OVAL

Make-up: (Forehead slightly wider than the chin.)

Rouge in the center of the cheek, blending it up over the cheekbone toward the temple in a tri-circular field. Carry rouge lightly up under the eye.

Retain your natural eyebrow line.

In making up the mouth, follow its natural line and make a full curve.

Hairstyle: Retain the oval outline in your hair-style. Keep it simple, with a center part, if you like. Draw the hair back from the forehead.

INVERTED TRIANGLE

Make-Up: (Wide forehead, narrow chin line.)

Place your rouge on the highest point of the cheekbone, carrying it well up toward the temple and shading it down very delicately.

Let your eyebrows remain natural.

Arch your mouth slightly, but do not widen the corners. Keep the indentation in the upper lip softly curved.

Hairstyle: Dress the hair in an easy effect on top and begin the fullness at a point above the ears and back of them. The greatest fullness should be on a line with the mouth to create width in the lower face. A soft dip will help decrease the width of the forehead.

DIAMOND

Make-Up: (Narrow forehead, broad jawline, narrow chin.)

Apply your rouge on the highest point of the broad cheekbone, blending it carefully in a circular field. Avoid carrying the rouge into the hollows of the temple and lower part of the cheek.

Keep the eyebrows natural.

To aid in creating an illusion of width across the lower part of the face, use a natural lip make-up—the mouth not too wide, and gently curved.

Hairstyle: Keep the fullness of the hair above and below the ears and dress the hair snugly at the cheek line.

LOVE ON A FURLOUGH

too. Good lord, she thought, there are thousands and thousands of them. If they can take it, Mrs. Holden, so can you.

It's six months since that night, and Mrs. Holden has been taking it without a squawk. Oh, there's been a tear or two, but squawks? That gal's not having any, thanks.

Her work has helped. It's filled all the corners of her days so completely that there hasn't been time to brood—very much. And people have been wonderful. There was Bill's best friend, a non-pro, who used to come over and let her talk "Bill" by the hour. He's in the army himself, now, and the new listening post is Mona Carlson, Richard's cute little wife.

"'Member the weird way his hair grows in the back, Mone?"

"Sure, honey. And the way he keeps clearing his throat when he's embarrassed."

"Yeah," dreamily. "And his imaginary indigestion."

"And the way he looks at you."

"Does he?" Silly talk, but it helps. Having Bill's family so near has helped, too. There are Sunday night suppers with quantities of elegant cold chicken and much talk of Bill, aged three.

"Everyone has been so darling," says Brenda, making big spaniel eyes at you. "Take Florence and Mac, for instance." Florence and Mac are the white-haired Scotch-Irish couple that cook and garden for the Holdens. They took over the day after Bill left—succeeding a hysterical Chinese pair who thought every plane that flew over the house was a Jap Zero. The Chinese couple incidentally were responsible for making Brenda's little daughter Ginger much, much too war-conscious. Mama Holden discovered that one day when she had her out walking.

They passed a house that had a big clothesline out in back. Ginger jumped up and down. "Oh mommy," she squealed. "Let's go see the innerceppers." Innerceppers, mused Brenda. New word for clothespins, no doubt.

"Let's not look at them right now, Ginger. Mommy's in a hurry."

"Oh, but Mommy. The innerceppers, the innerceppers."

"Well," Mommy tells it, "it was just one of those things. Nothing would do. We pussyfooted around to the back and looked."

"Where are they?" wailed Ginger. Eventually it came out that the Chinese cook spoke often and incoherently of the interceptors that guard the coastline. Ginger had gotten the whole thing a trifle balled up, but her mother was plenty furious at the cook for telling a four-year-old such tales.

helping hands . . .

But to get back to Florence and Mac. They're pearls. Brenda loves them, and they adore her. Mac's real name is Bill MacNamara, but Mrs. H. is sort of sentimental about you-know-who's name, so she's rechristened him. Brenda drives the car herself, but Mac keeps it shined within an inch of its life and has it purring at the door every morning at the exact instant she needs it. She's never asked any cook to fix her breakfast on the days she has a very early studio call, but Florence is psychic or something. No matter what hour Brenda gets up, Florence is already buzzing around the kitchen doing things with percolators and toasters. "Just take a wee bite of something, Mrs. Holden," she wheedles at 5 A.M., luring Brenda into the den where she's fixed a superb tray.

The den, by the way, has become the dining room for the duration. When Bill first went away, Brenda made up her mind that she'd keep on having her meals at their lovely big table. She did it for about a week, but it didn't work out. Every time she'd look over at the empty chair, her heart would drop a notch or two. The whole place was tied up with memories of their last couple of weeks together. Memories of wine every night, and his blue eyes laughing across the table at her, "because, sweet, if I don't laugh I'll bawl." Memories of Bill's beloved steaks and chocolate cakes and his deep voice saying, "Gosh, this is swell," and, "Gosh, you're beautiful." Nope, the dining room was no go.

Florence seems to understand about things, and she makes a point of having a beautiful tray arranged every evening, with lots of cigarettes and magazines around and "Miss Ginger" out of the way at least till Mommy gets her breath.

long distancing . . .

"Miss Ginger" is a terrific comfort really. She knocks herself out diverting Brenda. Has a repertoire of jokes, stories and impromptu dances which she pulls on a moment's notice. A couple of times she's caught Brenda crying. "Mommy honey, it's naughty to cry," she'll say, making with a big white hanky and a couple of jokes. "Smile now," she insists, pinching Brenda's cheeks and pulling her mouth into a grotesque grin. One time she saw her mother looking at a picture of a soldier on the cover of Newsweek. She put her small hand over the picture. "Don't look at that, Mommy. It'll make you lonesome." She misses Daddy terribly but is unbearably proud of the fact that he's a soldier. Tells everybody. He writes her letters and sent her one of those tiny live turtles. It's bright green and has "Ginger's Turtle" written on it. "Frankly," says Brenda, "I could never get attached to the thing, but she's mad for it." She invariably speaks to Bill whenever he phones, tells him much news — often fictitious — and winds up with several loud, smacking kisses.

The telephone and U. S. Post Office are what have really saved Brenda's life. She and Bill write each other at least once a day, sometimes more. Brenda keeps a fountain pen and stationery in her night table, and she writes him a long letter just before she goes to sleep. He writes her any old time—during part of his lunch hour, during a free second up in the film lab, on the edge of his bunk at night. They had kind of a gentlemen's agreement at first to write super-cheerful, matter-of-facty letters. You know, everything's swell; I had apple pie for lunch. No stuff whatsoever. Finally Brenda broke down. "Darling, darling Bill," she wrote. "I miss you so terribly." Everything that had been pent up for days rushed out. He phoned her the night he got it. "God, honey, I needed that." Since then, their letters have been straight from the heart.

On the telephone, they're very joshy. They tell each other anything funny. They postpone the good-bys with a lot of ridiculous small talk; then there's the inevitable silence when there's simply not one more straw to clutch at. Eventually, "I love you, Ardis." "I love you, Bill." "'night, darling." "'night."

The longest call to date was a three-quarter of an hour item which involved plans for their first anniversary celebration. Brenda had finished all her assignments and was going to fly East for a two-week visit, beginning on July 13th, which was their anniversary. To their frightful disappointment, the studio needed Brenda for some retakes. Bill sent two dozen red roses with a card, "All my love on our first year of separation." (Between locations and appendicitis and the Army, the Holdens have literally been apart more than they've been together this year.)

A couple of days later, Brenda was on a plane headed for New York. It was a 17-hour trip, but she swears she never closed an eye from Los Angeles to La Guardia. "Would you if you were going to see him?" From about Chicago on she was preening. Getting herself to look the way he loves her best. She had on his favorite yellow gabardine suit and no hat. Her hair was "his way"—parted in the middle and long and drooly—and she had on flame red lipstick, and plenty of Tabu perfume. "Glammah," she says giving the giddyap sound. Finally, the plane began its gradual descent, and Brenda's heart really started giving her the business. She kept thinking, "Oh when I see that baby! Boy, when I see him."

Then the plane landed, and he was standing there looking at her. There were so many words to say. So many. And no tongue to say them with and only a great ache for a throat. He walked toward her, and she could hardly see him for misty-eyedness. "Hello, honey," he whispered and kissed her.

One of the boys had driven Bill over from Astoria, where he's working in the film laboratories, so conversation was pretty general all the way into New York.

heaven on wheels . . .

That night they went to the Stork Club and drank champagne and went on like a couple of moonstruck sophomores. "We couldn't stop smiling," Brenda says. "Hour after hour we sat there with these terrific grins. Just perfectly happy."

Back at the Delmonico, she sat Bill down in a chair. "I've got something for you, darling. An anniversary present. Close your eyes." She whipped a little box out of her bag and slipped something on his finger. "Okay, open." It was a gold wedding band which Bill had been hinting at for months.

"Oh, say, that's perfect, angel. How'd you know I've been crazy for one?"

"That's to keep the snakes away." He gave her a long look, and she knew there was no competition.

"I've got something for you, too." It was a stunning gold cigarette case set and lighter. Inside the case was engraved: "To Ardis on our first, with forever to go. Bill."

Bill had a three-day pass, and then he managed to wangle a week. And for ten days those kids lived in a dream. They walked up Fifth Avenue holding hands, they wined and dined at the Stork and the Colony and Twenty One and didn't give one press interview.

"Willie, you're the thinnest soldier in New York, but I love you anyway," Brenda told him. He's gone down from 175 to 156, how no one knows, as he eats more than he ever did before. His nervous stomach is a thing of the past. "The Army done it," he claims. "It's a wonderful institution—if it were only co-ed."

There's no end to the things they have to tell each other. "Ronnie Reagan's back home, and Jane's beside herself. Rhodes misses you so awfully." Rhodes is their dog.

small talk . . .

"I miss old Rhodes. . . . Say, honey, I can sew now. Honest. And I see that all my stuff gets to the cleaners when it should. And I shine my shoes. I'll most likely fire you when I get out of here." Bill's told her lots of swell things that have happened to him. About the hat check girl who'll never take a tip, because she doesn't know he's Holden, but she does know privates are poor. And the cabbies who'll drive you anywhere—on the house. A couple of times he's told her that he's not completely satisfied with what he's doing to win the war. His current job is narrating in the movie shorts that teach other soldiers how to fight. "Hell of a thing for a big bruiser like myself to be doing," he says.

Whenever there's an especially awful news flash, she can see his mouth get white around the edges and his bright blue eyes get dark and troubled. Then she'll feel like dragging him off to the movies or the beach — anywhere away from the war. "It's so damn hard," she says, "being an American and a wife. There are so many loyalties and loves fighting each other." She pounds her little fists together a couple of times, then with a kind of starry look she goes on. "It's so ghastly and somehow so glorious to be in love right now. I mean, our time together is so pitifully brief, but that makes each individual second so perfect. There's no time to argue or heckle or nag. You just hang on to every blessed minute and pray for one more day."

The Holdens don't think about afterwards very much. They just scheme to be together as much as possible now, and the minute the July visit was over they were planning the next one. Occasionally, though, they'd talk about "later on." One night they were looking at some pictures of their house, and Bill said, "Sure hope I'll get to live there some day."

"You will, darling. We'll have a whole long beautiful life together there—with the horses and dogs and Ginger and—

"And a couple of other kids?"

"Of course."

Brenda wants a baby so badly. She'd love it this year if it were possible. But just now, she's the breadwinner. There's their home to keep up, and Ginger to look out for and war bonds to buy. You can't have a baby and a movie job simultaneously. "But when this is all over, I want a little Bill. It'll have his eyes and disposition and shoulders. Ever notice Bill's shoulders? Like this." She exaggerates grossly with her hands. "It can even smoke a pipe if it wants. Bill does." She looks at you dreamy-eyed. "Bill, Bill, Bill—that's every word out of me. Could be I'm in love with the guy."

for romance. He used all the words he knew, and all that got to Vicky was the sniffles from the cold night air. "That does it," Dan said, pulling the canoe up to the dock. "Maybe Victor is the guy for you."

"I'm sorry, Dan."

"There's nothing to be sorry about. I'm leaving in the morning."

"Maybe that will be best."

"Sure," Dan said.

up in Vicky's room . . .

But Dan didn't leave in the morning. And he didn't leave at the express request of Victor Prince. Victor, it seemed, wanted Dan to stay for the wedding. It would add tone, Victor said, to have a big shot like Dan Christy at the wedding, make a better publicity break; and a fellow needs publicity in show business, after all, didn't he, Vicky? Vicky nodded shortly. Dan agreed, thoughtfully. And then, still thoughtfully, went down to the florist and ordered a dozen long-stemmed roses sent to Miss Vicky Lane. When a fellow is worried about publicity at his wedding——. Well, one more try anyway, Dan thought; one more chance for Vicky. He knocked on her door that night and then walked in without waiting, rolling a huge dinner service wagon before him. Vicky was dressed like a dream. She stood staring at him, and Dan bowed gallantly to her and rolled the wagon into the center of the room.

"This is our anniversary," Dan said.

"Don't joke, Dan."

"I'm not. It's the anniversary of our first kiss. Remember it? Just after the speckled trout we had and the wine?" He lifted the cover off one of the trays. "Well, here's the trout again. And the wine. And here we are."

Vicky was white. "Take it away, Dan."

"But—"

"And you go with it."

"It's good fish," Dan said.

"I don't want you here, Dan," Vicky said harshly. "Do you want me to call Victor?"

"There isn't enough for him," Dan said.

Vicky turned without a word to the phone. She dialed the number, and Dan heard her speaking to Victor, heard her asking him to come to her room. Dan shrugged and stood silently in the room until they heard Victor's footsteps.

"You've got to go now," Vicky said urgently. "He's here."

"Where?" Dan said. "Out the door? He'll see me."

"The window," Vicky said.

Victor was handsome in his tails as he came into the room. He crossed swiftly to Vicky and kissed her. "I'm glad you called me," he said.

"Why shouldn't I call you?" Vicky said.

"No reason why. Except Dan Christy. You never did before, you know. But you've called me now, Vicky, and that means it's all over with Christy, doesn't it?"

All over. Dan was somewhere out along the shore now or back in his room, packing to leave. Forget Dan. Forget Dan Christy. Dan was out of her life for good. She'd sent him away. Dan may have been out of her life; but he wasn't out of her room. Looking up, she saw his face peering out from behind the drape at the window. He hadn't left at all. He was grinning at her, shrugging his shoulders and pointing to the window.

"My love," Victor said.

"Please—"

"My sweet."

"Victor!"

"My darling."

"Victor, someone might—"

"What do I care?" Victor said. "Let the whole world know how I feel. Now that you've forgotten that cheap tenor—"

"Hey!" Dan said from the drapes. "Stick to my personality. Keep my voice out of it."

Victor whirled as if he'd been shot. "What is this?" he cried. "A joke? What's he doing here?"

"I don't know," Vicky said. "I told him—"

"You told him! Then you knew he was here. And you let me make myself ridiculous in front of him?"

"I tell you I didn't know," Vicky said.

"What a cheap trick," Victor shouted. "Of all the—"

"Get out," Vicky yelled at Victor. "Get out. And take this with you." She ripped the ring off her finger and threw it at him. "You dare to talk. You asked him to stay for publicity!"

"I won't answer that," Victor said with dignity and stalked out.

"Nice work, Vicky," Dan said softly. "He's not your type anyway." He walked toward her and then said gently: "I've got a ring to replace that one. It's the ring I bought in New York, Vicky. I really did."

He took it out of his pocket and handed it to her.

And in one wild swing, Vicky sent it flying through the window.

"Get out!" she yelled.

It was four o'clock in the morning, and the Terrace was a dark sea ending over Lake Louise. It was empty. Or nearly so. For Vicky Lane was out on that terrace with a flashlight, hunting over the stones. She wasn't surprised when a voice said quietly to her: "I've been waiting for you, Vicky."

"I came looking for the ring, Dan," she said simply.

"We're crazy, Vicky," Dan said.

"Aren't we?"

"So crazy in love we can only hurt each other."

"I didn't want to, Dan."

"I didn't either, Vicky. And I never will again. Believe that."

"I do, Dan."

"I've been a heel and a louse. But it's all over now. I want you, Vicky."

"Dan," Vicky said. "Dan."

There were stars over Lake Louise bright as the lights that would once again spell out the name of "Christy and Lane" over Broadway. There was a moon over the glacier brilliant as a spotlight moving across the stage. But, at the moment, the team of Chrisy and Lane wasn't interested in lights of any kind. What's the name for that, anyway? Love?

BACKACHE, LEG PAINS MAY BE DANGER SIGN
Of Tired Kidneys

If backache and leg pains are making you miserable, don't just complain and do nothing about them. Nature may be warning you that your kidneys need attention.

The kidneys are Nature's chief way of taking excess acids and poisonous waste out of the blood. They help most people pass about 3 pints a day.

If the 15 miles of kidney tubes and filters don't work well, poisonous waste matter stays in the blood. These poisons may start nagging backaches, rheumatic pains, leg pains, loss of pep and energy, getting up nights, swelling, puffiness under the eyes, headaches and dizziness. Frequent or scanty passages with smarting and burning sometimes shows there is something wrong with your kidneys or bladder.

Don't wait! Ask your druggist for Doan's Pills, used successfully by millions for over 40 years. They give happy relief and will help the 15 miles of kidney tubes flush out poisonous waste from the blood. Get Doan's Pills.

SERGEANT AUTRY

officer shook Gene's hand in welcome. "From Texas, aren't you?" he said.

"Yes, sir, Tioga, Texas."

"Tioga's my home town, too."

"You don't say!—uh—Sir—"

Gene walked over for his GI uniforms. The supply sergeant grinned. "Want some army clothes for that Sears Roebuck rig?" he cracked. "Well, I'll trade you even up."

"'Even up'—why that sounds like Oklahoma," said Gene.

"I'll say—right from The Panhandle."

"Guess this is just old home week!" And Gene Autry's smile came back to full power. These men were his kind.

Hollywood's Number One Buckaroo is in the army now—for the duration. Gene likes the army, and the army likes Gene. But what's a rodeo rough-rider and movie cowboy king doing in the Air Corps? Well, as Gene is discovering, half of Uncle Sam's sky herders with wings seem to come from cow country. But the real reason Gene's signed up with a sky riding outfit is because that's where Uncle Sam figures he'll do most good.

It's no military secret that Gene Autry's job in the armed forces is specialized. It boils down to being mostly a recruiter, air corps radio salesman and morale builder. That doesn't mean he isn't going right through the same foot and back-busting basic training as every other rookie. He is. But on the side Gene is using all the Hollywood fame he has built up in the last seven years to get young America more air conscious.

It was way last March that Gene strolled into his local draft board. He asked them a simple question. He said he aimed to enlist in the army and did they think he'd be doing the right thing if he did? The answer then was "No."

"Keep on with what you're doing, Gene, until things straighten out," they said. Gene took their official advice, but he got fretful. In June he went back again. "How about me joining up, now?"

flying buckaroo . . .

Well, they said, things were straightening out now. They could use good men.

Gene was set to go out on an Eastern tour with his Flying-A Rodeo. He went down to Washington. He wasn't after a commission. In fact, Gene wanted to go in as a buck private. The army officials thought a technical sergeant would be better, because technical sergeants can do special jobs in the army.

After all, Gene Autry has something to offer. He has the devotion of millions of young kids who've grown up now.

The army brass-hats are not so dumb. They figured Gene's appeal was to men from 17 to 20. Those are the young eagles with the sharpest aviation claws.

"I want to be wherever I can serve my country best," said Gene simply. They told him where. While he was in Washington he took his physical. On his next rodeo engagement in Chicago, Colonel Edward Shaifer swore him in—right on Gene's own radio show.

His radio show's still going on—you can hear it every Sunday. The Gene Autry Flying-A Rodeo is still touring the land. You can still see Gene Autry's crooning cow-waddy pictures in your local theater. How come? Is Gene in the army—or ain't he? Wal, it's like this.

airing the air corps . . .

Under his present orders, Gene is detailed to carry on "Melody Ranch" on the air, as usual. Only it isn't "Melody Ranch" any more. It's "Sergeant Gene Autry." The army runs and supervises it. Commercials have been snipped down to practically nothing. Gene has been snatched off his horse and put in an airplane. Each week he dramatizes actual Army Air Corps epics, right from the records. He plays real heroes in real action in the real and recent past. He sings, of course, but you'll notice he tags off now—always—with a patriotic song—even if he has to dig back fifty years to find a new one each week.

That's all the mystery there is to Gene Autry's job in the army. It means, of course, he has to have different duties than other sergeants at Santa Ana. But a lot of lieutenants, captains, even generals have other jobs than flying P-40's.

At present Gene has a split-week schedule like this: He reports to the post each Monday at seven A.M. sharp. There he drills, exercises, does everything all the other rookies do.

But when Friday rolls around Gene's wife, Ina, picks him up at the post. Gene stays in his sergeant's uniform, of course—army war regulations. But from the minute he leaves the camp, he's back in his old business. He's Gene Autry—showman. Maybe the show is a bond rally, a recruiting stunt, a speech, a p.a. for this or that—but it's always for the war effort. That's how his radio program is classified now—it's an army recruiting effort. Gene rehearses all day Friday. He sleeps at the ranch, ten miles or so from Hollywood, and when he's home he gets up even earlier than at camp—so he can give his horse, Champion, a personal workout. As for bedtime—Gene's in the hay before taps time.

Sunday, after his radio show, Gene's at liberty. So far, he has gone right out to the ranch after dinner. He's due back in the barracks at 7 A.M. sharp Monday.

Naturally Gene can't run such things as his barnstorming rodeo on a part-time basis. But he may be able to make a furlough movie later on. Gene left Hollywood with three of his musical horse operas all finished and ready to release. "Stardust on the Sage," "Bells of Capistrano" and "Call of the Canyon" will come at you at intervals all through next year. The plans at his old alma mater, Republic, are to make another, to be called "Sergeant Gene Autry" and do the same thing on film as Gene is doing on the radio—make it army promotional, detailing the experiences of a cowboy who does just what Gene has done—traded in his Stetson on a service cap.

As a civilian, Gene Autry dragged in about $225,000 a year. From his movie contracts, radio shows and rodeos Gene gathered more than hay for his horses. Now he collects $87.50 in a government check once a month—and that's all.

Gene doesn't get paid for his radio show—not a dime. If he makes a movie, he'll do it for free—and for Uncle Sam. Anything he already has out gathering in cocoanuts—such as his record royalties tie-ups or songs—that, naturally, goes into his bank account. But the boy who has made himself over a million of the best since he came to Hollywood will turn down the filthy stuff for the duration. So what happens you say?

Gene's salary from any of his entertaining now goes into a special fund. That fund is available to the army for any relief purpose it cares to divert it to.

back home . . .

But what will happen to the widespread Autry interests while Gene's off to the wars? A contract with Mister Whiskers at war, of course, knocks any other contract Galleywest, and pronto. But Gene had some pretty extensive investments here and there. For one, the Flying-A Ranch in Gene Autry, Oklahoma, has set Gene back about a quarter of a million cartwheels for stock and improvements. The Flying-A has 2,000 acres, 278 head of bucking horses and one of the largest herds of longhorn steers under the Western sky.

Well, the cowhand staff at the Flying-A has mostly gone to war anyway; so a skeleton crew is running the place, and the rodeo stock has gone over to the Lightning-C ranch in Texas, where Gene's old ranch boss, Everett Colburn, has taken over his rodeo shows for the duration. Maybe there'll be a little expense in keeping the Flying-A from going to pot, what with upkeep and taxes, but Gene figures he can pay.

As for his Hollywood home, Melody Ranch, his wife, Ina, will keep the home fires burning there. Ina is a typical Oklahoma girl, a former schoolteacher, reliant, capable, and she's really been running things at Melody Ranch since their North Hollywood house burned down a year or so ago.

Gene and Ina were planning moving into North Hollywood again to rebuild the burned-down house and save tires going back and forth to Melody Ranch. But that's out for the war. Ina will stay right where she is, and when she gets lonesome, her mother, Mrs. Spivey, can come out from Oklahoma and stay.

Probably the lonesomest individual left behind by Gene is his movie star horse, Champion. Gene has always been right fond of that particular pony (he bought him as a colt, raised and trained him himself). Champ has shared Gene's movie fame and success, and Gene looks on him as a real partner. For the duration, Champ gets a well-earned rest. He'll roam the grazing land at Melody Ranch without an equine care. No personal appearances, no travels in horse carts or trains, no movie lots. "I'm not worrying about Champ," Gene grins. "He's got ten good acres of alfalfa and Johnny Agee to take care of him." Johnny is Tom Mix's old horse trainer and Gene's corral major-domo.

On his first trip home from camp, Gene was almost at the ranch gate when he remembered something. He whirled his car around and headed back for a roadside stand. Champ got greeted, as always, with a tidbit. But this time it was carrots. Used to be sugar. "Champ ain't got a ration card," Gene cracks.

Smiley Burnette, another partner in Gene Autry's movie rise, might be out of a job as Gene's jovial foil, but Smiley has always worked in other movie jobs around Republic, so he'll do all right.

Gene isn't glued either to Santa Ana or to his major league recruiting job. Already he has buzzed around to the air fields at Marsh Field, Bakersfield and recently even back to Washington at the request of Mrs. Roosevelt to help out on a special show she and Secretary Morgenthau staged. Gene is booked for plenty more travel. He doesn't mind keeping on the lam. He traveled about 75,000 miles a year as a showman.

There's no particular reason why one of these days Gene won't trade his show business spurs in on some kind of real fighting wings. That's what he wants to do. Gene has had a couple of hundred hours of flying. He's too old for army piloting, but doesn't get airsick and he's a mighty dead shot. Maybe he'll end up an instructor or a bombardier. He says wistfully, "I'd sure like to rope and hogtie one of those little yeller fellers."

There are 17,000 other guys at the Santa Ana base that feel the same way. Gene blends with them now so perfectly you'd never know he'd ever faced cheering audiences. Gene makes a well-set-up looking soldier. 5 ft. 11 inches, 160 stripped, and he doesn't look his 34 years. The nature of his work has kept him in swell physical trim, which he has seconded by swimming, riding and hiking around his ranch.

So far the only casualty Gene has suffered in army life is to—that's right—his feet. Not because of the walking—Gene's used to that. But in the past eight or ten years he's never walked farther than from his house to the tennis court in anything but high-heeled Texas boots. When he dropped down to earth in army kicks, "I felt," said Gene, "like I had my feet on backwards!"

By now Gene has melted into army life and army looks—so much so that the other day when his best pal came down to see him, he hunted around for a half hour before he spotted Gene, although the guy was mixed up in a bunch of soldiers not a hundred feet away all the time! But the first day, Gene pulled himself a boner. He put on all the uniform, but he forgot the shoes. Stopping in Santa Ana at the Army and Navy store to buy a dress cap (even privates have to put it on the line for the hard-billed skimmers), Gene saw the clerk staring from his aviation insignia to his feet.

"Why, General Doolittle," he said, "where's your horse?"

When he signed for the cap, "Gene Autry," the clerk almost fainted. "Gosh," he cried. "Hold everything—wait till I call up my kids!"

Ordinarily, though, Gene has made a practice of putting as much of his movie star past behind him as possible. His secretary wanted to go along to his March Field broadcast. "Nope!" declared Gene. "Imagine a sergeant with a secretary!" Even Ina got turned down on the same trip. She wanted to drive him to Riverside in the car. "Uh-uh," vetoed Gene. "I'll go in the army bus with the boys."

But Gene isn't striving self-consciously to be a jolly good fellow with his buddies. He's just the kind of a fellow who gets along with people anyway.

exit Hollywood . . .

First day at camp, Gene invited the mob of soldier ex-Sooners and ex-Texans who gathered around him over to the post-exchange for a coke, a beer or what they'd have. When the drinks had been polished off, Gene felt that sinking sensation. He knew before he reached in his jeans. He'd left all his dough in his cowboy pants. He didn't have a bean! Would he get the guard house for this or just a general going over?

He whispered to his new bunk mate anxiously. "Got ten bucks? I'm busted."

The sergeant almost swooned. But he produced with, however, one cautious question, born of army experience. "For how long, soldier?"

"Until—" gasped Gene dismally. "Until payday." That little episode got around the camp—you can be sure of that. And it promptly whittled Gene Autry, ex-Hollywood star, right down to army size—where he sure wants to be!

MEET MRS. JOHN DOE

Mrs. Doe felt very, very hurt.
John completely forgot their tenth anniversary!
She had worn her new dress,
And had carefully made-up, with just
The right shade of powder and lipstick—
But he merely remarked that she looked
"A little tired around the eyes".
After a good cry, she took stock of herself—
Her eyelashes had become wispy
And her brows were a puzzle!
No wonder she looked tired and washed-out.
That very day she read about MAYBELLINE
Just as you are doing—
And look at Mrs. Doe NOW!

MORAL: It's a wise wife who keeps a pretty eye on her husband!

Mrs. Doe's lashes now appear long, dark and lovely, with a few simple brush-strokes of MAYBELLINE MASCARA (solid or cream form—both are non-smarting and tear-proof).

Mrs. Doe's eyebrows now have character and expression, thanks to the smooth-marking MAYBELLINE EYEBROW PENCIL.

For a subtle touch of added charm, Mrs. Doe blends a bit of creamy MAYBELLINE EYE SHADOW on her eyelids—her eyes appear sparkling and more colorful!

Give your eyes compelling beauty... be sure you get genuine MAYBELLINE, the Eye Make-up in Good Taste.
